STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 21 January 1991

The committee met at 1335 in room 228.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair: Before we begin hearing from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics, I would like to ask Mr Decker to make a report. We had asked originally, through agreement of the subcommittee, to have the Bank of Canada make a report today and for John Crow or one of his assistants to come and speak to us. I would like to ask Mr Decker to give us an update as to that situation and what happened.

Clerk of the Committee: At the direction of the subcommittee, I did contact the governor's office of the Bank of Canada and was informed that the governor himself was planning a trip to Australia later this month and was in intensive briefings for that and therefore would not be able to accept the committee's invitation. Apparently, some thought was given to allowing either an assistant governor or someone else from the governor's office to come and meet with the committee, but ultimately they declined the committee's invitation.

MINISTRY OF TREASURY AND ECONOMICS

The Chair: I would like to introduce members from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics. Is it Bryan Davies, the deputy minister?

Dr Christie: I am sorry, the deputy minister could not be here. My name is Bob Christie. I am the assistant deputy minister in the office of economic policy and I will be co-ordinating our discussion. Qaid Silk is the director of our economic forecasting branch, and David Trick is the director of our demographics and social economics branch. We have a small handout that may assist the members of the committee in terms of going through the material that we came here to discuss.

Mr Phillips: I hope we are all into speed reading.

Dr Christie: You know us too well. There is no GST on this material, I might add.

The Chair: I trust it is printed on both sides.

Dr Christie: It will be next time. Your comment has been noted.

Everyone has a copy. Page 1 provides a summary of Ontario's economic outlook as presented in the paper released early in December. You will note that we expect in this outlook very marginal growth performance next year, now this year, with no job creation after a loss of 12,000 jobs in 1990, an unemployment rate that rises a full per cent to 7.3% in 1991 and a CPI inflation rate of 6.1%, up from below 5% in 1990.

The economic recovery from recession in this outlook is expected to commence by the middle of the year, but the risk, I think, fairly clearly, as indicated in that document and by some of the comments we will make here today, is for a recession that lasts longer and for a recovery that begins later than indicated here.

The unemployment rate clearly, as I have indicated, would rise. There would be no job creation. The increase in inflation is almost entirely due to the GST, but higher oil prices are a factor as well. We are noting here parenthetically, although I am sure it is matter that is on the minds of the committee, as it is on all of our minds, that the Middle East situation makes the oil price component of the inflation forecast quite uncertain, as it makes almost all components of this forecast more uncertain than these things almost always are. But in that connection, the forecast looks for oil prices in 1991 to average about $26 a barrel, up from about $24.50 a barrel in 1990.

The 1992-94 period, the medium term, shows a return to more normal levels of growth but levels of growth that are somewhat below those experienced in the mid to late 1980s, when growth in Ontario averaged somewhat over 5% per year.

The primary reasons for this more modest growth over the next few years are what we believe will be a continuation of relatively tight monetary policy in Canada, the value of the Canadian dollar, which remains relatively high, a weak United States demand growth and ongoing structural adjustment in the Ontario economy to the free trade agreement and trade developments internationally in general.

Mr Phillips: On page 1, I think the 1990 job numbers are out now, if I am not mistaken. I think instead of minus 12,000, it is minus 120,000.

Dr Christie: This is a year-over-year average. The average level of employment in 1990 is about 12,000 below the average level of employment in 1989. If you look at end-of-year employment, say, versus the peak level, it will be closer to the figure you mentioned. These numbers here for inflation, job creation and the unemployment rate are annual averages.

Mr Phillips: But as an indicator, at least for me, at the year-end there were 120,000 fewer jobs, and I think there were about 165,000 fewer full-time jobs at year-end.

Dr Christie: We have some detailed labour market material coming up later, if we could take that under advisement perhaps and deal with it then, or would you prefer to go right to that material?

Mr Phillips: My point is just whether knowing that at year-end we were at minus 120,000 influences at all your average projections for 1991.

Dr Christie: It does in the sense that we are starting from quite a low base, and in order to realize the zero net on average in 1991 we need to have and do in fact have in the forecast the resumption of job growth, along with the recovery from recession. That is part of the forecast.

The Chair: This is a very lengthy document. Could I ask that we have one question and perhaps if the question is answered later on, we could work that out so that we can move along quickly.

Mr Kwinter: Could I just ask one question about your assumption about the price of oil? The media today indicated that in fact the price of oil may be down around the $18-a-barrel mark. How is that going to impact on your projections?

Dr Christie: Again, for Ontario, obviously a lower price of oil is better, as a rise in the price of oil for Ontario is like a tax increase levied by an outside party. It is a drain on disposable income in Ontario. For example, we have some material, again later on—and I hope I do not distract the committee too much by anticipating later things in responses to these questions—we have a slide that shows the impact of a $10-a-barrel difference in the price of oil on the Ontario economy.

Mr Jamison: Actually my question involved the oil question, but seeing as it is a long report, I suggest that maybe we try to work our way through the report.

Dr Christie: Because a number of things have happened since this forecast was done and because the situation is sufficiently fluid, we felt that we should highlight a few of those recent developments to give you a sense of the way in which we see the risks to this forecast. As I think I mentioned before, it is fair to say at this point that the risks generally tend to be on the downside, that is, that the unfolding situation will not be as positive as even the very marginal kinds of growth numbers we displayed in the forecast.

As noted, the United States has followed Canada into recession and in fact industrial production in the United States over the past few months has fallen quite sharply, with the obvious impact on US exports. The unemployment rate for December in Ontario rose to 7.8%, which would require that on average the unemployment rate fall in 1991 in order to realize the 7.3% in the forecast that was presented. In fact, the last two months of data which became available showed a more marked deterioration in the employment outlook and unemployment rate than had been anticipated at the time of making this forecast.

Housing activity, again, has been very weak. The dollar has remained very high in spite of lower interest rates, and the federal government has indicated that it continues to see the battle against inflation as a higher priority than any moves to deal with the recession, the risk on that side of course being a more restrictive fiscal stance and monetary stance on the part of the government of Canada than we might have anticipated a couple of months ago.

Generally, the continuing uncertainty about events in the Middle East and the impacts of those events on consumer confidence may well slow the recovery. These are all factors that we are looking at as we continue to review the outlook in preparation for the budget forecast, which is released with the budget.

Page 3 gives you some indication of the way in which other forecasters are looking at the Ontario economy. It gives you some sense for the way in which forecasts have been moving in the past few months. As you can see in the October-November period, among those who had current forecasts at that point, the range was essentially between minus 1% and 1% and is in and around zero as a sort of central tendency. At the moment, there are very few people calling for positive growth in Ontario. They range from minus 0.3%, or essentially no growth, to a low of minus 3% from the Bank of Nova Scotia.

I think the wide forecast range that we are seeing here reflects in part the level of uncertainty in the environment, the level of uncertainty among forecasters, and the variety of assumptions that people are making about how things will unfold in the Middle East and what will happen to the price of oil, among other things. On average, forecasts for both the United States and Canada are moving lower. We have noted here that the average forecast for Canada in terms of the most recent forecast available is for the economy to continue to shrink by about 0.5%, with the US now seen as being very much the same level.

Finally, we have provided a summary of the antirecession measures that the Treasurer announced in his statement on 4 December, with the $700 million from the province leading to about $1 billion in short-term capital projects to stimulate employment. The decision not to impose the retail sales tax on the GST has had the effect of saving consumers about $500 million per year, which will improve ability to consume. The extension of the Ontario current cost adjustment to the end of 1991 provides some incentive to investment. The confirmation of the more generous Ontario tax reduction provides $44 million to low-income earners.

Taken together, we expect these measures to boost real output in the Ontario economy by about 0.6% in 1991 and create more than 20,000 jobs; that is, without these measures, our forecast as tabled in early December would have been for a small reduction in the size of the economy next year.

I will ask Qaid Silk now to give some more of the background.

Mrs Sullivan: I just have a clarification. Just so that we know where we are coming from, the Ontario current cost adjustment is the 30%?

Dr Christie: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: This was the target last year. The Ontario tax reduction was also in the budget last year. The $1 billion in short-term capital projects, is that new money or is that already in the 1990 budget?

Dr Christie: No, that was not in the 1990 budget.

Mrs Sullivan: So this is all new.

Dr Christie: Yes.

Mr Silk: So is the RST. There is no RST on GST.

Mrs Sullivan: That was not in the 1990 budget.

Mr Silk: No. Basically what I will do is take you through the next few slides, which will give a bit more detail on the element we presented in the summary.

The first slide obviously gives you the international economic environment. As you can see, we are expecting slow growth everywhere in the rest of the world, especially the US, our major trading partner, which is already in a recession. It entered a recession in the fourth quarter of 1990 and it is expected to be in a recession at least for two quarters. Some people think it might be a three-quarter recession. In any case, it is very slow growth, 0.4% average in 1991.

For the OECD as a whole—in other words, all the industrialized world—we are basically talking about just under 2%, with Japan and Germany leading. But both of those countries slowed down as well. Partly there are some uncertainties there too with respect to German reunification, and of course Japanese financial markets being quite high-levered and of course having experienced a significant downturn in late 1990. There are some uncertainties, but that basically does not change the story of slower growth in the rest of the world.

Slide 6 basically gives you a visual on the outlook that Bob presented for Ontario and of course for Canada. We are expecting the economy to begin a modest recovery by the middle of the year. The recession is hitting central Canada the worst in the country, mainly because manufacturing is in a recession and has been in a recession since the spring of 1989. We will talk about that a bit later in this presentation. Of course, we have had this much sharper correction both in sales and in prices in the Toronto housing market. That is basically because there is a drag in central Canada much lower than in the rest of the country.

Slide 7 just gives you some sort of comparison of this recession versus the previous one, 1981-82, and the recovery period that will ensue from this recession compared to the one that occurred after the 1981-82 recession. The story really is that we essentially expect this recession to be much milder than the one in 1981-82, with the risks that Bob mentioned earlier. There is a lot of uncertainty, both with respect to oil prices and the duration of this war, and that could basically mean a longer recession and a delayed recovery. Notwithstanding those caveats, at this point we are seeing a milder recession, but by the same token a much more modest recovery: 2.9% average annual growth in the 1992-94 period compared to over 5% over the 1983-89 period. That is basically because, as Bob mentioned, we have higher interest rates through the forecast period, a higher dollar and, of course, adjustments related to the free trade agreement and the GST.

The next slide takes you to housing starts, 1989-91, and you can see that there is a significant decline in 1990 that we have just experienced in actual housing starts. It says "estimate," but we just got the actual this morning for December and therefore for the year. The actual was 62.6 or 62,600 starts for 1990, a sharp drop from the 1989 number, and we are saying that 1991, this year, will also see a further drop. Basically, we have the same things: the high interest rates, the very large inventory, especially of condominiums, price declines and the reversal of inter-provincial migration that helped in the late 1980s to boost housing. In addition, GST will obviously discourage new home construction as well as resale activity, so we are seeing 54,000 starts in 1991.

Slide 9 gives you the forecast for real business investment both in machinery and equipment and in plant construction. In both elements we are seeing declines both in 1990 and 1991. Why? We have enumerated reasons there. We have obviously got a significantly lower corporate profit. We have a very weak economy and demand growing very weakly. We have a lot of excess capacity and nobody is going to be that tempted to put in extra capacity. We have the continuation of high interest rates, which means that it is very discouraging to put in new plants and equipment. In addition, we have very high commercial vacancy rates, and that is going to affect negatively or adversely commercial construction.

The next slide looks at the export-import sector of the Ontario economy. The dark chart is the exports, the light one is the imports. In 1990, at least in the first half of the year, we had a substantial trade surplus going, and that was because we had a lot of machinery equipment exports to the United States related to a business investment boom that was going on there. We had auto exports going quite strongly. That was in the first half of the year. It slowed significantly in the second half.

Of course, this year we are seeing a sharp reduction in exports growth, basically the 0.6, very little growth. That is because the US is in a recession. Obviously, with a more severe downturn in the US, we could have a decline in exports. Imports fell last year 1.6%. We are seeing no change in imports in 1991, basically because our economy will be very weak. Consumer spending will be weak, business investment north of the border will be very weak and that just will not pull in a lot of imports.

The next slide looks at the Ontario and Canadian inflation rates, and you can see from the chart—the light bar is Ontario, the dark is Canadian—in both 1989 and 1990 the Ontario rate was higher than the Canadian, in 1990 just marginal, but in 1991 we expect the Ontario rate to be lower than the national rate. On the other hand, both of them are going to be higher than 1990, 6% plus, and that is primarily because of the GST. Without the GST, we think actually inflation would have fallen slightly in 1991.

In addition, of course, we have got the oil price uncertainty. On the one hand, if we get a very short war—and this was the question referred to earlier—we could of course get lower oil prices and that would dampen inflation. On the other hand, a six-month or longer war as opposed to a six-week war would actually most probably lead to high oil prices and boost inflation. At this point we are sort of in a base case kind of way, if you like, if we have a short war in terms of what is built in here, but none the less there is some uncertainty about that.

The reason we will have lower inflation than nationally is because we have a much weaker economy and, of course, because the government has decided not to put RST on GST, which reduces provincial inflation by about one tenth to two tenths of a percentage point, so that helps keep the relative differential in Ontario's favour.

On the unemployment side, the next slide, we have got the unemployment rate already risen in 1990, as you had referred to earlier, a 6.3% average for 1990, and we have got it going up another percentage point in 1991 with total employment remaining static, not changing at all on an average for the year. That, as Bob pointed out, would mean that there will be some resumption. Just as the economy recovers by midyear, there will be some resumption of employment growth by midyear as well, so that for the year as a whole it will mean no change in employment.

You have got unemployment rate averaging 7.3% and, as Bob pointed out, we have ended last year with 7.8%. That is the number that came out after we had finished this forecast here, so in a sense we think that that is going to be reasonably on track. None the less, if we have got a much weaker economy, a lot more loss of confidence, that is going to push the recovery and therefore keep that unemployment rate quite high through this year.

The last slide I have before handing it over is the oil price slide that we have got. What this does is give you some idea of what will happen if oil prices remain high, in this case a $10 increase in the price of oil. You can see its extremely adverse impact on the Ontario economy. We are an oil importer, and it is like a tax being imposed on us by foreign countries essentially. It is adding $2 billion to our oil bill. It really undermines personal income and therefore consumption.

Obviously it has a very negative impact on consumer confidence and business investment in Ontario; not energy investment but business investment in Ontario. To some extent it raises the interest rates worldwide and that affects our trading partners and subsequently us as well in a second-round effect, if you like. Partly the Canadian dollar is seen as a bit of a petrocurrency, because we have provinces that are affected very beneficially by high oil prices. As you have observed in the last little while, the Canadian dollar does benefit when the expectations of oil prices rise, but unfortunately that for Ontario is not very good initially and again undermines growth.

Basically, we are saying that if oil prices rose $10 as a result of a long, protracted war, that would be another sort of double whammy, if you like, for the Ontario economy. On the other hand, the reverse is true in some sense. It is not entirely symmetrical, but to some extent oil prices fell recently and they are now just under $20. I do not know if they would fall to $10 a barrel, but if they at least fell to $18 or $15, that would be beneficial, but not entirely symmetrically because it does take a bit of time. Confidence gets eroded much more rapidly than confidence gets built up. So it would have a beneficial impact, but would not be, as I said, symmetrical.

If there are no questions at this point, I will hand over to my colleague David Trick and he will talk about the labour markets.

Mr Trick: What I would like to do in the next few pages is look specifically at the employment situation over the last couple of years. What the graphs on these several pages normally do is show the situation since 1989 and then, for comparison and as a historical benchmark, show the situation during the 1981-83 recession. In general, as Qaid noted, we are expecting that this particular recession will be somewhat less severe than the last one. At the same time, you will see on every graph that the numbers are certainly not great cause for optimism.

Having said that, then you start on page 14. Page 14 shows the overall employment situation in the province. Just as an explanation of how this graph is set up, the employment for August 1989 is set equal to 100 and is shown in the dotted line on this graph, and then the employment for August 1981 is also set equal to 100 and is shown as the solid black line.

One thing I should point out about most of these graphs is that the employment data are not seasonally adjusted so you will see the pattern of summer and winter there. In general, you lose about 200,000 jobs between summer and winter in Ontario just because of things like tourism, agriculture and construction, which are all highly seasonal industries. With that in mind, clearly the pattern on this graph is first of all that employment during the present recession is lower than it was at its peak, which was August 1989.

Second, it is not quite as severe a situation as we had in the previous recession. As Qaid was saying, we are expecting employment as a whole to be fairly static between this year and last year, so the prognosis will be that the line for 1991 will neither be much higher nor much lower than what you see here for 1990.

Mrs Sullivan: I would like to look at the graph in a little bit more depth. On the bottom, what are the years? I gather that what you have done is go to a base of 100 to compare these graphs, one of which is a 1989 base year of 100 and one a 1981 base year of 100.

Mr Trick: That is correct. If you see along the left-hand axis there, August 1981 equals 100 for the solid black line and August 1989 equals 100 for the dotted line. Along the bottom for the dotted lines, the years are August 1989 going through to 1990. There is no line shown for 1991 yet. For the solid black line, it starts in August 1981 and goes through April 1984. The point is simply to try to compare the progress of this recession compared to the last recession.

Mr B. Ward: The graph lumps all the jobs, does it not?

Mr Trick: That is correct.

Mr B. Ward: Is it possible that we could differentiate between manufacturing jobs and service sector jobs? Is that a possibility?

Mr Trick: Yes. A few pages along, there is a breakdown just like that.

Mr B. Ward: We should not be asking any questions, because you have everything covered.

Mr Trick: That is quite all right. I am always glad if there is a question we might have answered.

Just turning to page 15, we show a similar set of data with respect to the unemployment rate. As Qaid said, the prognosis for the coming year is that the unemployment rate will be roughly 7.3%, so it does not go terribly much higher than where you see the end of the line now for 1989-90. By comparison, in the last recession we did get up to about 12% at one point. Again, there is some indication that the severity is not quite as great, although clearly the situation is not optimal.

Just as a matter of background, we are going to go through several slides that show the impact of a recession on men over the age of 25, women over the age of 25 and youth aged 15 to 24. One of the things you have to keep in mind is the change in the demographic structure of the province over the past 10 years. During the last recession, much of the baby boom was still entering the labour force and consequently we had quite a substantial rise in the youth unemployment rate in the last recession.

The Chair: The chart on page 15 indicates that the unemployment rate seasonally adjusted at 7% was reached in October. You are making the assumption that the recessions are starting, are you not, in the same time frame, in the same quarter, or at the same rate?

Mr Trick: Why do we pick those two as the base?

The Chair: Let me just finish my question. The question is that given that you have started with 1981-83 recession at 6.5%—you have that line—and we have just passed that now, how do we know that this is parallel or co-ordinating? How do we know that we are not at the beginning of the upsurge where the graph starts to peak?

Mr Trick: There are two or three different questions there. Let me start with the question of why was it higher in early 1981 as compared to early 1989. Essentially that was the demographic fact that you had so many young people in the labour market at that time. We went through a long period of roughly a decade when unemployment rates were substantially higher than what they had been previously or what we experienced, say, during the late stages of the expansion in 1987, 1988, 1989.

For this whole decade from roughly 1975 to 1985, unemployment rates tended to be higher than historical average because there were so many young people trying to enter the labour market at the same time. Essentially your question is how do we know that 1991 will not be worse than 1990 and then 1992 worse than 1991. The forecast which Qaid presented is not based on just this kind of graph. The forecast is based on looking at the actual situation in the economy as of the last few months and the expectation for it.

The purpose of this graph is not to show that this is how we do a forecast, but just to show the severity of the two situations.

On page 16, to reiterate the point I guess I just made, the number of young people in the labour market has tapered off somewhat since the early 1980s. Meanwhile, there has been a substantial rise in both men and women over the age of 25 in the labour market. Partly that is because baby-boomers are now between the ages of roughly 25 and 45 and partly it is because of the higher participation rates of women in the job market.

Mr Phillips: What do you expect the labour force to grow by next year? How many people roughly?

Mr Silk: I have it at 1.3%. I can tell you in a minute how many people that is.

Mr Phillips: Maybe 60,000 or something like that?

Mr Silk: Some 66,000.

Mr Phillips: So that is the number of jobs you create?

Mr Silk: That is right.

Mr Phillips: To keep the unemployment rate the same.

Dr Christie: To keep the number of unemployed the same, which would be pretty close.

Mr Trick: On page 17 we show a breakdown between the experiences of men and women during both recessions. If we start with the chart at the top for males, we see that the number of males employed at this point is about 93% of the number employed in August 1989. This shows somewhat less severity than in the previous recession. At the worst point of the previous recession we had 85% as many males employed at the bottom as we did at the top. If we look at the graph for females we see a somewhat different experience. For a number of reasons which we will go into in a minute, females have been so far not as severely affected as males in terms of job loss. Right now roughly 99% as many women are employed today as were employed at the peak employment level of August 1989. That was true of the earlier recession as well.

On page 18, we show the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate by age and by sex. The first group that is typically affected by a rise in unemployment is youth under the age of 25. Typically they have the least seniority, they are often in the least stable jobs, part-time jobs and so on. In both recessions they were the first group to have their unemployment rate rise. The rise, at least so far in this recession, has been nowhere near as great as in the preceding one because of the demographic reason I mentioned.

For men and women over the age of 25, it is only in the last two or three months that their unemployment rate has started to rise in any substantial way. Prior to that it was relatively flat, as you can see on the graph.

On page 19, we show unemployment rates for men and women respectively. Typically, during periods of expansion the male unemployment rate is somewhat lower than the female rate. During periods of recession you tend to see the reverse. Certainly in the last recession the male unemployment rate was higher. In recent months it has crossed over again; the male rate is now higher than the female rate after having been lower for much of the period of expansion.

On page 20 we see some of the same trends, except shown for employment rather than unemployment. For both men and women over the age of 25, it is only in the past few months that you see much of a dropoff at all. So far, as I say, most of the effect of job loss has been on young men and women under the age of 25.

Mr Phillips: Although that is the average job. I think in the last 12 months 116,000 males have lost their full-time jobs.

Mr Trick: I would have to look up the number. That would not surprise me. That would probably include all age groups.

Mr Phillips: Yes. Let's just say if you took the end of December as opposed to your average.

Mr Trick: On page 21 we show the breakdown for young men and young women. Both of them have dropped off fairly substantially over the last year and a half. The dropoff for young males has been somewhat more substantial than for females, but it is clear they are both on a negative path.

On page 22, to return to the question I was asked earlier, we see a breakdown by service sector versus goods sector. You see quite a substantial difference in the two patterns. In both recessions it is typically the goods sector where you see the most job loss. The service sector actually has grown slightly in both recessions. Because 84% of women work in the service sector, they are somewhat less affected by recessions than are males; then, during a recovery the opposite happens in that males typically pick up most of the jobs during a recovery and expansion.

Mr Phillips: You include full- and part-time jobs in your numbers, do you not?

Dr Christie: That is right. Just before we leave that page, I should mention that there is an appendix to this presentation which goes into far greater detail than you perhaps care to hear on the demographic and age and sex breakdown of the employment experience of this recession. We are not going to go through those graphs one by one, but I will just point out to you that they exist.

Mr Phillips: What percentage of the gross domestic product do the two sectors produce, the service and the goods?

Mr Silk: The service sector is about 70%, and the goods, including manufacturing, is about 30%.

Dr Christie: I think John Hoicka has these numbers in detail. Manufacturing tends to be 24% to 25%; agriculture and the primary sector have the rest. We can get the exact numbers for you.

Mr Fletcher: As far as the service sector jobs are concerned, you do not differentiate between the public service and the private service sectors?

Mr Trick: No, these are both included in those data.

Mr Fletcher: You cannot tell me, then, if over the last four or five years or in the last recession whether government has been spending more money by hiring more people through job creation employment programs or whether it has been the private sector that has been carrying it?

Mr Trick: I do not have those numbers with me. We can certainly try to find them for you.

Mr Fletcher: I would not mind finding out.

Mr Jamison: What you are saying, for my own clarification, is that the service sector has grown significantly between the last recession and this recession and the goods sector has correspondingly shrunk?

Mr Trick: The number of people employed in the goods sector has been roughly constant for the last 10 years if you leave out cyclical variations. There has been no particular expansion in employment in goods production. Most of the net expansion in employment over that period has been the services.

Mr Phillips: The numbers I have seen on manufacturing are that we have 10% fewer jobs today than we had 12 months ago in manufacturing. Is that right?

Mr Trick: Yes.

Mr Hansen: With the loss of manufacturing jobs, there might be an increase of service jobs but looking on into 1991 it could possibly catch up that these manufacturing jobs we have lost, where people are not working, could affect the service industry also. Is that a good indication here, reduction in services?

Mr Trick: There are a couple of different factors. One is that as you lose manufacturing jobs you do lose some of the momentum of the economy. We have taken that into account in producing the forecast for the coming year. As mentioned earlier, the forecast for the economy as a whole is roughly stable in employment, so that is factored into our overall forecast.

Mr Hansen: One thing I see is that when we are talking about layoffs in 1989 and 1990 we are talking about loss of jobs going to the United States, which is quite a bit different. So when we talk about this turnaround in the economy, we are going to wind up not having these jobs rejuvenated. They are not layoffs; they are actually plant shutdowns. So I think there is going to be quite a bit of difference between the 1981 and the 1991 comeback.

Mr Trick: That is certainly consistent with our own forecast. We think the recovery will be somewhat slower than it was in 1983-84. You are making exactly the point I would make about this graph on page 23, that even though the overall number of layoffs does not yet match what we saw in 1982, the number of complete closures is quite substantially higher than in 1982, and those are workers who are not going to be recalled. So you are right.

Mr Fletcher: On page 23, could we have in some way a correlation between the job loss in Ontario compared to the job increase in some areas of the US? I would like to see if there is a correlation. Is that possible?

Mr Trick: We could certainly find those numbers for you. I do not have them with me. If there are no further questions, John Hoicka, who is senior policy adviser in sectoral and regional policy branch, will cover the next section.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to turn back to page 23. The complete closures and cutbacks: when you gather your statistics, do you have a cutoff of number of employees who would be included in this stat? What would that number be? It is probably in the background, but I will ask anyway.

Mr Trick: Actually, it is not. Under Ontario legislation, the Ministry of Labour has to be informed if you intend to lay off 50 or more workers, so these data cover only the 50-plus category, the definition of major layoffs.

Mr Christopherson: Just to take that question to the next step, how much difference would it make if the calculations that are not included were? Do you have any sense that it would change things at all?

Mr Trick: The residual would be the difference between the 31,000 reported as layoffs and a net job loss reported in the same period of roughly 120,000 jobs. So you would have quite a substantial number of workers working in smaller plants who are laid off, say, two by two, 10 by 10, who are not reported in these data.

Mr Christopherson: But you would not know whether those people were temporarily laid off or whether the jobs were eliminated?

Mr Trick: I do not think there is any obvious way of knowing that. I will have to think about that question, but I do not think there is any way of knowing.

Mrs Sullivan: I have before me a clipping from the Toronto Star, 16 January, talking about shutdowns claiming 20,554 jobs. This is from Ontario Ministry of Labour statistical data. Where would those figures fit into this chart?

Mr Hoicka: Maybe I could respond to that. The original data from the Ministry of Labour actually break that 31,007 into three parts, and this particular graph simply shows two of them. The full layoffs were 15,339. In addition, that cross-hatched area includes partial but permanent layoffs, and that figure is approximately 5,000 in 1990. It just happened that we took the two-part split rather than the three-part split, but it would not be difficult to provide the committee with their data. That reinforces the conclusion, if you think about partial closures. The 5,000 in 1990, I am fairly certain, is larger than the comparable figure in 1982.

Mr Jamison: You are talking complete closures in the figure of 15,000?

Mr Hoicka: That is correct.

Mr Jamison: The other figure you are including is permanent layoffs but the plants are not closing, it is new technology or whatever.

Mr Hoicka: That is correct. They might be closing down a line. There would be another 5,000, but they would be included in that cross-hatched area.

Mr Phillips: The essence of your presentation is that you are betting we are coming out of this in another six months, and that is why you have picked the dates and what not. If you put another view on it, just looking at the numbers, I see that it is about 165,000 or 170,000 full-time jobs lower at the end of December, offset by about a 47,000 increase in part-time, which kind of masks the numbers, in manufacturing. You think it is 24% of the gross domestic product; I thought more like 35% of the gross domestic product was manufacturing. Its number of jobs is down by, I guess, 110,000. I guess Treasury feels we should not feel as pessimistic about the end of December numbers because its belief is that by the middle of the calendar year we will be heading out of the recession.

Dr Christie: That is an apt summary of the forecast that was presented in early December. As I think we indicated at the beginning of our discussion, there have been a number of events that would lead us to be perhaps not as bullish, if essentially no growth can be described as bullish. There are a number of downsides to that forecast that I think we have described, which might go some distance to rationalizing the difference of views you appear to be referring to.

Mr Phillips: As the Chairman said, it depends on where you put your time, whether those graphs are below the 1982 numbers substantially or whether there is any feeling they may continue to rise.

Dr Christie: The graphs we have shown have attempted to match up, for example, the first year of recession or first quarter of recession. We know that the recession began in Ontario in the second quarter of 1990 and we have attempted to match that to the corresponding quarter of the 1981-82 recession. What we have tried to do is match beginning with beginning. As we indicated earlier, we are not trying to identify the end to the month, but we are trying to give the committee a sense of how—as it has unfolded so far compared to 1981-82 at the same relative point—it is faring to date.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to follow up on that same point. You have done your projections and you assume that by midyear we will be pulling out of the recession, but you have also qualified that depending on certain things happening. It is possible that the figures, not only on the major layoffs but all the figures, could be going up in 1991 so that 1990 is not the peak; it could be 1991 if things get worse.

Dr Christie: The peaks, for example, for the unemployment rate? That is certainly possible.

Mr Silk: Actually, in our projections, we have an average unemployment rate for 1990 of 6.3%, which we have just seen the past year. We are basically saying that is not the end; in 1991 we are going to have an average of one percentage point more, 7.3%. In fact, December ended at 7.8%. We are not saying that the worst on the unemployment rate is anywhere behind us.

Mr Kwinter: That is the point I was trying to make, that because of the way all of your projections are, you show 1982 as the peak of the negative stuff. When you look at this you see 1990, and it gives the impression that 1990 is the peak in this recession and that things will only get better, as they did in 1983, 1984 and 1985, but that is not necessarily so.

Dr Christie: If those graphs have been interpreted to suggest that, they were not intended to suggest that. They were only intended to suggest how things have progressed to date. We have not tried to give a month-by-month forecast of, for example, the unemployment rate or jobs in manufacturing. We are trying to show how the recession has developed compared to the 1981-82 experience, and it is certainly possible that those lines relating to this current recession could continue to deteriorate, in fact, given our forecast of a recovery not beginning until the middle of 1991, would be expected to continue to deteriorate through at least the first half of this year.

Mr Silk: Our forecast basically is saying, yes, at present we are not out of the woods, that in fact the recovery will not occur before midyear. So if you are asking us in January 1991, "Is there more bad news to come?" I suppose we would have to say, "Yes, our forecast does acknowledge that." For 1991 as a whole, the forecast we presented in December was that we will see, because of a resumption of growth by midyear and because of some antirecessionary measures taken by the government in December, some resumption and therefore the average for the year would be 0.5% growth. But that is an average for the year. We are not trying to hide the fact that for the next little while things will not turn around.

I could at this point give some information on the 35% you were referring to earlier, Mr Phillips. The 35% you referred to is basically the goods-producing sector. You are quite right, it is 35%. However manufacturing itself is 24% of the economy; construction is 6%; utilities are 2.5%; mining, 1%; agriculture, forestry and fishing, just under 2%. That makes up the goods-producing sector. In the services, I was wrong; it is not 70%, it is 65%, if that answers your question.

Mr Stockwell: These are the same figures basically or the same forecast that the Treasurer was looking at in the announcement in December. He sounded a lot more confident than you do now with respect to your projections and when we will be out of this recession and so on. It seems that you are a little less confident this month than you were last and maybe the month before that, and I can understand that.

You are calling for a 0.5% increase in real growth for 1991. Considering the $1 billion—the $700 million plus the $300 million—dumped into the economy, if you did not have that, in fact there would be negative growth. So in fact we would be in full force, right involved in a major recession. There would be negative growth in Ontario to the tune of something just marginally below, but definite negative growth.

The second question is, where are the revenue projections? Are they coming forward at a later date or what? I suppose as a committee we are going to ask you to comment or make recommendations on a budget process and we kind of get half an equation here. I have flipped through as best I can. I cannot find any revenue projections. Were they not here on purpose?

Dr Christie: With respect to the first point, you are absolutely right. That is in fact what the forecast would be were the antirecession activities not there. The forecast for next year would have been for a small negative number. With respect to the revenue figures, we do not have those. We were here to describe for you what we see to be the economic outlook and we will relay your interest in the revenue side to our colleagues.

Mr Stockwell: When we requested their attendance we specified that we did not want any revenue projections.

I assume that when you look at economic forecasts and growth and negative growth—

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, if you were to refer to table 1—I think you have a package—they have projections, current outlook for 1990-91.

Mr Stockwell: You are standing by those projections then.

Dr Christie: For the current fiscal year?

Mr Stockwell: No, no, the projections for 1991.

Dr Christie: For fiscal 1990-91, which is the current fiscal year.

Mr Stockwell: No, no, 1991-92, the next fiscal year.

Dr Christie: The projections referred to were revenue projections for fiscal year 1990-91.

Dr Christie: Ending March 1991. That is correct.

Mr Stockwell: So we do not have any projections for the next fiscal year.

Dr Christie: There have been no projections for fiscal 1991-92.

Mr Stockwell: Then correct me if I am wrong. Did you not say last year that our revenue projections generally run at 90% of gross domestic product?

Dr Christie: The rule of thumb that we use that has been described to this committee before is that the growth rate in base revenue tends to go at about 90% of the growth rate of GDP.

Mr Stockwell: With that rule of thumb, you are saying Treasury has not put any revenue projections together.

Dr Christie: We have not brought revenue projections today. We have come to, again, as I said, discuss the economic outlook. I am not aware that any specific revenue projections have been tabled before with the committee, although we have talked in general terms about the direction of the revenue.

Mr Stockwell: Sorry, Mr Chairman. I was under the understanding that we were receiving those as well. I thought revenue projections were part of it. It is really looking at one side of the equation if we are just going to look at this. How can we make serious recommendations when we have no revenue projections?

The Chair: I would suggest that those numbers be sent to us as soon as they have been compiled. Is there any projected time frame within which they would be compiled?

Dr Christie: We would have to get back to the committee on that, Mr Chairman.

Mr Stockwell: They have to be compiled by now.

Mr Jamison: I may be wrong, but I would imagine that the spring budget would have a bearing on what the income of the province would be. It might be pretty hard to project at this point since the budget is being worked on and this is part of the process leading up to it.

Mr Phillips: What are the latest estimates? This document is now three or four months old. What are revenues and expenditures, for this year, just to get an idea of where we actually are going to end up at the end of the year?

Dr Christie: I think the next scheduled release of that update would be for 31 December and that normally comes towards the end of January, so that should become available in the next few weeks.

Mr Phillips: I gather we will write a pre-budget report. I forgot what you said about whether the committee will have any estimate, to help us on our pre-budget work, of what the revenues will be for the next fiscal year.

Dr Christie: The next fiscal year? We will have to get back to the committee on that, along with a number of other matters.

Mr Phillips: That is good. So by the end of this, when our committee finishes hearings, we will know at least as of the end of December what will be the revenue and expenditures for this fiscal year and some ballpark for next fiscal year, I guess.

The Chair: If they can send us some numbers by the end of the month, then at least we would have some projection of what the revenue was going to be.

Mr Stockwell: It is farcical to go through this process without revenue projections. What a colossal waste of time.

The Chair: I will consider those comments and give you comments back a little later.

Mr Sterling: You seem to compare a lot of the various economic indicators with the 1981-82 recession. I was wondering whether or not you had done any analysis on the debt situation with the Ontario government and the overall debt situation of the Ontario taxpayer in terms of the ability of the government or the advisability of the government to go to a larger deficit during a period of recession. Have you done any analysis in that way, for instance, of per capita debt of the average Ontario resident in 1981-82? How much space was there then for governments to basically spend their way out of a recession, as opposed to today?

Dr Christie: The basic debt figures that we have looked at are the ones that, for example, are published in the budget each year. On a per capita basis, certainly debt is higher now than it was in 1980 or 1981, but I believe I am correct—and we are looking for the exact figures—that, for example, the total provincial debt as a percentage of gross domestic product is significantly lower now than it was in 1981. In terms of how that relates to any particular deficit level or the economic stimulus that relates from any particular deficit level, no we have not looked at that, but we are certainly aware of the relative debt position between the two periods.

Mr B. Ward: I have a point of order. Not to dampen the enthusiasm for the questioning, etc, they are all very valid questions, it seems to me we are getting a little bit off the topic of the report here. We were talking about major payoffs and then I believe moving into net farm income, etc. My suggestion would be that we try to plow through this report. Then any valid questions outside of this report could be asked at the end of that discussion.

The Chair: You have moved in the direction of my thoughts, Mr Ward. Do you have one quick question to wrap this up?

Mr Sterling: What is the deficit right now?

Dr Christie: The deficit noted in the last Ontario Finances was just somewhat shy of $2.5 billion.

Mr Sterling: I said now, though; today.

Dr Christie: The last official statement is that—

Mr Sterling: I did not ask you for the official statement. I asked you what it is.

Dr Christie: That is the most recent figure I have available, sir.

Mr Sterling: So you will not tell me?

Dr Christie: That is the most recent figure I have available, sir.

Mr Christopherson: On a point similar to Mr Ward's, unless I misunderstand, the questions being asked are talking about the Ontario budget, while the briefing we are receiving is on the Ontario economy, which are two different things.

The Chair: Maybe we should proceed with the presentation. John, I think you are up next.

Mr Hoicka: Okay. This is the sectoral situation and outlook. What I have done here is simply pick a number of key industries to briefly describe current history and at least a qualitative outlook for 1991 and the next couple of years.

Page 24 is a chart which indicates net farm income in Ontario. The dotted line indicates net farm income without government payments. As the decline makes clear, those figures reached a peak in 1986 and, for practical purposes, have been declining since that time period. They went up slightly in 1990, but at this point they are expected to decline somewhat in 1991.

The bold line gives the total farm income, and then the difference between the two lines indicates the net government payouts. In Ontario in 1990, those net government payouts were about 44% of net farm income, up from 23% in 1978 and 35% in 1982. By comparison, for the country as a whole, payouts were 65%, so Ontario farmers received a smaller percentage payout than farmers across the country. In large part that reflects large payouts for grains, so you will see quite substantial federal payments in Saskatchewan, for example. Those figures are much higher than 65% in Saskatchewan.

Mrs Sullivan: On the government payouts, I assume these include both subsidies and support payments as they have been discussed through GATT. Do they include things like tax expenditures such as the interest rate reduction programs? Would that be included in the government payouts?

Mr Hoicka: I think they would include that if it is directly received by farmers. I am not certain, for example, about the Ontario family farm interest rate reduction program payments. For example, the farm tax reduction program would be in there—it is a direct payment—tripartite stabilization payouts and those types of payments.

Mrs Sullivan: Crop insurance?

Mr Hoicka: Crop insurance would be in there.

Going from the net farm income, on page 25, the gross cash receipts of course are much larger. This is a basic outlook. The largest sector is the red meat sector, with approximately 30% of total farm cash receipts. We see that slightly improved in 1991 compared to 1990, with cattle production stabilizing and some modest increase in hog production.

The second large group is the supply management sector. We see a mixed set of results there. Dairy quotas are falling at the moment due to excess butterfat production. Chicken production is increasing slightly. That is to some extent being limited by higher imports under the free trade agreement. Demand for table eggs is declining. We think grain and oil seed prices have probably bottomed out, or close to bottomed out, for now and that there will probably be, depending on the weather obviously, a small degree of quantity increase.

The larger group is the pulp and paper group. That certainly has been deteriorating over at least the past year. Prices have dropped, particularly newsprint prices. Profits have dropped very substantially. We are seeing mills taking more time for downtime, inventory control and so forth. That looks like it will continue through 1991 and may take until some time in 1992 to see significant changes in turnaround in that industry.

Lumber and other wood products are of course heavily concentrated in northern Ontario. They are suffering from a whole range of difficulties: the drop in residential construction, low prices nationally and internationally, the export tax and of course a strong dollar, which inhibits exports.

To date, at least through October, sawmill production was down only 5% on a year-over-year basis in Ontario, but there have been significant increases in layoffs since then, so we anticipate that production data will likewise show worse results as we get into the new year. We expect to see some improvement by 1992 as housing starts increase, but there remain medium-term and perhaps long-term difficulties, because we do not see the same kind of increase in housing starts as we have had in the past.

The mining industry: Currently nickel, gold, copper, zinc and uranium are the most important minerals. If you compare it to the situation 10 years ago, gold of course has increased rapidly in importance while uranium and iron ore declined significantly. Through the decade, mining employment dropped by 6,000, principally in nickel, copper, iron ore and uranium. For 1991, we see essentially stable output. Nickel prices remain above break-even cost, so we see no decline, perhaps a small increase, in nickel output. We have had some very substantial increases in gold production over past years, perhaps minor increases in 1991, but we are coming to the end of the major increases. Iron ore and uranium output of course will be down due to closures.

The Chair: I have a question. Mining employment fell by 6,166 from 1979 to 1989. Do you have any indication in what years that decline was the most rapid?

Mr Hoicka: That would have been about 1981-82. In Sudbury, both Inco and Falconbridge very substantially reduced employment about that time. I do not have the figures in front of me. There would have been a modest decrease as well on net in 1990 because the iron ore mines closed down, uranium had some substantial layoffs and there was some reduction in mining exploration, so there would have been a much smaller decrease relative to 1981-82. Those would have been the key time periods for employment drops.

The Chair: Is there any statistical correlation between the rise in value of the Canadian dollar and the decline in the export market? Would that impact on the rising unemployment?

Mr Hoicka: It might be difficult to find a statistical correlation, I think. At the time the nickel layoffs took place, 1981-82, the Canadian dollar was relatively low, but mining prices were very low at that time period, so the problem is that the dollar plays a role but obviously the price of the product plays a much larger role. So I do not think, if we just correlate it against the dollar, it would be that obvious. One thing that is quite clear is that if the dollar goes up it creates pressures on the industry because its prices are in US terms, and profits, for example, will get squeezed with a high dollar, but then you would have to go back to the price equation.

Mr B. Ward: In discussion with the industry, recognizing we are predicting or calculating that the current recession will end and then slowly climb out of it, is there a feeling in the industry that where the decline in unemployment levels will trough out that we can anticipate—well, it is as steep as it was in 1982-83. Do you have any feeling on where it will stop? Have we reached as low as we are going to go or is it unpredictable?

Mr Hoicka: I think the mining industry is always a little bit unpredictable, so I do not think anybody could give the Canadian people a strong answer to that. I think the key employers, first of all nickel—as a matter of fact, over the past year or so Inco has actually hired small numbers of people so they seem to have gotten to a relatively stable situation. I am not sure that their net employment went up, but the idea that they actually put out a job-wanted ad was pretty unusual.

Gold production has been increasing in large part because we have been opening up a number of new mines in Ontario. There have been well over a dozen new mines, and I think the issue there is simply the fact that they are probably not going to continue to open mines. The price of gold is still high enough that almost all the mines in Ontario are profitable at the current price. With the nickel, I think, the same situation; prices are a lot lower than they have been, but they are fairly reasonable. I think in the other sectors to some extent that is the same situation.

Of course there are mines that exist which at some time or another will come to the end of their useful life, and that is a very difficult thing to predict; but at the moment I think the industry would be concentrating on a much smaller issue than overall employment, and that is the situation with exploration. There has been a significant decline in exploration, among other things because with prices no longer as attractive as they were and the cost of capital remaining quite high, it is difficult to sink a lot of investment into that end. But that employment may or may not have dropped to the bottom. It is not large compared to the total, but it represents a perception about the future.

On page 28 is a graph which describes what has happened to manufacturing employment in the past decade, and I think the first key point is that the previous peak in 1981, we never quite regained that peak. There are two further peaks in the graph towards the right end of the graph which are actually slightly lower than the peak in 1981. During that time period between the one peak and the next peak we had an increase of about 30% in output, so that was a very substantial increase in productivity.

Now what we have seen, though, in the past just over a year, is a very substantial decline in manufacturing employment. The peak to trough in the current situation is about 1,076,000 employees down to 907,000 as of December data. That compares to 1,079,000 in the previous recession going down to 873,000, so it has not been quite as steep yet but it is quite possible that we will equal or exceed the decline in employment.

As part of that decline, as noted earlier, there has been a higher proportion of permanent layoffs. So I think it is quite clear that the manufacturing sector has seen significant pressures to date and there may yet be some pressures.

Mrs Sullivan: I would like to follow through, say, in comparing the periods from the peaks and the productivity gains that were made over the period of five years between 1982 and 1987 and then the year 1989. When we are looking at the valleys and looking at I believe the third quarter of 1990 and the third quarter of 1982, what do you see, the comparative outputs during those periods, those periods of decline?

Mr Hoicka: I would have to check the details, but it would be at least between the trough we had then and the current low point. Taking into account that there is probably a difference in months, it would still be at least a 30% increase and probably more than a 30% increase in real output.

Mrs Sullivan: So in that case, then, some of these employment declines in the manufacturing sector are probably technology-based as much as simply plants closed down due to competition or the effects of free trade or whatever.

Mr Hoicka: I think it would be easier to see the time period of the recovery, say, from 1984 to 1989 as demonstrating the effects of productivity. I think the speed with which jobs have dropped between the beginning of 1989 and now, you would be hard put to show that that in itself related to that rapid technological change. There is no question but that during the decade there has been quite substantial technological change and there has been substantial increase in productivity. There are a number of other supporting data, like better control over inventories and a whole series of ancillary data that suggest that technology has played a substantial role in the manufacturing industry in the 1980s, but I would not show this particular decline as—

Mrs Sullivan: It would simply be one factor. Do you have figures of what portion changes in the way of doing things, whether it is the introduction of technology or whether it is just-in-time delivery or whatever, would contribute to declining employment in this sector?

Mr Hoicka: The studies we have done suggest that technological change in the past period of time would give about 2% real growth per year in manufacturing, seems to have been giving that kind of a boost. I think the real problem since 1989 is that we have gotten and continue to get the productivity boost, but if you do not have increased sales then you have a tough decision to make. So I would point to the fact that shipments have not been increasing and in fact now have declined in the latter part of 1990 forcing a resolution of that problem.

Mr Phillips: What qualitative conclusions should we draw from Treasury as we see those kinds of declines? On the surface, I look at it and say 10% of the manufacturing jobs are gone and that looks like it is a significant concern. But, for example, what percentage of our exports does manufacturing represent, and is this going to mean some decline in our export business? What should we take out of that decline?

Mr Hoicka: I think this is much more a job issue than it is an export issue or even perhaps a production issue once the recession is over. I think that manufacturers have been quicker to cut back operations now that they see as unprofitable or low productivity but they have not necessarily cut back substantially in their ability to recover. That obviously would depend on the individual firm.

I think what this chart suggests is that if the previous recession repeated itself, we would have within a couple of years a rebound in employment. I think the question we have is whether with more permanent layoffs that rebound employment will be as strong as it was after the previous recession. However, I do think there is substantial opportunity to have a rebound in the output side.

Mr Phillips: What per cent of our exports would be manufacturing?

Mr Hoicka: About 85% or 90%, probably. It would be a very large percentage.

Dr Christie: We will get precise numbers on that, but that is about the range.

Mr Phillips: In theory, the cliché is, you had better be able to trade globally if you want to survive, and if manufacturing is 80% of our exports, in theory that is what we are trading, although that strikes me as high because of the resource sector.

Mr Hoicka: Oh, yes, sorry, I misspoke myself. I was thinking of the goods sector. I have to rethink it. It might be more like 65% or 70% in Ontario.

Mr Fletcher: When I am looking at the graph I see the Canadian one is like someone's heartbeat that is rather erratic. Yet the United States one, other than the big dip, is rather constant and it does not seem to have the same fluctuations. Is that due to the fact that they are always changing and we wait to change? That could be just a Canadian trait as far as technology is concerned.

Mr Hoicka: I think this graph does illustrate that after the recession, the US employment in manufacturing did not rebound to anywhere near the same extent as it did in Ontario. We made gains in particular industries, for example autos, at a time when there were substantial cutbacks in the US. Our steel industry did not have the kinds of cutbacks that occurred in the US and so forth, so yes, in essence what has happened is that as of now, we are down to about where the US got to by not having the kind of employment recovery that we had. Incidentally, they did have a somewhat better productivity experience during that time period, so their output went up on a per-person basis more than our output did.

Mr Fletcher: We are looking at full implementation of the free trade agreement plus perhaps an involvement in the Mexican trade agreement. Can you still talk about a recovery from this recession back to anywhere near what we have been accustomed to, or is it going to more or less flatten out?

Mr Hoicka: First, I will start with the last point, which is the Mexican agreement. The Mexican agreement I do not think would come into play within the time period of the forecast we are dealing with. It might or might not have an impact, but not within the next couple of years, simply because it is not here yet.

The issue of the free trade agreement is fairly complex to deal with. I would think that the biggest impact has been on industry and the reasons for the drops in the first place have been the recession, simply the fact that sales have not grown and in fact are declining. That relates to a series of things, including the high dollar and quite high interest rates in real terms.

I think the way you would have to think of the free trade agreement is that the restructuring that might have taken place over a 10-year period has been forced back in the minds of many managers as they face the necessity to lay off. They are making decisions, should this be a temporary layoff or should this be a permanent layoff, a decision that you might not have faced for a number of years into the future. So I think it plays a role but it is a qualitative role; it is not a role that you could separate from the very important fact that there is a recession at the time we have an 87-cent dollar.

Mr Jamison: It was mentioned earlier on that the United States was slower going into the recessionary cycle too, but this graph would also indicate that to me. Is that a correct assessment?

Mr Hoicka: It would be quite possible for US employment numbers to start dropping, yes, because certainly in manufacturing we hit a recession from the manufacturing point of view, in the sense of no increase in sales, much earlier than the United States did. It would be quite possible to see layoffs there if we came back in six months, for example, so it may well be that they are worse.

Mr Sutherland: What you are saying, then, is that US manufacturing is suffering from the same problem of sales. It would seem to me that a lot of the manufacturing jobs that we are losing are going to the United States, or that seems to be from what we read about. I am just wondering, these plants are going down there and setting up, but if there are no sales there, is it going to be the same slowdown or a worse slowdown than we have, or are you able to tell at this time?

Mr Hoicka: I cannot describe whether the slowdown is the same or worse. I might have to go back to Qaid Silk, because that is an overall question about the economy.

Mr Silk: At present we have, in our forecast anyway, the US slowdown for 1991 slightly sharper than the slowdown for Canada and for Ontario. But the point that Mr Jamison was making earlier is that the US, remember, entered the recession much later. We entered our recession in the second quarter of 1990 and the United States entered its recession two quarters later in the fourth quarter of 1990 so that effectively, you know, maybe it will have a shorter recession than ours, but in any case, in 1991 it will be experiencing slower growth than we will.

Your question I think is, "On what basis are people making these plant location decisions? Why would they want to shift in time from a slow market to another slow market, or a declining market to another declining market?" Those are much longer-term issues.

As John Hoicka pointed out, obviously for our manufacturing sector, the basic reason why we are experiencing a slowdown is cyclical. It is a recession; sales just have not expanded for a long time and people have to make these decisions. Maybe they are accentuated by the fact that everybody is faced with the free trade agreement here and they have got to make location decisions. Maybe things that you might have put off for another couple of years you decide to do perhaps now.

So to that extent, then, the alternative location is obviously the United States, but the question is, has the United States seen the worst? No, it has not; it is going to experience a recession too that is going to go on for at least one quarter, ie, this one, and maybe for the first half of the year. So I think their manufacturing is going to suffer a bit too. We have not seen the worst yet.

Mr Hoicka: Page 29, just very briefly, indicates another factor in the recent decline in manufacturing and that is the operating income as a percentage of sales. That has declined almost as rapidly as it did in 1982.

On page 30, the first industry and the largest industry is auto assembly and parts. Each dips a little separately because there are slightly different issues involved.

The first key point, and I am looking slightly longer-term than a single year, is that there has been to some extent consolidation of assembly in the Great Lakes area, and in particular there has been an increase in Ontario assembly capacity to 2.3 million units in 1993—that is what we anticipate we will get to when each of these plants is fully up to speed—from 1.6 million units in 1979. There are relatively few jurisdictions in North America or anywhere else that have had an expansion of that magnitude.

There are a number of reasons for that. The primary reason is location relative to Detroit. Another issue is the attractive labour costs, and as part of that, the health care components of the wage costs, which are quite high for the major auto manufacturers in the US.

Clearly the current slowdown in North America in vehicle sales is having a substantial impact on the market. However, even with that slowdown, Ontario is increasing its share of production, and in fact in 1990 actually increased its output slightly in the face of a fairly significant decline in North American production. That is because, of course, our new capacity happens to be coming on at exactly the right time. This shows that in 1988 we had 13.6% of North American production. It has gone in 1989 to 13.9% and in 1990 to 15.3%. That is close to the peak that we are going to get with this current round at capacity. It will be slightly higher than 15.3%. It may be 16% by the time we get another two or three years down the road.

We anticipate, even with lower 1991 North American vehicle sales, that Ontario assembly will rise slightly. At the moment we are anticipating a US sales drop from about 14.1% in 1990 to maybe 13.7% in 1991. That is pretty consistent with what, for example, the Big Three are forecasting right now. Given that forecast, we would see a very slight increase in total number of units for auto assembly.

Mr Phillips: To put the auto industry in perspective for myself, put it in some dimension for me, what per cent of the manufactured goods in Ontario is auto and how does auto split between assembly and parts? And the last question really is, what is going on in the US? If in fact proximity to US plants is important, are the US auto manufacturers building the new plants close to us or not?

Mr Hoicka: Let me start with the size. There would be roughly 150,000 people in the auto assembly plus parts industry as compared to something over 900,000 in total in manufacturing. Roughly speaking, it would be split maybe 50,000 in the assembly side and 100,000 in parts. It might be a little bit more and a little less in parts, but that will give you the orders of magnitude.

One important point is that out of that 100,000 in parts, a large minority is actually employed by the majors, for example, GM has a battery plant, engine plant, Ford has an engine plant, etc. Out of that 100,000 maybe 30,000-plus of the jobs would be with the majors. They are important not just because of assembly, but because of the in-house parts.

The second issue you were concerned about was basically how are we doing relative to where they are building plants. Maybe I can deal with that in the next couple of slides because it is more an issue for parts than assembly.

Mr Phillips: I just had this mental image that as the auto industry goes—it plays a huge role in Ontario's economy. You are saying it is about 15%, I gather, of the manufacturing jobs.

Mr Hoicka: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I just wonder what per cent of our manufactured export goods is the auto.

Mr Hoicka: It would be much higher. It would be at least 50%, I would think.

Dr Christie: Close to 50%.

Mr Phillips: So 50% of our manufactured export goods is auto.

Mr Hoicka: Yes, perhaps higher than that. It is certainly our largest single export. Close to 85% of our production would be exported outside the country and probably half of the remainder would be exported to other provinces. It is quite important from the point of view of our total exports.

Mr Sutherland: You show the Ontario share of North American production for 1988, 1989 and 1990 and that it has increased in there. I want to know, though, how much North American production has increased overall in that time or has decreased in that time, and then not only production but North American production as a percentage of sales.

Mr Hoicka: North American production has I think decreased throughout that time. If I remember correctly, 1989 was slightly lower than 1988 and 1990 was a fair bit lower. Total production has decreased. That is because of sales. In fact, offshore imports peaked in 1987 and have declined slowly since 1987.

In part they have been offset by transplants, but transplants of course are providing jobs in North America so that the peak year in percentage terms was 1987 and North American production has been gaining market share since then, although the market has been declining.

Mr Sutherland: Just one other question in regard to your last statement that even with lower 1991 vehicle sales, Ontario's assembly is forecast to rise slightly: How much do you mean by slightly? At this stage, is it too early to predict what will happen for 1992, or will we see a decline at that stage?

Mr Hoicka: By slightly, I mean pretty slightly, because I think the number was 1.76 million units in 1990 and we think it would be about 1.78, so we are talking maybe 20,000 unit gain given the forecast that we currently have. Obviously, there are all kinds of little things. That is just a number. Lots of things could happen. People might decide they love the Lumina or they hate the Magic Wagon or something like that.

In 1992, in comparison with the number I threw out of about 13.7 US sales, I would say probably—this is not a forecast at this point—most people feel that 1992 will be at least back to 1990 levels and probably higher than 1990 levels, so that it is probably 14.1 to 14.5. In that situation, we will definitely have an increase in auto activity in Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: Ontario will have the definite increase.

Mr Hoicka: Yes, because we will maintain market share and the market will be moving back up.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to make a couple of observations. The industry itself projects—I should qualify that by saying that the auto industry is a North American industry. The fact that it is in Ontario is virtually irrelevant. It has nothing to do with the Ontario market per se. It really is a North American market and 80% of the production in Ontario-based firms goes to the United States.

The industry itself projects that by the year 2000 that Ontario—in fact Canada, but most of it is in Ontario—will actually achieve 20%. These figures show that 1990 is 15.3% but the industry projects that by the year 2000 they will have 20% of the market that will be produced in Canada. Once you get Hyundai in Quebec and Volvo in Nova Scotia, I think 85% is in Ontario.

To answer Mr Phillips's question about what effect proximity to the assembly plant has on the parts manufacturers, there was a report issued by Booz, Allen and Hamilton Inc that was quite interesting. It was quite controversial when it came out. It said that Ontario was one of the worst jurisdictions in which to build cars. That was based on cost, taxation, government policies, all of these things. They said that Quebec was one of the best, only because of the low labour rates and everything else.

Having said all that—and this was not a scientific study, it was a survey—they asked people to respond. When they asked the Quebec auto parts manufacturer, "Where would you put your next plant?" he said, "I would put it in Ontario," and they determined that the number one determinant as to plant location and investment is proximity because of just-in-time delivery.

You have the situation where in Oshawa we have the largest auto facility in North America, the autoplex. When and if Ford completes its expansion in Oakville, it will be the second-largest auto facility in North America. That is what has anchored the auto parts industry here: the proximity and the just-in-time delivery.

Mr B. Ward: On page 30 you mention the increase in Ontario assembly capacity to 2.3 million units in 1993 from 1.6 million units. That is at full capacity, is it not?

Mr Hoicka: That is right.

Mr B. Ward: Would you know what percentage we are at in 1990? Are we at 70% or 80% of capacity or lower, higher?

Mr Kwinter: I can tell you that.

Mr Hoicka: I would need a calculator.

Mr Kwinter: The plants are running full-time. As a matter of fact, companies like Honda are running at greater than their capacity.

Mr B. Ward: And that is who is hiring, I think.

Mr B. Ward: At 100% work.

Mr Kwinter: The plants are running at capacity.

Mr Hoicka: The next two pages detail a look at the auto parts industry, which clearly is dependent upon the assembly industry. There is a survey of people in the industry compiled by a Quebec professor who determined what kinds of parts should be just-in-time kinds of parts.

As a result of that survey, the different types of parts were categorized as "ought to be within two hours of an assembly plant" because just-in-time was quite important, another group could be two to four hours, another group four to eight hours, and then the final group essentially could locate anywhere you wanted.

We mapped that against the Ontario auto parts industry—this was based a couple years ago—to find out how important location was for the Ontario parts industry. What we discovered was that about 60% of them should be within two hours of an assembly plant, another 20% should be within four hours and so forth. That is not the same thing as saying 60% of all parts in a car should be within two hours; it is just that we have specialized in those things that are just-in-time or we anticipate will be just-in-time products. That then makes the next chart fairly important.

Mr Sutherland: You said the way you mapped it these companies or these automotive parts places should be within this level or actually are within.

Mr Hoicka: They should be. For example, if the survey had concluded that engines should be produced within two hours of an assembly plant and if we produce engines, which we do in Ontario, we would have included that in among our 60%. So this is talking about the future.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, but I am a bit confused here. Are you saying that that 61% of the engine plants would be within two hours, that they have to be?

Mr Hoicka: No, I am saying that of the parts that we produce, 61% are of the type that ought to be near an assembly plant. So if (a) we are producing them and (b) we have a lot of assembly plants near us, then that is a positive indicator for the success of those particular parts operations.

On the next slide, we looked at what was happening to the number or the capacity of assembly plants near Ontario. If you look at the bottom line—the full line is "within two hours"—that was between 1978 and 1983. It declined fairly significantly because, of course, there were a lot of plants that were closed down in that 1981, 1982, 1983 time period.

Since that time period, there have been a number of plants constructed, many of them in Ontario. What that has meant is an increase in our two-hour capacity; the same thing within four hours and the same thing within eight hours. What this means for the parts industry is that it is well located in the sense that an increasing proportion of the auto industry is located near Ontario, so that basically the Oshawa-to-Windsor corridor is extremely good from a locational point of view.

What has happened in the last year has been that even though the industry has been quite concerned about, for example, not only a decline in sales but more particularly the exchange rate—a very high exchange rate makes it much more difficult for it to compete—over the past two years it has been able to maintain its share of the North American market in the sense that its sales have tracked very, very well with North American production.

What that suggests is that the locational factor has been quite important in offsetting the difficulties that the dollar has created for that industry. What is important is that they have not increased their share, even though they have increased sales in Canada, so they actually have lost market share in the US. They have been fortunate in that, to date, on average—and that of course would not be true for some individual parts producers—they have gained through new plants in Ontario.

The steel industry is another major Ontario industry. The key problem in the steel industry is that the industrial world demand for steel has been flat for a decade. There has been essentially no growth. The outlook in that industry, with little pluses and minuses, is also for no growth. What the chart shows is that during the past decade there have been very substantial cuts in employment in both the US and the European Community. There have been cuts, but they have not been as large in Ontario and Japan, so that Ontario and Japan have in fact slightly increased their share of the world steel market.

A second issue which does not show up on this chart is that during the past decade there has also been a trend towards mini-mills and they have taken market away from the traditional large integrated plants. The mini-mills have a higher degree of recycling content. They are located typically at the market rather than near the resource and the quality of their output has been increasing quite substantially. This looks like a continued problem for the future from the point of view of the traditional integrated plants.

What that means for the Ontario industry is that while, on the one hand, it is required to invest in state-of-the-art galvanizing plants—both Dofasco and Stelco are investing right now—its productivity edge has been lost relative to its American counterparts over the past decade. Just as the traditional mills in the US face continued pressure from mini-mills, they are facing that as well.

Mr Sutherland: Are the mini-mills a phenomenon just to the US or are they a world-wide phenomenon? Is anything of that nature going on here in Canada?

Mr Hoicka: I believe there is some degree of mini-mill activity here, but I would think that the US is by far the most visible indication of mini-mills. It is certainly not the only place. Newcor, for example, has brought on a number of new small-sized mills. These are with phenomenal productivity and energy consumption implications, so there is certainly a lot of concern by traditional mills for the 1990s. The likelihood is that not only will they build more, but that there are some other mini-mills looking at some more new technology.

Mr Phillips: Just putting it into perspective, 250,000 in auto; how many in steel?

Mr Hoicka: About 60,000 to 70,000. Wait a minute; that cannot be right. I think in total the number is about 50,000, but it seems to me that would include a lot of mini-mills, steel servicing centres, etc. It may be a high number. I will have to check that.

Mr Kwinter: I have a comment. The reasons Ontario has been much less affected by the production and employment cutbacks are that both Stelco and Dofasco are really state of the art and they have a reputation for being some of the best steel producers in the world. The more significant reason is that the United States, under its restrictions on importing of steel, has Canada under a voluntary restraint agreement at 3.5%. It is one of the few countries that does not have a formal agreement; it is a gentleman's agreement.

The reason is that they use it for an escape valve to counter any strikes they get in the US market. So Canada is always up against that upper limit. Sometimes when there are strikes it goes to 5% or 6% of the US market, which is one of the largest markets in the world. That is why they have been less impacted. Certainly, when the whole economy goes down, it goes down, but when the economy is going well the Canadian steel producers do very well indeed.

Mr Hoicka: Page 34, the construction sector: Construction employment peaked in July 1990 and that was about 65% above the 1980 average, just to indicate the strength of the boom during the decade in construction employment. In contrast, employment in December is down 15.5% compared to December 1989. As about September those employment figures started dropping quite quickly in that sector. We would anticipate there will be further declines in both residential and commercial activity because the declines in starts, of course, will come into play as projects are finished up. So we would anticipate further declines in employment through 1991.

Mr Phillips: The bulk of the antirecession activity, the $700 million or the $1 billion, is in construction, is it not?

Dr Christie: Primarily.

Mr Phillips: In spite of all of that, we still expect a decline in the construction sector?

Mr Silk: As you know, for example, housing starts are falling to 54,000 in 1991 and business investment is also falling, so the rest of the construction sector, which is not being sort of supported by government activity, is not exactly doing very well.

Mr Phillips: So the major antirecession thing still will see a decline in construction employment.

Mr Silk: I guess the point we made earlier was that both the $700-million capital spending programs which will trigger, say, $300 million by the municipalities, plus the $500 million in terms of the tax break in terms of not imposing the retail sales tax on the GST, will add 20,000 jobs. The point we made earlier was, I suppose, that in the absence of that we would have seen a net job decline in this forecast.

Mr Phillips: I think your forecast assumed there would be 120,000 more jobs averagely in 1991 than there were at the end of December 1990. Construction jobs are going to go down.

Dr Christie: That is again on average, year over year.

Mr Phillips: Yes, I realize that, but as I say, this one surprised me a little bit, to actually see construction jobs, in spite of everything else, still going down.

Mr Hoicka: That may start to turn around before the end of 1991, but I think the point I was making here is that they have not bottomed out yet; it is quite unlikely.

On page 35, service sector employment: This is just a brief chart to indicate that we have created a very large number of service sector jobs relative to employment. In fact, I think this happens to show Quebec, but the Ontario service sector employment as a percentage of population is higher than for the rest of Canada. It is important not just in terms of employment within the province, but in effect interprovincial trade through head offices and our concentration of business services, finance and insurance are important to the economy. In fact, there are service exports related to that kind of activity as well.

Mr Sutherland: So you have a large service sector and an ever-increasing service sector and it seems to be a declining manufacturing employment sector, yes?

Mr Hoicka: I did not happen to include it, but if we had the chart which showed manufacturing sector employment, it would also be towards the top end of that scale. In fact, Ontario provides a very high level of employment relative to its population.

Mr Sutherland: Generally, manufacturing employment has better-paying jobs than the service sector, so there is some real impact in terms of revenue the government would be collecting from tax from that change.

Mr Hoicka: That would be quite complicated to determine. It is true that on average manufacturing employment has higher wages, but there is a great difference in manufacturing wages and we would have to go and determine, I think, whether it was low-wage jobs or high-wage jobs in manufacturing that were being lost. I think the other point is that there is a very big range of wages, obviously, in the service sector, where there is well over two thirds of the total jobs. It is not true that only the low-wage jobs are increasing. There are certainly certain kinds of jobs such as head office jobs that are frequently higher. It would be hard to answer that question.

Mr Sutherland: You are saying it is very hard to determine the shift in employment and the amount of money that the provincial Treasury could get from wages.

Mr Hoicka: I personally think that would be an extremely difficult computation.

Mr Phillips: This is a very unusual number as a percentage of total population. The more relevant one for me is the percentage of jobs, I think, because this depends on how many kids and what not are around, so maybe for me, I would not mind seeing the percentage of jobs in the G7, which is the one on the next page, a little bit more.

Mr Silk: If I can come back and answer an earlier question by Mr Phillips, I just had the numbers brought to me. We were talking about the construction sector and we have talked about basically a $1-billion capital spending program as an antirecession package. As I was mentioning earlier, I did not give you the numbers but both residential housing and non-residential is down. Residential construction spending, in our forecast, is going to be down $2.9 billion and non-residential construction is going to be down $1 billion, so the antirecession package is a partial offset. It is not by any means a full offset. Consequently, the construction sector as a whole is being supported by the capital spending program, but it is not sufficient in magnitude by any means to offset the weakness in the private sector.

Mrs Sullivan: The negative $1.9 billion and the negative $1 billion—

Mr Silk: Well, $2.9 billion.

Mrs Sullivan: —are before the $1 billion or after the $1 billion of provincial and municipal initiatives, when you are talking about the decline?

Mr Silk: After.

Mrs Sullivan: So net there will be a $3.9-billion increase in construction activity?

Mr Silk: That is right.

Mr Hoicka: Page 36 is the more traditional pie chart. The service sector accounts for about 70% of Ontario's total employment and 60% of output. The two parts that are out give a rough idea of the public sector. The public sector does not particularly follow this classification, but by and large health and education are the main component of the service sector that is public.

Since 1980 nearly 90% of the job growth in Ontario has taken place in the service sector. For 1991, performance of this sector is expected to be constrained by a continued weakness in the economy and by the GST. Of course, that will impact mainly on the private sector part of the service sector.

Mr Phillips: Construction is down; manufacturing is down; the service sector is down.

Mrs Sullivan: I just want to ask a question about how Treasury is going to monitor the effect of the GST on economic activity. What are you going to be doing to follow whether a lot of your projections are based on a perception of a decline in activity based on the GST? How are you going to be monitoring that?

Dr Christie: We will monitor that in the same way, as part of our general monitoring of the economy. I think the clearest indicator of the impact of the GST is the consumer price index. We will be looking at that very carefully over the first few months of the year as the impact of the GST feeds its way through the consumer price index.

Mrs Sullivan: I am sure the first month or two will be distorted because of the patterns of retailers who are absorbing the GST or whatever.

Dr Christie: There are certainly some retailers who are, for example, advertising that they will pay the GST for January, so it will take perhaps two or even three months to see the full effect of the GST having worked its way into the consumer price index.

The other thing that we will be watching very carefully is the pattern of retail sales because there is obviously some concern that the basic negative impact of the GST will be upon consumption, and therefore directly on retail sales. We will be looking at that side pretty carefully for the first few months as well and then continuing through the year.

Mr Kwinter: Over the past few months when this issue has been discussed there seems to be a tendency to equate all manufacturing jobs with the settlements of the auto workers in the automotive industry, and all service jobs with McDonalds. Is there some way we can get an actual figure of what the average manufacturing wage is and what the average service industry wage is?

Dr Christie: We can certainly provide you with that information, but I think that as both Qaid and John described, there is perhaps as much variation within manufacturing and within the service sector as there is between the two sectors. There are certainly low-wage manufacturing jobs just as there are quite well-paid service sector jobs in financial services and business services, areas that do tend to pay fairly well.

Mr Kwinter: That is the point of my question.

Dr Christie: It is a compositional shift. Depending on the kind of manufacturing job that is being transformed into the kind of service sector job, that is the computational difficulty John referred to in looking at the other question. What we can provide for the committee are average earnings levels in a number of both manufacturing and service sector occupations. That will perhaps give you some sense of the dispersion of these things.

Mr Kwinter: What about something like the percentage of people in the manufacturing sector earning over $40,000 a year, the percentage earning between $20,000 and $40,000, the percentage earning less than $20,000, and the same thing in the service sector?

Mr Jamison: There have been studies done further on the percentage of earnings in those various sectors. Maybe we can get a feel on what the growth in the particular areas would be by comparing it back one, two or three in size.

Mrs Sullivan: Why would you want to do that.

Mr Jamison: You get a feel for the overall income mix.

Mr Kwinter: The reason I would like to see it is that I notice a tendency for manufacturing jobs to be perceived as being good and service jobs perceived as being bad by certain people. There just seems to be that feeling of, "My goodness, we are losing manufacturing jobs and that is a terrible thing." It may not be. It may be that this economy would be better served by getting more and more high-quality service jobs. I do not know. It would be interesting to see what is happening and where that is going.

Mr Trick: On that point, there is a study which looks at this question in a fair bit of detail that I can certainly provide to the committee, which Statistics Canada did about two years ago. It asked the general question, "Is it true that because we are shifting to a service economy we are moving towards bad jobs rather than good jobs?" The general conclusion they came to was that within each occupational category, whether it was manufacturing, professions, services or whatever, the increased dispersion within that category was far more important than the shift from manufacturing to services, essentially confirming the point

Bob Christie was making earlier. If you would like, I can provide that to you. To my knowledge, that is the most thorough study of the question you raised.

Mr Hoicka: Just a last comment, if I can clarify, on page 36: I indicated the service sector would be constrained in 1991. We were not calling for a negative service sector. That was constraint relative to earlier years, so it will slow down although we would say there will be some growth in the service sector.

Page 37 indicates that one of the toughest areas of the service sector is the part related to tourism. Again, it does not fit the standard classification since there are jobs in a whole series of the different components on that previous page. Looking at trips, first of all, they fell in 1989 and expenditures fell. Preliminary indications are that they fell yet again in 1990, and our anticipation is that they may fall to some extent in 1991. In each of these years the factors have first been slowing, and now recession of the North American economy, and of course in 1991, with a recession in the US, that will affect tourism from the US.

High real interest rates are a significant issue, as is rising unemployment, and the exchange rate has certainly had an impact on a large amount of tourism, certainly on people coming to the province and to some extent Ontarians leaving the province and going to the US for vacations.

The conclusions are more medium-term conclusions. First of all, the resource sector outlook depends on the Canadian dollar as well as the US outlook because of its export orientation. We anticipate that it will likely resume and in fact grow during 1991 and continue to have slow growth in 1992.

The construction industry seems to be the most difficult situation, in particular with commercial overbuilding, that aspect. It may be easier to turn around the housing sector than the major projects, where starts have been declining for at least over a year now. It just takes a long time, once that sector goes down, for it to build up again.

In Ontario manufacturing industry, particularly the motor vehicle group, industrial products and investment goods are generally well positioned for recovery in the US as well as Canada, but the caveat we would leave is that output will turn around much more quickly than employment in manufacturing. We will see significant productivity increases. Obviously, the speed at which that output turns around will depend on the US economy, interest rates and the Canadian dollar, because quite a large proportion of manufactured output is exported to the US.

Mr B. Ward: I have a question on page 37, the tourism sector, if we can backtrack for a moment. The figures from 1988 to 1989 show that trips made in the province by Ontario residents were down considerably, 25.6% from 1988. When you talk about 1990, you mention, "The expenditure in tourism will remain weak but stable due to increased travel within the province by Ontario residents." Are we up substantially from 1989 on Ontario people visiting other areas within the province? How did you arrive at that statement?

Mr Hoicka: I think we are up but not substantially.

Mr B. Ward: They must have spent more, then. The visitors from the United States and other countries are down in 1990 from 1989, yet the expenditures are stable, "weak but stable."

Mr Hoicka: Let me see how to phrase this. Relative to 1989, which was a very poor year for Ontario residents visiting places in Ontario, 1990 was a better year for Ontario residents visiting Ontario, and in general that offset continued declines in international and other-province visiting to Ontario.

Mr B. Ward: You have statistics from 1988 to 1989, and then to make the statement that travel within the province by Ontario residents—you must have some stats to make that statement. Is there a percentage?

Mr Hoicka: We would have to come back with some data on that.

The Chair: Is there any indication of what the impact of the cross-border shopping is going to be on the international travel account deficit in terms of Ontario?

Dr Christie: We do not have any precise figures on that yet. Part of the issue is the fact that people can cross so easily without a lot of recording of what is being carried across the border, which then makes it difficult to have solid statistics on what is actually happening there. Much of the information which has been discussed here I believe comes from survey information that the Ministry of Tourism undertakes, and it would not likely be very good at capturing the cross-border element of the problem.

The Chair: Because it does seem to be a growing factor in revenue maintenance, especially for Niagara region, where sales at service stations—that will cut out revenues for gas. There is an awful lot of buying going on across the border and that would cut out some sales taxes that would normally be paid. There are large items being purchased now and this will only be compounded by the GST and by the fact that as more and more of the tariffs are removed due to the free trade deal there is less and less incentive to shop, at least in the Niagara area, in Canada, and there are huge numbers going across the border.

Dr Christie: And a factor in that is that the dollar at 86 cents or 87 cents makes it a lot less expensive to shop across the border than it was when the dollar was 77 cents.

Mr Phillips: You said manufacturing depends a lot on the US. Maybe you already told me this, but what percentage of our manufactured goods are exported?

Mr Silk: Internationally 50%, and I think something like—I will have to check the number—15% is exported to other provinces. From our point of view, almost two thirds of our output is exported outside the province.

Mr Phillips: So 50% is international and 85% of that is US or something like that?

Mr Silk: Let me check. We will get back to you.

Dr Christie: The committee may be relieved to know that much of the rest of the paper here is an appendix. However, we do have a couple of slides that look at the regional situation across the province. I will ask John Taylor to take us through those.

Mr Taylor: The table on page 39 shows the regional and community economic conditions. To explain up front, it is an average of the unemployment rates for the communities and regions between October and December. The reason for that three-month average is that the labour force information is presented on a monthly basis that is unadjusted for seasonal variations, so there is a tendency for month-to-month variations that cannot be accounted for. It is a statistical problem, and this helps to smooth out some of that variation.

In terms of the highest regional unemployment rate, that would be in northeastern Ontario for the last quarter of 1990. Northwestern Ontario would be 8.1%, the second highest, followed by the southwest at 7.2%. Central Ontario's unemployment rate averaged 7.2% and the eastern part of the province was at 6.7%. It gives an overview of where the various regions are at in terms of their employment situations.

On a community basis, the Thunder Bay and Sudbury areas, along with Windsor, have higher unemployment rates in the province; St Catharines-Niagara also, just under 10%, followed by Kitchener-Waterloo and Hamilton. The biggest problems in terms of community unemployment certainly tend to be in the north. Windsor and the manufacturing areas would be related largely to the layoffs in auto parts manufacturing.

The Chair: I notice that Ottawa has gone from 5.6% to 5.4%. Is that because of the GST as well?

Mr Taylor: I will have to check on that for you.

Mr Sutherland: If I could just ask a question about the Windsor rate. Maybe you can answer this. Windsor, I would assume, is traditionally higher than London?

Mr Taylor: I believe it is.

Mr Sutherland: Do you have any way of knowing what that traditional rate would be, what the difference would be on average between Windsor and London? I guess the point I am trying to get at is how much that gap has widened in the last two years. Do we have any way of getting a handle on that?

Mr Taylor: We can look back and see how, over the last few years, that trend has been and how close they have been and probably could give you some assessment as to what the differences are and why they have changed.

Mr Hansen: We were just talking about cross-border shopping in the tourism part. If you take a look at Thunder Bay, they have a certain problem up there; it looks like the forest industry is affecting them also. If you get down to the St Catharines-Niagara area, which I am from, you get 9.2%. I know we had the auto industry, but we are having retail stores closing in the Niagara area, so I think there is a good reflection on the closeness to the border on the shopping, with the purchase of gas, etc, which is a loss to the income. Windsor also, close to the border. We are talking about the auto industry being down, but I think there is something in common, if we look at all border towns, having a problem with unemployment. I know some other groups are coming in to talk to us on these issues and maybe familiarize us a little better with what is actually going on in these areas.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to comment on Mr Sutherland's question. London traditionally has the lowest unemployment rates and Windsor traditionally has some of the highest unemployment rates in Ontario. I do not know whether it has changed vis-à-vis each other's relationship, but traditionally that is the way it has been. It has always been that way.

Mr Taylor: The following page, page 40, goes back to the layoff situation. We have shown it here by region. The right-hand column shows the change in the number of layoffs by region between 1989 and 1990. Central Ontario has had the highest increase in layoffs, almost 8,000 out of a total of 14,000 province-wide; the southwest just over 4,000; followed by the northeast at around 2,600, 2,700. Both the east and the northwest have gone in the opposite direction. They have experienced fewer layoffs. North-eastern Ontario would be largely related to the mining sector, Elliot Lake and the Kirkland Lake area as well, for the iron ore mines. The manufacturing in central and south-western Ontario has been the hard-hit sector in those cases.

The Chair: I have a list of questions. While they do not relate to your presentation, some of them do, and I think they will have a direct impact on what we need to know in order to bring forward a paper that would be useful to the Treasurer. If you cannot comment on them now, perhaps you could find the information and send it along to us. These are my own, and I think others will have some.

I am interested in the cost-sharing programs. Have we any indication of the direction of the federal government in terms of whether it is going to maintain what used to be a traditional relationship in the cost-sharing programs or whether in fact it is going to continue with the most recent trend, that is, unilaterally decreasing the amounts of transfers coming from the federal government?

Dr Christie: I think the most recent expression officially from the federal government was in last year's federal budget, at which time it announced further cut-backs to the established programs financing and the capping of the Canada assistance plan. Those are actions which are continuing to have effects and will continue to have effects next fiscal year. They have not given any indication of further steps in that area, although they have continued to signal their commitment to keep their deficit down. They have indicated that further action on that side will be forthcoming in their February budget, February being the conventional time; they have not announced the budget date yet that I know of.

The Chair: Is there any projection from the ministry of what the transfer payments are going to be from the income tax rebates the federal government collects, Ontario income tax? Do we have any idea what kind of sums they are going to be and how much they will be down?

Dr Christie: I am not sure I understood the question. Are you referring to the personal income tax revenue due to Ontario that is collected by the federal government?

The Chair: Yes.

Dr Christie: I do not have that information with me. I will take that under advisement in the context of the other revenue question.

The Chair: Another question I have, and you have alluded to it throughout your briefing today, is the value of the Canadian dollar. Have you made any projections about what you think the value of the Canadian dollar will be at the end of this year?

Dr Christie: I will ask Qaid to answer that question. He has the specifics.

Mr Silk: Underlying the forecast we presented, we have an average exchange rate in 1990 of just over 85.5 cents. We saw that coming down in 1991 to 84.5 cents through the year, so by year end—I do not have the figure; I am looking behind for the person who might—it is on a downward trend, averaging this year about one cent lower than last year. It is on a downward trend. That is partly because interest rates are coming down too. They are coming down in the US as well in our forecast; they are coming down in Canada as well.

The Chair: I would like to know what you base that on, given that about a year ago the feds dropped the central bank rate and that caused a decline in the value of the Canadian dollar, and they automatically turned it around and sent the dollar back up. Why are there projections that the value of the dollar is going to be allowed to go down even though when they had an opportunity to allow it to go down a year ago, they did not?

Mr Silk: I do not want to speculate on how the Bank of Canada runs its monetary policy. January 1990 is I think the incident you were referring to, when it dropped 29 basis points in one week and the market got very nervous and there was a run on the dollar.

The point is that the economy is very weak in North America, in Canada as well. We have seen interest rates drop fairly significantly over the last three or four months. Now the bank rate is I think the lowest it has been since early 1988 or something. Of course, prime rates have also dropped quite significantly and mortgage rates have dropped. This is happening in tandem with US rates coming down, which is keeping our dollar up, and partly because of the uncertainty of our oil prices; the Canadian dollar being a bit of a petrocurrency is keeping our dollar up.

But as the economy continues to weaken, the Bank of Canada does have room to move our interest rates down and, more important, narrow the spread between our rates and the American rates. The consequence of that would be, obviously, that the dollar would fall.

In a sense your question may partly be why people think the dollar is overvalued. There are various reasons for that. We have a merchandise trade surplus but a current account deficit. Most economists in the profession, especially in the private sector, consider that the Canadian dollar is overvalued at 86 cents or 87 cents, that maybe its value should be 78 cents to 82 cents or 75 cents to 80 cents, somewhere in that range, given our productivity level, given our inflation performance with the US, and given our current account deficit.

The pressure on the dollar is down, and the way to prop it up is obviously by higher interest rates. A weak economy removes that prop. The bank has conceded that the GST will obviously add to inflation, but if there are no second-round effects of that the bank has sort of considered that it will not react to the higher first-round inflation by jacking up interest rates, as long as the second-round effects in terms of wages and prices do not show up. That tendency would suggest that the spread would narrow and the dollar would fall.

The Chair: The reason I asked this question is because what happens to the dollar and what happens to interest rates has a two-fold impact. One of them is that since we have a projected deficit, we are going to have to borrow money and we are going to have to pay it back presumably or we are going to have to pay the interest on it and those capital costs are going to have to be included.

The second reason I asked that question is because if you are projecting that the value of the Canadian dollar is going to fall and your projections are wrong, there is going to be an impact on what happens in terms of the budget and what happens in terms of the Canadian economy, revenue and financing. So there is a connection here. Have you calculated the scenario where the interest rates fall but the Canadian dollar stays high, and then the other scenario where the interest rates are sent back up to keep the value of the Canadian dollar higher, even though we are still in a recessionary period?

Mr Silk: Maybe if I can first give you some facts, I sort of said the dollar would drop. What we basically said was that we had an 85- to 88-cent US range in 1990. You saw that. We are basically saying that it would be down from that to the 83- to 86-cent range. By year-end it might be around 83 cents, let's say. The point is, how sensitive is the Canadian economy, especially the Ontario economy, to higher interest rates and a higher dollar? It is quite sensitive. The point however is that, at least in the forecasting sense, we have to ask ourselves why the bank would be interested in a high dollar. Per se, it is interested in it not so much for its sake, but obviously in terms of its inflation impact and a higher dollar means inflation effects are more subdued.

If for other reasons inflation is already trending down, and as I said for example, for the GST there are no second-round effects, if oil prices are down and that softens inflation, the bank is not committed to a high dollar for a high dollar's sake. It is committed to moderating inflationary pressures, and for other reasons inflation is coming down. There is room to manoeuvre for the bank. Our bet is, given our forecasts, that excluding the GST, inflation will be lower in 1991 than in 1990. With US interest rates coming down, the bank has got itself some room. Whether in any given week it miscues, as it did in January 1990, that is a different issue and the question is, what kind of approach would it take?

The Chair: I would like to pursue that. I would assume that Sinclair Stevens, who has offered a suggestion as to why the central bank rate would stay as high as it is—and the value of the dollar is up there. The other thing is that given the disastrous effects of the high value of the Canadian dollar on the Ontario economy and on the Canadian economy as a whole, one would have had to ask that question about a year and a half ago when the trend started to move the dollar higher. Since there is no economic gain for Canada and Ontario to have a dollar at that height and yet we do, one would still have to ask the question, have we taken into consideration that there may be reasons other than economic reasons that the value of the dollar remains high, and have we calculated that, just in case?

Dr Christie: If I could offer one comment on that first of all we have not calculated scenarios in which the dollar or interest rates stay high for non-economic reasons. In particular, probably the most convincing scenario that we might look at in terms of higher interest rates and a higher dollar would be one in which we had underestimated how strong the economy was or how much inflationary pressure there was left. In that case, we might see a somewhat stronger economy than we think, to which the Bank of Canada reacts by imposing higher interest rates on the higher dollar, which might mean more strength in the near term but more weakness in the longer term. We are pretty sure we are not underestimating the strength of the economy, so that is not a scenario that we have looked at in any detail.

Mr B. Ward: A quick comment-question, I guess. These are very troubled times and there are so many variables in any type of projections. Do you find that this is one of the most difficult periods that you have had, in your experience, to attempt to project where the economy is going and where the Ontario economy is going because of the variables that are obviously thrown into the puzzle, so to speak?

Mr Stockwell: Last year was the worst time.

Mr B. Ward: Was last year worse?

Dr Christie: I suppose the first comment would be that the big noneconomic variable on the scene is the Middle East. That is always particularly difficult for economists or anyone who is not a military person, and I rather suspect it is very difficult for people with a military background as well. These things are inherently unpredictable, and there are far more issues involved in what is going on over there than what effect it has on Ontario's economy. However, having said that, that is one of the big clouds over what we are looking at in terms of the next year coming up.

Bank of Canada policy is another big question mark. The comment has been made that it is difficult to understand why interest rates and the exchange rate have stayed so high for so long. The only explanation we have been able to come to is that the governor is very serious when he says he is pointing towards zero inflation. That is something that we have some difficulty coming to grips with in terms of a forecast like this, because we have not seen a convincing explanation of the benefits of zero inflation, given that we know what the costs of the policy are.

So those are two uncertainties. Having said that, times are always uncertain, but these probably are more uncertain than most.

Mr Phillips: We will get the revenue estimates I think in a couple of weeks, as you said, when we get the third-quarter stuff out, but my question is, what attention should the committee pay to the province's credit rating? Let me just go on a little bit with that. I gather we have a debt of about $40 billion and Ontario Hydro has a debt of something. We guarantee the debt of Hydro I think. The gentleman said Canada has a trade deficit of $15 billion a year, I guess, and it borrows offshore. The federal government borrows a couple of billion dollars.

I am just trying to get an idea from the Treasury people. What are the benefits or lack of benefits on whatever our credit rating is today? How much of our debt do we borrow offshore, outside of Canada, outside of Ontario, I guess, and is there any consideration we need to have as we look ahead at borrowings that will be required for the province in the next 12 to 18 months the way that we are rated for credit purposes, and just whether that should be something that we are thinking about?

Dr Christie: I find it difficult to offer advice on the committee's agenda. It is certainly a matter of concern to most governments and to most governments at these kinds of times, not only because it affects the cost of borrowing, but if my Treasury and capital market colleagues were here, I think they would tell you that it also affects the availability, that there are a number of organizations that will have restrictions as terms of their lending, will have restrictions on, "I will only have so much double A, or I will only have so much single A." What they will not have is restrictions on how much triple A or double A-plus, for example, and if in very uncertain times people prefer to have those higher quality—as determined by the ratings—credits, there may well be some value in that credit rating in terms of simply the ability to access those funds. So there are generally held to be both cost and availability benefits from the higher credit rating.

Mr Phillips: Could I just ask you a specific thing, because maybe it is too general. How much of our debt do we service offshore? Our debt is $40 billion, but I do not what Hydro's debt is. In terms of not just the availability but the specifics, what is the impact of a lower credit rating? Is it like 0.25 of an interest point or is it different?

Dr Christie: The quarter of a per cent has been used. I have heard it used in the past. If there is a current estimate, we would have to confirm that.

In terms of how much of the $40 billion is foreign borrowing, my understanding, and again subject to confirmation, is that it is primarily held by our Ontario teachers' pension fund, the public service fund, Canada pension plan or example, so it is almost entirely in Canadian dollars held in Canada. Now as those funds are lending the money other places, it may be in future at some point that there would be a significant amount borrowed abroad, but at the moment I do not believe that is the case.

Mrs Sullivan: First of all, I have some things that I want to add to the list of information that I would appreciate Treasury coming back with, but I also want to go back to Qaid's remarks in response to your questions, Mr Chairman, about the Canadian dollar and so on. You are predicting a 6.1% increase in the CPI for the 1991-92 fiscal year and you have indicated that you feel that the Canadian dollar will come down because real inflation is basically decreasing and the difference is the effect of the GST on the CPI. Are you predicting then the GST effect on CPI at, what, about 1.5%, or where? What is your figure?

Mr Silk: For 1991 we had built in one and a half percentage points for GST. That is slightly higher than the estimate of the Department of Finance of 1.25. We also differed on the fact that we thought there would be to some extent second- and third-year effects, much smaller but none the less there. We might have to revise that a bit given a very weak economy, but there may not be sort of some spillover into future years.

That is the impact we have, so with a 6.1% inflation rate for Ontario, excluding GST, we would say 4.6, let's say, which is less than last year's 4.9. The governor has already said that he understands the GST will boost inflation, and as Bob earlier pointed out, one of the things we are going to find out from Statistics Canada actually when we publish the CPI in the next few months—it may not show up in January, for a variety of reasons, where retailers are trying to sort of bite the bullet or whatever, but none the less over a few months it will become clear as to what extent that thing has been passed on. The governor has said, if in future months or in future quarters that does not show up, then he will consider that a one-time bullet which he is willing to live with and not jack interest rates in response to that.

The Chair: With the indulgence of the committee, it is 4:25. If I allow five more minutes for questions, we do have one more piece of business that we have to do before we leave tonight.

Mr Jamison: Many of the questions that have been asked in the committee have dealt very plainly with the policy of the Bank of Canada and again, I just have to really say that I am rather concerned that the Bank of Canada has not chosen to really give us any kind of submission at all. I know that we are going to get submissions from the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the Royal Bank, but those banks really follow suit and I really feel that it would be extremely important to try to get some kind of submission from the Bank of Canada on this issue, outlook and suggestions, and hopefully have someone here whom we could ask questions specific to the economy. I just want to express my concern.

I think it is evident today that again many of the questions that have been put forward deal specifically with the position that the Bank of Canada will be taking or has taken or whatever. I really think it is important to try to readdress that invitation with it, because this province represents one out of three Canadians. I think it is important enough that it make a submission. I really do not understand that it cannot make time for the province of Ontario.

The Chair: I agree with those sentiments entirely. In fact I would ask the clerk to try again to pursue and have a written reason sent on to us why it will not appear before this committee.

Mr Christopherson: I have obviously had the opportunity to have almost all of this material given to me in briefings through the department with the Treasurer. One question that I did not ask and that comes to mind now is, two of the main variables over the last few months in predicting where things might go, of course, were the price of oil and the American economy. Since then, with the advent of the war, we know what it can do to the price of oil if it is a prolonged war, but what might it do to the American economy? Given how that would impact on us, I can think that initially there could be a boom, the old argument that war is positive for an economy; yet the briefing here states that it is intensifying the recession. Briefly, could staff just touch on what the short-, medium- and potential long-term effects of the war on the American economy as it relates to ours might be, please?

Dr Christie: I think the approach that we have taken has been more hooked to oil prices. The war will have two or three fundamental impacts, the first being oil prices. That may go one way or the other, depending on the course of the war. The learned people who discuss these matters seem to relate that side of it to whether there is destruction to production or distribution facilities outside of Iraq and Kuwait and those are things that we will watch for in terms of our monitoring of the economic impact of it.

The United States, from the perspective of oil prices, is very much like Ontario. It is an importer, so the negative impact of oil prices is as we described for Ontario; that is, it is like a tax levied by the rest of the world on the United States, and the reduction in economic activity resulting from that on the US side would then feed through to us because it is the biggest customer on the export side.

The possible upside, I suppose, of war would be government spending in the United States. To the extent that it needs to replace facilities or equipment, it might run a higher deficit and would require a higher deficit to have any of the standard economic multiplier impacts. If in fact, as appears more likely given its deficit problem, any additional spending it undertakes with respect to war is financed by either raising taxes or cutting other problems, as our federal government has indicated it will do, there would not be any material economic benefit coming from the war; perhaps a minor postponement of the so-called peace dividend, but we would not add any positive side to our economic outlook on that account.

Mr Christopherson: I have had a chance, individually and in private, to thank some of the staff in Treasury—and I guess all the ministers and parliamentary assistants might feel this way and may be taking their opportunity—for the kind of work, support and co-operation they have shown. None of us really knew what we were going to walk into, quite frankly, especially with Treasury, and there were interesting dynamics in the early days, watching all of us try to see where we are all coming from.

I would like to say publicly how much I appreciate the efforts of each and every one of the staff that I dealt with in Treasury. Without exception, they have done everything they can to make the transition as comfortable and as easy as possible and have played a positive, supportive role. I want to take the opportunity to thank each of you for that. It is much appreciated.

Mr Kwinter: I have a question about the unemployment rate. The present unemployment rate is at 7.8% and you project that that will be reduced to 7.3%. How realistic is that?

Dr Christie: At the very start of our discussion one of the points we tried to bring to the committee's attention was that there has been new information come to light in the past couple of months since this forecast was made and it creates certain downside risks in the forecast. I think the unemployment rate is really a classic example of that. I believe that even two months ago that rate was in the high sixes or low sevens. It has been in the last two months really that it has gone to the 7.8% level.

While we have not redone that number for the purposes of the public forecast yet in the budget, we will be looking at that over the next couple of months. Obviously the fact that the December number was 7.8% is going to make it somewhat more difficult for the economy to achieve that average forecast over the year.

Mr Kwinter: Are there 20,000 new jobs factored into that already?

Dr Christie: No, the forecast of zero net new job next year included the impact of the antirecession program. Without that the forecast would have been minus 20,000.

Mr Kwinter: Okay. My other question is, when you talk about the real external trade and you are showing very little growth and given that trade constitutes about a third of our gross domestic product, has that been factored in as well?

Dr Christie: Yes, that is factored in.

Mr Phillips: Can I go back to that debt thing again and the end of it? I would not mind hearing from somebody from Treasury who was really intimate with this because I look at your document and it says here, "As a result of these pension reforms, the province will no longer borrow from the teachers' and public service pension plans."

Later on it says, "In view of Ontario Hydro's growing borrowing requirements and the possibility of the province's public market borrowing in the future, the province and Ontario Hydro are developing a global financial strategy to take advantage of financing opportunities in both Canada and international capital markets."

The point I am making is that, for me at least, I do not think we are going to borrow from the teachers' and the public service pensions in the future. I do think we are going to service it offshore or out of Canada and I would not mind some time between now and when we finish maybe hearing from somebody from Treasury who works—I am not suggesting you do not work in the area, but someone maybe more deeply involved in it.

Dr Christie: I think we can find someone who is more deeply immersed than I am.

Mr Stockwell: I wonder if it would be the committee's recommendation or staff's, I am not sure whose, but I would really like to see some revenue projections. I find it very difficult to deal with any kind of recommendations or have any kind of consultation without revenue projections. It is like dealing in a vacuum. I am not asking for where you are going to spend the money or spill your budget. I am just asking how much are we down, how much more we expect to go down and how much money we see ourselves short for 1991. Unless you do that, there is very little valuable input that we can give the Treasurer.

The Chair: Mrs Sullivan gets the last word.

Mrs Sullivan: There are some things that I think would be useful for the committee to have. Some of them relate to the economic side; others relate to other parts of the ministry's operations. Out of your projections relating to new unemployment rates and changes in employment, I wonder if we could see your projections on changes in uptake for the FBA and general welfare assistance.

I think the Chairman has asked for an analysis of federal offloading and the kinds of difficulties that creates in Ontario over the next fiscal period. I would also like to see a similar analysis for changes in the unemployment insurance legislation federally, both decreases and increases in terms of our revenue situation and the net change.

I was interested in your charts relating to business investment activity. I have been reading materials lately, both from Statistics Canada and from research institutions, that suggest that while capital expenditures will be down, research and development activity will be significantly up. I wonder if you have further data on that.

If I could as well go back to a theory that certainly the previous government believed, that debt is not only in dollars but also in facilities, I wonder if Treasury could provide an analysis of infrastructure requirements, particularly in the greater Toronto area, as well as in the broader regions of Ontario, particularly relating to water and sewer issues and the kinds of financial requirements that will be needed over the next immediate period of time to meet those.

What I also think it would be useful, since this has not been included in the material that you provided, would be an analysis of self-employed new business startups and bankruptcies in that sector and what the impact would be of applying the employer health tax to self-employed.

Mr Christopherson: Is that all?

The Chair: There is one question left. I would like to know how much the GST is going to cost the provincial government, how much taxed is the running of the government.

Mrs Sullivan: I too would like to thank Treasury for being here.

The Chair: On behalf of the whole committee, I would like to extend our thanks to you for coming. If we have any further questions, we will send them along to you as they arise. We are just at the beginning of this process, and I think that by the end of the process, after hearing some 60-odd submissions, we may have some more questions for you. Thank you very much.

Before everybody disappears from the committee, we have another piece of work that has to be done. We seem to be very popular and there seem to be a large number of people who would like to come before us. In fact, we have more people than time allocations. We must make a decision as to what we will do. As soon as Mr Decker finishes handing it out, we will let him describe what the situation is and what we might do.

Clerk of the Committee: At its last meeting, the committee authorized the subcommittee to proceed with scheduling and to hold a meeting early in the new year to do that. The subcommittee did so and instructed me to leave the last two days of public hearings unscheduled so that the committee would have some flexibility in choosing among the groups that were still on the waiting list to make presentations.

The appointments for next Wednesday and next Thursday have not been set. There are a total of 20 appointments available and on the list as it appears now there are still 30 groups to be scheduled. I do not know how the committee would want to handle that, whether it would be to meet on Fridays or spill over into the next week.

The Chair: How much time is there in these allotments?

Clerk of the Committee: Thirty minutes.

The Chair: Would it be possible that we could shorten them to 20 minutes and do three in an hour as opposed to two? I am looking through this list and I see number 30 on the list is an individual who has already sent in a letter. While the issues are very important to him, I do not think he is going to take a half-hour and I do not think we would want to spend a half-hour. There may be more like that.

Mr Kwinter: Can I make a suggestion? What we might do is have the clerk go through the 30 names, find out where there is duplication, where there are people pretty well in the same areas as others that have already come in, and allow them a lesser time, not to sort of disqualify them, but maybe to have 30-minute intervals for people who are bringing new information from new groups that we have not had any information from. We might give a shorter time to those bringing information that we have already heard from people in the same field.

Mr B. Ward: I think an example would be the Toronto Home Builders' Association. We are receiving a brief from the Ontario Home Builders' Association and there may be some overlap. That would be an example of a shorter time, where 30 minutes would not be required in that particular case. I think it is a good idea.

Mr Kwinter: I am not talking about your schedule. I am talking about this list of people who have not been scheduled.

The Chair: It is the same with the home builders and the Urban Development Institute. These are pretty much crossovers.

Mr Phillips: I thought I heard three weeks of hearings. Was I incorrect?

Clerk of the Committee: The committee has authority to meet for three weeks. It was the feeling of the subcommittee that the public hearings be held in the first two weeks and the third week be reserved for preparation of a report to the House.

The Chair: You probably know this better than I do, you have been on more committees, but we have to come back and hash out what we want to say, with great wailing and gnashing of teeth.

Mr Stockwell: That will take a couple of minutes.

Mr Phillips: At least one of these groups we should hear from. I have just glanced at them and there are some pretty powerful organizations.

The Chair: We could add a Monday morning or a Friday.

Mrs Sullivan: Why is 30 January not scheduled? Is that where these ones are going?

Clerk of the Committee: Yes. The subcommittee wanted to leave the committee some flexibility so it left two days unscheduled. There are a total of 19 spots available on those two days. While the subcommittee did not want me to schedule them, they did want me to schedule the Ontario Nurses' Association. The only day they were available was the 31st, so one of those I committed to them.

If we were to add, say, a Friday morning from 10 to 12 that would be four time slots, and then a Monday afternoon of the next week when we would be writing a report, that would give us six. That would take all 30 of them and leave the remainder of the week for writing a report.

The Chair: There is a possibility of a Monday morning. How does that feel? Some people have a lot further to come than others.

Mr B. Ward: I move Monday. Slot them in on a Monday.

Clerk of the Committee: Next Monday and the following Monday.

Mr Stockwell: When you tell them you are reducing their time limit, they are not going to be keen on it.

The Chair: There is going to be a time limit.

Mr Stockwell: I understand there is a time limit. If we can make accommodations to hear them all the same length, I would be prepared to do that.

Clerk of the Committee: I think there are three individuals on this list. What I could do is schedule these individuals at the very end of a morning session or an afternoon session and there would be nobody following, so the committee could spend as much time as it wants. If you only spent 10 minutes, you would not be sitting around waiting for the next group, you would spend 10 minutes and that would be it. They would make their presentation and if you had no questions, that would be the end of the meeting.

Mrs Sullivan: I do not see the Ontario Federation of Agriculture on this. I think we should request them to be here. I think it is very important that they be here as the sector that the Ministry of Treasury and Economics has identified as one that is in a difficult transition. I think that we should be hearing from them, even if we have to drag them here.

Mr Jamison: I agree with that. There are important issues that are relevant to the economics of GATT and so forth. I think it is very important that they be here also.

Mr Christopherson: Are we talking 10 o'clock on Monday morning being enough to accommodate everybody?

Clerk of the Committee: If we met next Monday morning in addition to Monday afternoon, that would give us two hours next Monday morning to accommodate four groups. The following Monday would also be another four. That would give us 8 out of the 10. There are a couple of spots on the full agenda that are open as yet.

Mr Christopherson: Then I think this is what we ought to do. I would suggest, though, if we are going to get into a situation of not being able to meet, I agree with Mr Stockwell. If you are going to reduce people, you are probably better off to be arbitrary and say, "We have someone representing your sector or your concerns already, so we will receive your written and the oral just will not be possible this year." If you start giving some people 15 minutes and some 20 and others 30, you are really looking for trouble, so I agree with that opinion expressed by Mr Stockwell.

The other thing is that I thought Mr Kwinter had a good idea about comparing who has spoken already when deciding who we might have to not hear, but I did not quite understand why we would not go back to the original list also. I mean we should take a look at who is left that has not yet been heard or slotted and compare it there. It should not just be out of the remaining. We would deny, if you will, from the remaining, but the comparison should go right back to the beginning of everyone that we have heard. I think with all of that, we should be able to come pretty close to satisfying most everyone's needs and ensuring that we have covered the broad spectrum.

The Chair: We could start at 1:30 as opposed to 2 o'clock. So start at 1:30 and schedule two Monday mornings?

Mr B. Ward: And invite the OFA.

The Chair: Yes.

The committee adjourned at 1649.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 22 January 1991

The committee met at 1004 in room 228.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION

TORONTO-DOMINION BANK

The Chair: Please introduce yourself and the people with you.

Dr Peters: I am Douglas Peters, the chief economist at the Toronto-Dominion Bank. I have with me Dr Ruth Getter, who is a senior economist in the bank. We are here to present our views on the outlook for the Canadian economy. Dr Getter is the person in my department who handles that particular forecast. She is going to make the presentation to you for a few minutes and then we will be quite happy to answer any questions you might have.

Dr Getter: Good morning, everybody. First of all, I have handed out three pieces of information. This is Canada's Business Climate, which is our latest macro-forecast, which was just released I think at the end of December. That was obviously before the war started, but it gives you our latest view.

Report on Ontario: Recession and Recovery is something I put together a couple of weeks ago for the department, for our clients, for internal purposes, and I thought it would be appropriate to bring it here, because that is our latest view on Ontario. That was done on the basis of that macro-forecast.

The third item is Report on Provincial Finances, and what I would like to stress here is that this was done on the basis of last year's budget. It is a comparison of all the different fiscal positions of the different provinces, but it is obviously based on what we now know to be obsolete information, especially for Ontario, so please bear that in mind. I just brought it to you in case you want to make any kind of interprovincial comparisons. That is the most comprehensive data one can get. We will do another one of these when all the provincial budgets are released this year.

By the way, if this committee would like to have our regular updates and publications about provincial economies or anything, please let me know because we make those available to whoever wants them. I know Treasury gets all our stuff, but if anyone on the committee wants it, that is fine.

The Chair: If you could put us on the mailing list, that would be fine.

Dr Getter: I need a card, a name, whatever, a post office box.

I would like to be as brief as I can so you can ask the questions you really want answers to, but I would like to set the stage a little. I will very briefly go over our macro-outlook and then talk about what we think is going to happen in Ontario. Then we can open up to various policy issues as you like, and both myself and Dr Peters will be happy to answer your questions.

In this morning's paper, in the report on Canada it says, "Pitfalls at every turn for politicians," because of the uncertain situation in the world today. There are pitfalls at every turn for economists who are trying to predict the future today. As we look at what is going on in the world, it changes moment by moment. I heard this morning that Iraq is bombing or blowing up some oilfields, so we know what that is going to do to the markets and to oil prices today. It is a little difficult to predict the future, so bear that in mind, too, but I will do the best I can.

The one thing I can talk about with some certainty is what happened in 1990, so let me do that very quickly. We know Canada has been in a recession since early 1990. We got into it in the second quarter and we have been in it ever since. Manufacturing actually went into decline before that, starting in 1989, as we know in Ontario certainly. The growth for the year in 1990 we estimate at 0.8%, less than 1%, which is the lowest since 1982, so there was still some positive growth, but it was very, very low. The weakness in the economy is very widespread. It is not just a single sector that is affected or one or two sectors. Every single sector in the economy was affected: housing, autos, investment, profits, merchandise trade, consumer expenditures, retail trade. Everybody got it.

In terms of industries, again it was very widespread. Industrial production in particular went down almost 4%, we estimate. Residential construction, manufacturing are very badly hit. The goods producing sector declined by 1.2%. The services industries were still growing at about 2%, but that is pretty sluggish.

The unemployment rate was up to 9.3% in December and in June it had been 7.5%. So the decline which started in the second quarter accelerated in the second half of the year. The unemployment numbers are really the best indicator of that, of how quickly that decline happened. The housing numbers also reflect that. Housing starts in particular we know are very bad. The numbers came out yesterday. We had estimated 182,000 and it ended up being 181,630. But that was significantly lower than 215,000 the year before. Bankruptcies in general across the country are running 40% to 50% above 1989 levels.

That is the bad news, and there is more to come, I am sorry to say. I think Mr Cross of Statistics Canada said he looked at all his numbers and said, "I can't find anything good to say," and that is kind of how I feel. There is really very little good to say.

The Chair: Unfortunately, we could not get Mr Cross to come here and give us his numbers and any projection of where he would go. We did invite him.

Dr Getter: I am giving you his numbers. That is where I get mine.

The Chair: Statistics Canada?

Dr Getter: Phil Cross gathers the statistics, which are then available to everybody.

My next subheading says, "What will happen in 1991?" I am a lot less sure about that. First of all, there is the Gulf war; eight question marks follow that. The approach I would like to take, which is the only rational one to take, is that it is not going to be a catastrophic war where the entire world blows up. If it does, then there is nothing to talk about. I am assuming, but economists are allowed to assume. I am assuming the world is not going to blow up, and given that assumption—okay, we assume there will be some impact from the war. It is not going to be wonderful, and it might be protracted and there might be problems in terms of oil and inflation and so on. But I have to take the view that it is not going to be the worst of news and it is not going to be the best of news. The early euphoria is, I think, dissipated. I do not think this war is going to be over tomorrow.

But there is one thing I would like to point out. Maybe it is a bit of good news. I am trying desperately to find something good to say. The world right now is awash in oil. There are tons and tons and barrels and barrels of oil around, and one of the reasons the price of oil went below $20 is precisely for that reason. People know that. I would say we certainly have about six months' worth of oil supplies, that we really do not have to panic. That is the good news. Oil prices, I would suspect, are going to climb today; I think they already started climbing last night. But I do not see them going up to $40, $50 or whatever, not in the short term, because in the short term there is enough strategic reserve to carry us through for at least six months. If the war is over by then, we will be all right.

Given that there is a war which is going to continue, say, for six months without major impact on oil prices, we expect the recession to continue through the first and second quarters of this year at least. Hopefully, if things go as well as they can possibly go, we will start coming out of it in the third quarter. We can talk about the risks to this forecast later.

I expect a decline in output in the economy of 1.2%. You have our forecast at the back of this Report on Ontario; on the back page you have our forecast for Canada as a whole and then for all the provinces. If you want to follow it there, that is fine. The reason there is a decline of 1.2% in 1991 is because we are starting the year off very badly, and even though we may start to recover in the third and fourth quarters it will not be enough to give us positive growth for the year. The effect of the recession is all going to show up in the numbers. If you look at annual numbers, it will show up in 1991.

Again, all our key indicators will decline. That you can follow more in detail in this booklet, so I will not go through it. But consumption, investment, housing, exports, profits—across-the-board declines in all of these variables.

The unemployment rate we expect will average 10% in 1991. It will go up to about 10.3%, 10.5%. We hope that will be as high as it will go nationwide in the second quarter, and then will start to decline. I am not going to go into great detail about how terrible every single variable will be. You can ask about it if you like.

There was a great deal of discussion last year about the effect of the GST. What I am seeing and what I saw before it was actually implemented is that the news is a lot better than we thought. Because the economy is so weak, the inflationary impact of the GST has been dampened, and we see that businesses are swallowing the GST. They are giving people rebates or they are just eating it, so prices are not going up as high as we would have expected. The government said 1.25%, 1.5% inflationary impact. I do not think that is going to happen.

The CPI just came out this morning, and I think it went down in December from November by .1%. It was 5% year over year in December and it was a decline month to month in December, which is quite unusual. I think that is good news. If we do not have an explosion of oil prices and the GST inflationary impact is not very strong, that is very good news, because I think many of us were very concerned that an economy that is already flat on its back gets hit by an inflationary hit, the Bank of Canada tightens up and the economy really cannot revive. In that sense that is good news.

We had expected inflation to be above 6%, and that is what you will find in our forecast here. We had expected it to be 6.3%. I think that is too high now; I believe it is going to be closer to 5% or 5.5%, less than 6% anyway. I think the initial resistance to the tax will eventually dissipate. I think within six months people will have adjusted to it. There are still some noises but in the end they will have to swallow it and they will get used to it.

I think the one factor that could still be affected by that would be the new housing, because the GST affects new houses and not resale houses. That is one sector that we expect will still be hit by that, because it is a significant chunk on every sale.

Some speculation about what is going to happen in terms of monetary policy by the federal government: We expect interest rates to continue to fall steadily, unless of course there is a real inflationary push from the war or other problems. The fear of the GST induced inflation was overstated, so I think that Mr Crow will continue to lower interest rates steadily. I think we have just revised our interest rate forecast and are expecting 10 to 20 basis points.

Dr Peters: I think it is 10 to 20 basis points a week on the bank rate, which would give you a prime rate reduction each month for maybe five or six months, with some stall in between maybe, but certainly a markedly lower rate of interest by midyear.

Dr Getter: We are looking at prime at 10.25% by midyear and 9.75% by the end. It is not a forecast of prime. Based on what the governor will do, we expect prime will be under 10% by the end of the year. The Canadian dollar continues to remain strong. It ought to be a lot power, but it remains strong. Mr Crow has more room to manoeuvre because of low inflation, the high dollar and the very weak economy. He has more room to manoeuvre. He can lower interest rates and hopefully he will continue to do that. Everything is contingent on what is going to happen in the Middle East, but the Federal Reserve System has been easing, and as the Fed continues to ease that gives him more incentive and room to ease as well.

So we are looking at an easier monetary policy now. People wonder at what point the economy is going to start booming because we are lowering interest rates. You are not going to see the effect until there has been a sustained decline month after month. Then at some point, hopefully by the second half of the year, people will realize that maybe they can start spending again. But it is not going to happen right away. People have to see a sustained policy change, because he has been going in the opposite direction for so long.

In terms of fiscal policy, the federal government really has its hands tied. It has a huge deficit. It cannot spend, so it cannot stimulate the economy, which is what its mandate presumably is during a recession. It will have a larger than expected deficit because of the recession and higher than expected interest payments, because obviously its own forecasts for interest rates were too low. It is really stuck in terms of what it can do.

This is my own personal view. I think the GST revenues are going to exceed expectations and that is going to bail them out to some degree. That, I would like to stress, is my own hunch. I do not know that. There is no way to know that, and part of the problem with the GST is that nobody knows that, but my feeling is that revenues from the GST will probably be higher than they expected and that will be useful. There is an election year coming up and maybe they will somehow find some money, but overall I do not see the federal government being very expansionary in its fiscal policy.

Very quickly, US and global developments: The US is in a recession and in a war. I would like to say that the problems in the banking system—and I am talking about the big banks; I am not talking about the savings and loans. The commercial banking systems in the States, as far as I am concerned, are far worse than we know them to be. I think that because of this war and this crisis it has all been shoved under the carpet, and when this crisis is over I think we will see the real disaster that is lying under there. So I think that their financial system is extremely vulnerable and fragile and we have not even begun to see how bad it is. The savings and loan problem is the tip of the iceberg. That is something to keep in mind.

The Chair: Could I just interject a question at that point? One of the major causes of the depression in 1929 was the beginning of the bank failures both in Europe and in the United States caused by the Treaty of Versailles and the amount of money that was being moved around. Is this really a hidden domino card? I mean, are we looking at a really major factor in the American economy if these savings and loans and banks start going under?

Dr Getter: I do not think it is going to be the same degree as it was, but I would like Dr Peters, perhaps, to address this question.

Dr Peters: The question in the United States is not a depression-causing type of banking change; it is very much of an institutional change going on in the banking system. Five years from now we may indeed look at the US financial system and find that the largest names in that financial system are not banks but rather are other concerns such as Sears, GE Capital, American Express and other items. So, there is a very great deal of institutional change going on in the US financial system.

The question about the banking system and failures there is very difficult to assess, I think there are serious problems and I really do not know if that is going to be a question that is going to cause any serious economic—it does not have to cause serious economic repercussions; it may cause serious fiscal repercussions for the US government because of its massive deposit insurance guarantees and because of the bail-outs. That has already happened at the savings and loans, and if there are major banking problems you may get other major fiscal problems because of those questions.

I do not think, though, that necessarily will translate into the kind of depression that you had in 1929-33. In that instance, it was the depression that caused the banking failures, not the other way around. It is very difficult to say; the reparations were part of the postwar problem, but that was not the banking failures related necessarily to that. It was the depression itself that caused the massive banking failures in the US.

So, in this case we have a very large financial problem, its impact on the real economy, on employment and output and that may be considerably less than and certainly not depression. That is certainly not my idea on the matter at all. Does that make it a little clearer? Have I answered your question at all or have I fudged it? Maybe I have not answered your question because really, maybe I do not know the answer.

Mr Stockwell: That happens around here a lot.

Dr Peters: I am willing to admit that I have not got the answers.

Dr Getter: I just would like to add something to that. I did a paper, of which perhaps I should have brought a copy—I will be happy to send you one—on debt conditions in Canada versus the US. We are in far better shape than the United States is. What is very interesting is that whenever you publish something that has any positive news, nobody pays any attention whatsoever. So, in this case we have a far stronger banking system, our big companies, our corporate balance sheets are in far better health, we do not have as much debt as the United States does, we did not have that whole leveraged buyout, highly leveraged transaction mania that went on down there. We are in much better shape that way, and we should not instantly assume that just because the United States' banking system is in trouble that we are instantly going to follow.

We have a very different structure, as you know, and Canadians should feel kind of good about their conservative approach to things, because in this case it has served them much better than the American kind of free-for-all behaviour. I think we are going to ride out this recession in pretty good shape.

Let me just finish this up. The big question is, when will the US pull out of this recession? Again, the Gulf war is a big question mark. Clearly, the sooner it pulls out of recession the better it is for us because we are so dependent on them for our exports. But again, that is a question I cannot answer, when exactly they will pull out of it.

I wanted to mention just very briefly—one can talk about this for ever, but very briefly—I think one should remember that there are global trends that have been developing over the last, I do not know, decade or two. I believe that we are going to end up with several large trading blocs. There is going to be the North American trading bloc, which is Canada, the United States and Mexico, the European trading bloc, which as we know is being formed as we speak, and then there is Japan and the Pacific Rim trading bloc, and then maybe one or two others eventually, maybe an east European trading bloc or maybe they will end up being part of the European bloc, I do not know.

I think that the days of looking just at our own sort of national welfare, hiding behind tariff walls, bilateral negotiations and so on are passé. I think anyone who is forward-looking has to realize that being terrified of jobs moving to Mexico is probably not where one should focus. There are all kinds of reasons why it is probably not going to happen anyway in large numbers, but one has to change the way one thinks because we are going to end up in one trading bloc. There is no question about it. It will be called the North American trading bloc. We are already so interlinked globally in every possible way. That is where the future is and that is where we are going. If we pretend that the world has not changed, we would be making a big mistake. I did not mean to lecture. It is just something that bugs me sometimes.

Let's turn to Ontario.

The Chair: That does not necessarily mean we entirely agree with everything she says.

Dr Getter: I do not expect you to. I am just giving you my point of view.

Okay. The slowdown in Ontario started sooner than it did elsewhere. It started in 1989. The decline continued into 1990. The recession has really hit us hard, a lot of layoffs and closures. They are not all related to the free trade agreement. People say why and I think the answer is actually quite self-evident. The harder you go, the harder you fall when the time comes. If you look at the chart, it tells the whole story right here. If you look at the black line, that is Ontario's growth. The other line is the rest of Canada. You see what has been going on through the entire period after the recession.

Ontario has been growing so much faster than the rest of the country. Its recovery started right away after the recession and it took a long time for the rest of the country to catch up. Eventually, when things had to slow down, which they did, Ontario had farther to fall. Everything in the economy had been so overheated that when it came time to cool it down, it was really a quick cool-down period. A lot of it was a function of the overheated real estate market, high interest rates, oversupply, affordability problems and the fear of a downturn; all contributed to total collapse of the market.

We know that both residential and non-residential construction is down and office vacancy rates are climbing. I think the last number I got was like 15% to 20% in Toronto at this point, which is really very high.

The auto sector, which is a key industry here, as we know, has been quite weak for quite a long time. The high Canadian dollar has hurt our exports.

We have been hit in Ontario precisely because we are not such a diversified economy. We have been hit on all sides in our manufacturing, in our construction, in our exports everything. You name it and we got hit. We could talk about the other provinces later on. I am not going to talk about all of them. It is in here too.

Now there is something that has happened, what I call the shake-out effect. I think Ontario's business sector in the last few years has gone through a major shake-out as a result of the free trade agreement, the recession and the GST. The bankruptcies between January and November 1990, which are the latest numbers I have, were running about 70% over a year ago. The interesting part is—and that was published by the government—that there were almost 32,000 layoffs in 1990, which is the highest number since 1982 and the larger proportion of layoffs is permanent layoffs and closures rather than temporary layoffs, which was the case in the last recession. That is really a major change. In 1990 about 50% were complete layoffs and in 1982 it was only 22%. So there has been a real switch there and it shows you that there is something structural going on.

What we are seeing essentially is that companies that cannot compete are not making it. I am going to try to say this in as positive a way as I can. I will read you what I wrote. I said here, "Although it is painful in human terms this does have a positive aspect. It is unfortunate, but it is true, because what is happening is that inefficient and unprofitable firms are forced to compete or else they have to bail out."

Now if it is the law of economics and the law of the jungle, I do not know, but companies that could not compete have fallen by the wayside. People get hurt by that but that is the way it works. When things are booming and everything is wonderful, you know, you can be a marginal producer and you can charge high prices and not be very efficient and you can still make a living. When things are bad, it is the ones who are really competitive who make it and that is what happened. That is exactly what has happened.

In a way, it is good for the Ontario economy, because after this recession you are going to be left with efficient and competitive producers. We have seen this happen in Canada before, in 1986 the oil price collapse in the west. Do you know that at that time I think you had to have a price of oil of $30 or something in order to be profitable. The producers that are left in Alberta right now can be quite profitable at $15 a barrel and those are the only ones that are left. They bought each other out, or they went out of business, or they rationalized, or they became more efficient or they cut back their costs or whatever, but they can now make a living at $15 a barrel. So it was a very difficult time for the west and it did have very high human costs, but it made for a much more efficient economy.

I think that Ontario is going through a rough time, but there is something that will be gained from this. I hope you understand that I do not think it is wonderful. I am just telling you what it means.

The outlook for Ontario: My feeling is that Ontario's economy is essentially very healthy. Ontario's economy is not an energy-intensive economy, it is not a fish-intensive economy, it is not a Japanese-investment-based economy. It is very diversified and I think it is essentially structurally very healthy. It is not suffering from any basic structural defects at all.

The underlying fundamentals in this province have not changed just because we have gone through a bad time. Our location—we are lucky—vis-à-vis the rest of Canada and the United States is that we have access to the largest markets. I think you are the one who likes to say that we are closer to—how do you say it about the market?

Dr Peters: We are closer to more larger American cities than any American city, in Toronto and this area, and we have within a 500- or 600-mile radius a phenomenally sized market that is easily accessible by rail, air or truck communication. That 500 miles will take you virtually from Boston to Washington to Chicago and that will include all the major cities in the northeastern United States. So Toronto and central southwestern Ontario are particularly well situated, better situated physically than almost any major American city that you would like to name.

Dr Getter: If what I said before will turn out to be right, that we are going to end up with a North American market, then we are in an ideal situation to take advantage of those markets. So we are very fortunate in that sense.

We have the majority of the population and production in this country, we have the most diversified economy, we have got everything. Our agriculture sector I believe is larger than any other provincial agriculture sector including Saskatchewan's, which sounds a little funny, but that is true. We have mining and we have manufacturing and we are the most diversified economy, which means essentially an environment that is a healthy one.

We have most of the corporate headquarters for domestic and foreign companies, we are the primary destination of foreign immigrants and will continue to be because we already have such a large immigrant population and they tend to come to their families and so on.

We have a very skilled labour force, we are the financial and commercial centre of the nation and we have had phenomenally strong investment during the 1980s. I think people tend to underestimate what has happened here in the 1980s and most of that went into modernizing plants and equipment. Our industrial base, or productive capacity is extremely modern and in very good shape compared to other provinces and states.

In the auto sector, we have also been extremely fortunate. The Big Three are hurting but the Japanese and the transplants are doing extremely well, thank you very much, and some of them are right here. We are benefiting from that, and if they continue to do well, it means employment for us and continued growth. We are very fortunate that we are not just dependent on the Big Three.

We expect the Ontario economy to begin to recover at the end of this year, the second half of this year, and in 1992 we expect growth of 3.2% which is quite respectable, and 4.4% in 1993. We expect to come out of this recession, as we did out of the last one, very quickly and quite strongly.

The unemployment rate, we expect to drop. It should be 8.9% this year, 7.3% in 1992 and around less than 6% in 1993.

We expect the housing market to continue to be weak this year. I think it is 58,000 units that we are forecasting. It will continue to be weak for the remainder of this year, there is no question about that, but will start to recover next year and the year after. The underlying demographics are changing but I do not see that there is going to be a total lack of demand for housing. I do not think that is true. There is still going to be an underlying demand. What we saw after the last recession is that there was a huge pent-up demand so we will see that cycle coming in again.

I would say that our longer-range or our medium-term forecast for Ontario is very positive. I do not see anything that is structurally wrong here and there is no reason why we should not do very well starting the end of this year if all goes well elsewhere.

Some of the issues that I thought need to be considered, I am just going to list them. This may sound clichéish but I think it is true, I think competitiveness is the key to Ontario's future economic health. The free trade agreement is entering its third year and more and more tariffs are being reduced. Canadian consumers, interestingly enough, precisely because of this recession, are becoming much more sophisticated and price conscious. They are no longer willing to pay prices they know to be higher than they should be. So they are going to demand competitive prices or they will shop elsewhere, and we know where.

Now, the tax structure in Ontario: Various studies have been done and people say, "Well, Ontario, there's too much taxes and so on." I believe that if you take in all the taxes, including the health care costs and so on, Ontario still has a competitive tax structure but I think we need to keep an eye on that. I know the gap between Quebec and Ontario has been narrowing, but between Ontario and the US I think we are still okay.

I think essentially that is all I wanted to present formally. Unless you have something to add, we can open it up to questions or whatever.

Mrs Sullivan: I have a couple of questions, one relating to your estimates on the timing of the recovery. We were interested yesterday in hearing from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics that its view was that the recovery in Ontario following this recessionary period would be slower than that which followed the 1982 period, and in fact slower than some of the other provinces, including the western provinces. Your view is that Ontario will lead the rest of the country during the recovery period. I would like your comments on that.

The second thing is that I was quite taken with your remarks about the difficulty in the federal government providing a stimulus to the economy. If you were planning public policy in Ontario and saw a need for stimulation of the economy, where would you put your dollars and how many dollars would you put in?

Dr Getter: Do you want to answer it or do you want me to? I can do the timing one; maybe you want to take care of the stimulus. We will split this one, all right?

In terms of the timing, I think you need to think about it in this way: The west has not gone into a recession in the same way Ontario has, so you do not have this drop. They are kind of bouncing along, maybe flattening out a bit. They have been going this way. Pardon me, but you can follow me, right? We have gone all the way down to negative. We are the only province that has negative growth rate in 1990. So we have gone all the way down, and then when we start to pick up we will be going this way. We are not going to continue down there.

The other province that has been sort of growing positively or flat will come up a little bit. They are not going to start booming because they are coming from a high base already. There is a lag. What has been going on here will eventually—it is already happening—affect the provinces in the west. Certainly the housing markets in the west are weakening. We know that in British Columbia the forestry sector is in terrible trouble. So in the same way that Ontario got hit sooner, their impact will hit later. That happened in the last recession as well. British Columbia did not come out of its recession until 1984.

As I mentioned before, Ontario is so diversified. It is not dependent on any one thing. As soon as consumer confidence recovers and as soon as hopefully—again, the big wild card here is the gulf war. Assuming that does not turn into a disaster and confidence comes back, Ontario will start to pick up all across the board. I see that they are going to start growing just as rapidly as they did before, maybe not by 7% or 8%, and I did not say 7% or 8%; I said 3% or 4%, which is not astronomically fast growth but it is faster than the rest of the country.

Dr Peters: If I might add to that, you are quite right that Ontario will not pull out of this recession as rapidly as it pulled out of the 1981-82 recession. If you look at this front chart, you will see that the growth rates in the two years after the recession in Ontario were 6% and over 8%. We are forecasting 3%, 3.2% and 4.4%, obviously much slower rates of growth than coming out of the 1982 recession, but then of course the 1981-82 recession was a deeper recession too. So that was one.

You were asking me where you would put the money and how much. It depends on how much money you have.

Mrs Sullivan: At least $700 million.

Dr Peters: I think in a recessionary period there should be room for some discretionary spending on the part of governments, particularly where there are particular things that might be built that would be very useful in the future. There was a time here when, for example, you would have surplus excess supplies of building material where contractors and such are not at full, where you might get better prices on buildings if you needed those particular things.

I think there may be some room for that in a recession although planning that sort of thing does take a long time in implementation. Usually the recognition problem is one that when you recognize you are in a recession, you plan a spending program and by the time you are spending the money, it is in a boom period again.

If you could, at this moment, build a building that was already planned and was on the drawing boards and ready to go, you might be able to get it built for less. I think that would be an advantage to Ontario, if they needed that project, schools, university buildings or things of that nature that would be needed in the future, and if you could get it done during a recessionary period, it would be an advantage.

How much? I do not think the Ontario government has a lot of room to move on that because I do not think you could set up a spending program quickly enough that you would be able to institute it before you were again moving out of a recession and into a boom period. You may indeed just exacerbate a boom instead of having it on a recession.

The old idea was that you would have projects on the drawing board so that you could, in a recessionary period, put those spending things forth, the things that were needed. I do not know whether there are things on the drawing board here, but if there are, I would suggest that the Ontario Legislature could indeed move those things forward to be put on the books now. I think there is some room for that. I would not like to give you a dollar amount, though.

Mrs Sullivan: If there is stimulating spending done, it should be done now rather than in May.

Dr Peters: Two or three years from now, when we are growing at 4% or 4.5% and booming.

Mrs Sullivan: But I am talking about within a very short period of time, in a fiscal year period. Now would be the time to put the money in rather than, say, March or April or May.

Dr Peters: As opposed to—

Mrs Sullivan: Of this year.

Dr Peters: I am not thinking of that short a period. I am thinking of the next six or eight months. This calendar year would be a better year to have spending actually occur, where the jobs are done, where the actual construction is done, where the roads are paved or what have you. Whatever it is, it would be this calendar year, if you could do it, rather than planning a project, having the architects draw the plans, setting it up and spending the money in 1994. That is always the problem with a major construction.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to ask, you do seem to be a little more optimistic than what some other groups have said about that. I wanted to maybe tie a couple of areas in, one about interest rates. You said we have an easing of monetary policy and our interest rates are coming down. We certainly have been hearing that they are coming down, but there is the question of closing the gap between our interest rates and American interest rates, if we are going to have some, I guess, maybe true easing of monetary policy. I do not think I caught you touching on that.

Dr Getter: I alluded to it, but not directly.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. Whether you see the gap closing.

Dr Getter: This is one of Dr Peters's favourite topics, as you may know, so I will leave it to him.

Dr Peters: We have seen some narrowing in that gap in short-term interest rates from about 5.5 percentage points down to about 4.5 percentage points recently. I would suggest that we would see a narrowing of that gap throughout the year, but not down to zero, which would be, in my view, where it should be. In other words, the government of Canada should be borrowing on Treasury bill rates at about the same level as the US government on 90 days, unless you expect exchange rates to change. That would be a target.

The movement down in longer-term rates is a little more difficult. We usually have a difference between Canada and US long-term bond rates of about 90 to 100 basis points, one percentage point. That has been up over two percentage points recently. It is down a little bit from about 2.4 to about two percentage points. I am a little less sanguine about that falling back to one percentage point. There are some difficulties there.

I would think, though, that as our inflation rate becomes a little better, as we sort of get over this GST worry in the early part of this year, as Canada's inflation rate improves, the US inflation rate, if not running at much different than ours, will be lower than ours for the next while because of the GST. So Canada gets back to a lower inflation rate. I would think that even that long-term bond rate would narrow a little bit, maybe not down to 1%, but maybe down to 1.5% or 1.75% or something like that.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, one other question: You also mentioned when you were talking about the layoffs how a larger proportion of them were permanent closings than in the 1982 one. You are forecasting that we are not going to go as quickly as that, but I am still wondering, with all those closings, whether we are in as good a position as last time to have a complete recovery, obviously not as quick, but are we still in a position to have as good a recovery given the fact that the Ontario economy seems to be in at least a transition phase due to free trade and maybe some other things? Have we set the infrastructure and resources properly to take advantage of that? Taking that one step farther, do you have any recommendations as to how the government can help Ontario business take further advantage of research and development and things of that nature?

Dr Getter: I have been tracking layoffs, and actually I do not think we have seen the worst of it because many of the layoffs that were announced last year are not going to take effect until early this year. So we are going to start seeing these numbers climbing a lot this year. We are not finished yet.

I am glad you asked the question because it is something I wanted to mention and I did not. There is one thing that is very different in this recession than the last one, in the manufacturing sector particularly, and that is what has been going on with inventories. When we went into the last recession, we had very high inventories. When we came out of that recession, we had a year and one half worth of inventories to sell off before we could start production.

If you have cars sitting in a huge lot and you have to sell all those thousands of cars, you are not going to open up your car production plants until you have sold them. What business has done this time, and this is a structural change, is it has kept inventory levels extremely low. You have heard of this just-in-time inventory. They literally have two hours worth of inventory or some such thing. The trucks are coming in and it goes right on the assembly line or whatever.

I believe that is going to make a big difference in the way the recovery takes place. The minute we get a feeling that consumer confidence is returning and business confidence is returning, plants are going to open up and you are going to get people back into employment much quicker than you did last time. I think that is the key.

One of the reasons we have had these closures and layoffs and employment has really dropped very quickly is because businesses are managing their people the same way they are managing their inventories. They are keeping their people inventory as low as possible. In the last recession, no one had an idea how bad things were going to get, so the last thing you did was to fire the employees who had worked for you for 40 years. This time you fired the guy who worked for you for 40 years and you certainly got rid of the guy who just got on three months ago.

Business has learned a very important lesson from the last recession and I think this is going to have a big impact on the way we come out of this one. We became leaner and meaner, I am sorry to say, but in a way that means that we are going to come out of this sort of running rather than sort of crawling. So I hope this answered part of your question.

Mr Sutherland: The other part was in terms of allowing us to recover. If things are leaner and meaner and that is good in terms of the quickness of recovery, there are still a lot of unemployed people out there. In terms of helping either current businesses expand and new businesses develop, from the public policy standpoint, maybe some suggestions as to what the government could be doing in research and development and other areas.

Dr Peters: Research and development are always a plus in an economy, but what we have done over the past little while is make a major investment in business machinery and equipment, and the business investment boom of the last little while left Ontario with very modern plant and that has—now that does not help the business that goes under in the small area where there is little mobility.

I would have thought that one of the things the government might do is to help labour mobility through training programs, to improve the training programs, to improve the skills of the people who have been laid off so that they can move and are able to move into the newer jobs, where the jobs are, and to encourage that kind of a movement. That, I think, would be much more effective in the short term. Research and development, of course, has payoffs but only very long-term payoffs. I would not downgrade those, but I think in the short term labour mobility, labour training and skills development are some key items.

Mr Christopherson: Dr Getter, you mentioned that you are still confident that in the third quarter we will begin to pull out of the recession, albeit more slowly than out of the last recession in the early 1980s. Some people are less optimistic and are more pessimistic that indeed it will maintain a negative position all the way through the year, and that we will not really start to pull out until the first quarter of 1992. Two questions: One is, could you just briefly indicate why you are still confident that it is the third quarter when we are going to pull out. The other question would be, what indicators will you be looking at in the second and third quarters of this year to determine whether or not that outlook is still going to happen?

Dr Getter: First of all, I am always being lambasted because I am too pessimistic. The Ontario government has been giving me a very hard time because I came out with a negative number for 1990 and now presumably I am being lambasted for being too optimistic, so you cannot win around here.

Mr Christopherson: Certainly do not read lambasting into my question to be. It was the farthest thing from my mind.

Dr Getter: The other thing I would like to take exception to is that you said I am confident we are going to come out of it in the third quarter. I am not confident of anything. I do not know how tomorrow is going to be. I am sort of suspending my judgement about what is going to happen in the Middle East. As I said, the end of the world could come tomorrow.

But assuming that nothing too terrible happens, the reason I think we are going to come out of it in the third quarter and the reason I am more optimistic now than I was, say, a month ago is the GST impact. The GST impact is far less than everyone feared and I really believe that is going to make a big difference. Everyone worried that the GST would cause inflation to go up, that consumers would pull back, that the Bank of Canada would raise interest rates, that this would contract the economy some more and it would go into a spiral and then we would not get out of this.

I am saying that we were prepared for the worst. The recession is so bad that the GST is not having that kind of impact. Consumers are going to learn to handle it, and by the middle of this year the GST will be part of life, just like all other taxes are, and the inflationary impact will be gone, so we will not have the monetary policy response.

By the end of the second quarter, we will have been in a recession for five quarters. That is a long time. By the time consumers have had a chance to kind of stop being so afraid. It does not seem to me that things are going to continue to escalate in a negative direction; in other words the decline is not going to continue to accelerate.

We are not saying that we are dropping faster and faster. As a matter of fact, the housing numbers that came out yesterday were much higher than even the CMHC had expected, for the last quarter, the last three months of the year. I do not see anything other than the war, again, unforeseen things, to paint a doomsday scenario. I really think that after five quarters of recession, with inventories being down to about zero, with consumers sort of finally having faced reality and said, "Okay, no need to panic," we will start coming out of it. I really do believe that.

Dr Peters: If I might add one further factor, the one further factor is the central bank. It seems to have recognized that there is a recession. I even heard one reporter say the governor mentioned the word "recession" just last Thursday, I think, for the first time, and the central bank has had some recognition—interest rates are falling. If you want to know what I am going to be looking at in June and July for a recovery, I am going to be looking at how low interest rates have dropped. If we have interest rates down substantially, clearly the mortgage rates are off substantially and that is going to be a plus for housing, that makes housing much more affordable, it makes consumer durables more affordable. That is going to be the one factor I look at.

Mr Sutherland: And the gap related to interest rates or no?

Dr Getter: It also depends on the dollar.

Dr Peters: The gap will tell us about the dollar. The Canadian dollar will also be a key factor.

Dr Getter: One of the things I do is look at numbers all the time. I have what I call my daily update sheet and I literally put in the numbers as they come in. The key thing I always look at is employment, because that is our earliest and most accurate indicator of what is going on. There is another indicator I love, which is the help wanted index, which also comes out very early, and it is a terrific leading indicator. You could see what was happening in this economy three months ahead by looking at the help wanted index. It tells you how many help wanted ads there are in newspapers. It was sliding down, and if you followed employment, it went right with it. That is one thing.

Manufacturing shipments, auto sales and housing are the key ones I tend to look at. Housing is going to recover more slowly, but I can see where auto sales would be one of the earlier ones to pick up, because I think consumers especially were very spooked by the GST; they did not know what to do. That will be one of the first ones to recover, and that is what I would keep my eye on.

But essentially I look at everything as it comes out, and usually you see a consistent story. When the signs turn either all negative or all positive, you know there is something going on.

The Chair: Given that our next presenter is here, I will allow two very quick questions, one from Mr Phillips and one from Mr Jamison.

Mr Phillips: Your judgement is that in the manufacturing sector there is a kind of sorting out going on. By the way, you are far more optimistic. I feel a lot better now than I did an hour ago.

Dr Getter: I may be totally wrong, you understand.

Mr Phillips: Some of us have the perception that there is a sorting out going on. Some, as you say, are going out of business, but others are moving out of the province and therefore when we tramp the accelerator in six months we may be tramping plants that are not located here. That would be my first part, whether that is an exaggerated thing or not.

The second one is that you mentioned you are not too concerned about debt. I gather you include government, personal and corporate debt. Is there any advice you have for us in terms of the Ontario deficit and debt, whether that is something we should be thinking about or whether in financial terms we should not worry too much about it?

The third one: The renowned Dr Peters often is quoted on the value of the Canadian dollar. What do you feel we should be thinking about as a realistic Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the US and, as we head towards that, what is the fallout? There are lots of benefits to a lower Canadian dollar in terms of exports-imports, but what are the fallouts we might see?

Dr Getter: I can answer the first two and you can answer the dollar.

In terms of the plants moving out, I have been following in the newspapers closures, day by day and month by month, and it is kind of depressing. I have tried to sort out the causes of why they close and where they are going, if they are going anywhere, and I would say it is exaggerated. There is this idea that there is a wholesale closing down of plants and they are all going down to the States and that is the end of it. I would say it is a very small proportion. Many of the plants that are closing are moving their operations elsewhere, either within Ontario or to another province; that happens in some cases. But many of them just close. They do not necessarily move to the States or anywhere else.

Most of them are not closures in general, they are mostly just—what do they call it?—reductions in workforce. They have these euphemisms for things like that. But I think there is in the press an exaggeration of the number of plants that are fleeing the province. I think there is more of what they call a rationalization going on. You could have, let's say, three companies producing the same thing and you now have two producing the same thing. Yes, there are some people who no longer have jobs, but the production is still taking place and the productive capacity is there.

The second question was debt. I would not say I am not worried about debt. What I said was that relative to what is going on in the United States, Canada is in much better shape. I do not know if we want to go into a long discussion about that.

The Chair: We really do not have that much time.

Dr Peters: One or two words, then, on that. As a banker, I would think you would always be worried about debt and always concerned about it. That will keep your banker much happier.

Dr Getter: Assuming they want to keep their banker happy. I think you had a question about the Canadian dollar and where it should be.

Dr Peters: The Canadian dollar I felt is too high. As Ruth said, it may not be the plant closures that matter; there have been maybe some missed opportunities because of the high Canadian dollar, and that has been a problem. I would think the Canadian dollar should be at 80 cents, 82 cents; anywhere around that level is a sustainable level. Most manufacturers, if you ask them, I think would agree that that is a reasonable level, that they can compete much more effectively in the United States market at that level than they can at the 86-cent, 87-cent level.

Mr Jamison: My question is about the effect on manufacturers of the high value of our dollar. I guess the question I could ask from that is what you see happening—obviously, you follow the lead of the Bank of Canada in many cases—with the Canadian dollar and its value on the international monetary market in the next year or so, taking into account that you have said very clearly that you expect recovery to begin after the second quarter. What do you see happening with the dollar and its value? I ask that question particularly because many of the small, medium and large manufacturers I have been talking with have expressed very clearly that the value of the dollar is crucial to their ability to do business offshore.

Dr Peters: I agree with you that that is a crucial number and that we have had a great deal of difficulty in some of our manufacturing industries in competing, with a dollar at 86 cents or 87 cents. If our forecast of interest rates is correct, that interest rates decline and that we get a narrowing spread between Canada and US rates, some easing in the Canadian dollar—we have already seen a little of that—you would see the Canadian dollar somewhat lower than it is by year-end. That is a forecast, and it is very difficult to put foreign exchange rates into a forecast. I am loathe to give you an exact number simply because the events in the war, Canada regarded as a safe haven if the war heats up, could move the Canadian dollar upwards very quickly, or a settlement could move it down. A lower price of oil—were regarded as a petrocurrency, so we could move.

Forecasting movements of the dollar in a fairly narrow range is very difficult. I would think we will probably get down by maybe two or three cents by year-end, but that is on a trend, and you can have those size of movements in a day. So I hasten to say please do not quote me. Forecasting foreign exchange rates is very difficult and fraught with danger and all sorts of possibilities. The tendency would be, in putting that forecast together, of interest rates and exchange rates narrowing, there would be a lower exchange rate. That is the trend.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for heeding our invitation and coming and speaking to us and taking time out of your day. I think as a committee we have a better perspective on where this economy is going. Any other information you could pass along to this committee that would help us in our decision-making process would be greatly appreciated.

REGIONAL MUNICIPALITY OF HAMILTON-WENTWORTH

The Chair: As we are running a little behind, I think we could move on to the next presentation. Mr Agostino, if you would like to begin.

Mr Agostino: First, I want to thank the committee for giving me the opportunity to be here today to present some points of view and some inputs as to possible initiatives in the upcoming provincial budget. I think this initiative by the province to hold these hearings is to be commended. It is an approach that we at the municipal level certainly appreciate, and we are hoping our input will have some role in the setting of the budget for Ontario for the upcoming year.

The focus of my presentation will be primarily in the area of financing of municipal government by the province and primarily as it relates to what I think is the area of biggest concern, the social services aspect and the spiralling costs of the municipalities of this province providing full services on a cost-sharing basis that we clearly feel is inadequate. The view I will talk about today is going to focus somewhat on Hamilton-Wentworth, which is the situation I am most familiar with, of course, as chairman of the health and social services committee. However, our views are not limited to Hamilton. I think the problem is province-wide. It is not unique. The percentage of increases in social services and welfare rates may vary from municipality to municipality, but clearly it is a problem right across Ontario.

I know this committee will give us a sympathetic ear, and with the former chairman of our committee, our MPP, David Christopherson, a former colleague on council, and others on this committee, we will hopefully get something through and get some input into the decision.

I want to give something of a statistical overview of our situation in Hamilton-Wentworth. I am basically here to ask that the province first consider providing emergency funding for the general welfare assistance deficit across our region and, I would assume, across Ontario; second, that the recommendations made by the Social Assistance Review Committee and the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review Committee report following that of 100% funding by the provincial government for general welfare assistance and social services rates in Ontario be implemented as quickly as possible.

I realize that Premier Rae has said a number of times that this government does not deal in crisis management, does not deal in emergency type of management. However, I think we also have to understand that the municipalities across this province have very limited resources, very limited methods of collecting revenue, primarily the property tax base, which I think we all agree is a regressive, archaic and unfair way of collecting taxes, and it is putting an unbelievable strain on our taxpayers, who are getting hit on all sides.

The province, of course, has many more resources. I think in tough economic times we need a large infusion of social services dollars. We need funding to be enhanced tremendously, particularly in the area of support and counselling for clients, and obviously to pay the rates that municipalities are mandated to do.

In 1990, Hamilton-Wentworth reached its highest total of general welfare assistance rates in its history. The highest before this was at the height of the recession in 1982, when it was 9,350. Unfortunately, in December of last year our rates hit 9,845, which is the highest this region has ever accumulated. This may seem small compared to Metropolitan Toronto, but obviously our population, our tax base and everything else is much smaller, and it is quite significant. It is a 63% increase from the previous year in our particular region. So we have exceeded our rate and I think this recession is only commencing.

We have increased staff by 17 people in our own department to try to deal with the case load, but we still have workers carrying cases of 130 to 140 and up, which makes it totally inadequate to address the problems the clients are facing. All we are doing is really processing cheques and ensuring people get their cheques on time. It does not allow for anything else. That is an unreasonable expectation.

In 1991, unfortunately the situation does not look any better. We are projecting approximately 11,000 cases per month in our region, which would mean an additional $7 million of regional net dollars. This is, of course, only 20% of the total cost, but the additional $7 million would be added to the approximately $10 million the region now pays out of its tax base for general welfare assistance. It is almost 10% of our total budget, and it is just unmanageable.

These projections for this year of the $17 million in my view may be conservative, based on the economic downturn. We could face a plant shutdown and we could face layoffs which would totally throw this figure right out the window. As it now stands, taxpayers in our region are going to face a 4% to 5% increase at the regional level solely due to the dollars our region must pay for welfare assistance.

A number of initiatives in my view should be taken by the province to address this. First, I think the two-tier system now in place must be looked at. Social services in Ontario are delivered under a two-tier system. The FBA and GWA acts must be combined and rewritten to recognize equality and equity for all clients. A single-tier system funded at the provincial level but administered at the municipal level would be preferred.

The rationale is as follows: Municipalities have direct political and financial accountability to the local community. We believe that we can recognize the local needs quickly and respond to emergency situations we have during this economic downturn. Many enhancements, especially in special assistance, have been driven over the years by municipal governments and we are really a catalyst for input into future planning at the local level. The province, of course, has greater access to financial resources to fund these universal programs and can look at the broader needs of the population and co-ordinate with the municipalities.

Another issue that must be addressed in the budget is the cost-sharing, which I have briefly talked about. Municipalities are the managers of the current delivery system. The management process is impeded by limitations to the inadequate funding for administration costs and limitations to staff resources. To be responsive to clients, current staffing levels and cost-sharing must be reviewed. PMSSR must be addressed and must be done immediately.

Increasing case loads have placed programs, especially discretionary programs, at risk. The provincial government must take steps to ensure that programs such as employment services, special income and child care are not abandoned to keep costs down because of case load.

In our particular situation, the cost and the increases are due to three factors, primarily general economic downturn in our community. The number of residents, as I have said, is at a record level. We face a deficit of $2.5 million in 1990 on top of what we had budgeted. That is all coming out of local tax dollars again. We had the Stelco strike—

The Chair: Could I interject with a question at this point? To what extent did your case loads decline after the 1981 recession? For example, you say you went to 9,845 cases. After the recovery began, did that decline significantly or did it remain significantly high?

Mr Agostino: It declined over a period of time. We had projected for this year, for example, an average of cases of about 6,800. It went up to 9,000 and something. It had declined significantly. The community got back on its feet, people were working and it then started up again early last year, of course, and the trend just continued. To reflect that, also our case loads: When we hire people to reduce the case load, we normally go through a period of attrition and we do not simply keep people on when the numbers go down. People are hired on a contract basis so that we do not overstaff, but we want to keep a case load to about 100 cases per worker, which is absolutely impossible at this point.

The general economic downturn, of course, we are facing across Ontario. The changes in unemployment insurance legislation and the passage of Bill C-21, with longer qualifying periods, reduced weeks of benefits and expanded quit-fire disqualification periods, are resulting in additional residents requiring and being eligible for assistance. This change in the legislation will cost our municipality $2.1 million for 1991.

The third aspect, which is one that is not as often recognized, is the whole issue of rationalization of UI payments with social assistance. We have a system with the Workers' Compensation Board that works quite well. While a client is waiting for assistance from WCB, the region pays full service rates to the client. Then once the client receives the money, the back pay from WCB, it deducts that amount from his cheque and forwards it to the municipality. This type of arrangement with UIC has not been able to happen. They do not want to deal with us on this. They do not want to address this issue. They say it is too complicated, it is much too difficult. I realize the federal government finds things much more complicated than the rest of us, but unfortunately this is a serious issue.

Again, the impact of this change across Ontario is clearly in the hundreds of millions of dollars. This would be dollars that this province and our municipality could clearly save if UIC were to implement a system similar to what the Workers' Compensation Board has, where the back pay that is given to an individual is then deducted appropriately to compensate for the money he received through social services. A client does not receive any less money under this system and the municipality is reimbursed, of course, which allows a saving for the municipality and the province. This one particular change would save the province and simply the municipality of Hamilton-Wentworth in excess of $1.9 million. We have had no success whatsoever, but it has added to our total cost.

Another issue that we feel must be addressed is the issue of special assistance. Currently, items for special assistance in the municipalities are cost-shared at 50-50 for welfare and low-income clients, while items with supplementary assistance are cost-shared at 80-20. Both programs burn the local taxpayer. The present structure also is discriminatory, as access differs from municipality to municipality. Therefore, in the municipality that is willing to carry out that program of special assistance, the people in that area, clients, will get this type of service. Areas that do not carry out these programs are left out. We believe that special assistance programs should be made mandatory across Ontario and should be, of course, funded fully by the provincial government, as they fit and qualify under what I think are provincial responsibilities.

Another area of concern is the funding for emergency shelter and assistance. I am just going through the highlights of the brief. You can read it, of course. I am not going to go in detail through the whole brief. The municipality welcomes the Ministry of Community and Social Services announcement of $1 million to ease the pressure on food banks. However, given the present economic conditions these dollars are simply a drop in the bucket and do not in any way, shape or form adequately address the need. I will give you one small example.

There is a food bank in Hamilton that MPP Christopherson is aware of, which is Neighbour to Neighbour on the Mountain. In 1986, when this organization started, it used to deal with an average of 30 families per week. Today it deals with over 2,300 families per week. This is one small organization serving an area of the city that most people would think is a fairly well-off area. That is one of the many food banks we have in a crisis situation in the region. We need the financial assistance to deal with this. Many of the food banks are depending on day-to-day fundraising drives, food drives, and again in tough economic times people are going to cut back. If you used to give $5 to an agency or five cans of food, you are now going to give one, simply because your own situation is much more difficult. So this I think is imperative, for the provincial government to address this more adequately in the budget and to ensure that the food banks are funded adequately to deal with the current crisis that we are facing.

In 1981, the ministry replaced the emergency shelter assistance program with a community support day program. Hamilton-Wentworth will receive $75,000 from this program in 1991. Under the new initiatives, our region expects to receive an additional $40,000 from the ministry. However, the current requests from agencies in our community exceed $360,000 for this need.

We are also hoping that this budget in the area of social services will recognize and address the various ministry responsibilities that go beyond social services. Social services over the years have evolved into a mixed bag of programs which have been conveniently placed within the municipal jurisdiction to local tax dollars' access; for example, the Ministry of Health. We feel that drugs, dental, eyeglasses and assistive devices are health issues and should be rightly funded by the Ministry of Health at 100%. Currently, over $513,000, net, will be paid by our region for such services in 1991.

The second area: We are hoping for some co-ordination within the ministries of Colleges and Universities, Labour, Skills Development and Community and Social Services. The four ministries are all involved in training and education programs for social assistance recipients. There is a definite need for co-ordination within the provincial government and liaison with the federal government to allow easier access to streamlined programs at all levels.

The Ministry of Colleges and Universities should recognize the basic needs of students and not expect municipalities to top up inadequate student awards. In addition, this covenant should offer adequate training allowances through provincial programs which would encourage people to retrain themselves to meet the needs of a changing economy. An immediate step, in our view, would be to clarify eligibility criteria for persons in receipt of OSAP pending a long-term solution by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities assuming responsibility for the basic needs of students, including low-income individuals.

Another area of concern we are hoping, again, that the budget will address is services for seniors. Our seniors population continues to grow and is expected to continue to expand, as it does, right across this province.

Institutional and home support services are changing. Issues specific to Hamilton-Wentworth which must be addressed are of course indicative throughout the province.

First of all is the capital renovations program. The Ministry of Community and Social Services advised that no additional funds are available until 1994 for Hamilton-Wentworth to finish renovations to Macassa Lodge and Wentworth Lodge. We now have one renovated wing and one new wing in each facility and we cannot finish the rest of the building. We then have a double standard of care, a double standard of accommodation and services for clients in the same facility. We were given full assurances by the ministry over the past two years that these programs would be fully funded. We have budgeted our share of the 50% for this, however the program is on hold and in absolute jeopardy unless the Ministry of Community and Social

The program's overall cost is $35 million. Again, if it is a three- or four-year delay, you can see what will happen to that number. It will skyrocket and therefore it will make it difficult at that point for the municipality to be able to afford it, even if the province came through with the full amount of money. So we are hoping that this will be reinstated.

Level of care funding: A cap on municipal homes for the aged—in our situation again, Macassa Lodge—extended care per diems and funding restrictions for the charitable homes for the aged, including St Joseph's Villa, is threatening the number of extended-care-level beds available for the elderly in our community. Interim operating dollars for all approved extended care residences is needed until long-term-care reform is implemented and resolved across Ontario.

Another area I know that this government has spoken on and hopefully will address and will recognize the need for is in the area of emergency shelter funding and for victims of family violence. We have situations in Hamilton, as we do across Ontario, where many of our facilities for victims of family violence—women who have been abused, have had to leave their home situation—are overcrowded. I particularly visited one home about two months ago that was licensed for 19 and had 32 people. In this particular home there were mattresses on the floor, sleeping-bag type of facilities, services that obviously were needed. The organization does a tremendous job of filling that need, but the reality is that there are not enough beds.

Additional to that, what many of the agencies are saying is clear to us: "Look, the answer is not simply adding another 200 beds to the Hamilton-Wentworth region, because adding short-term, emergency beds for victims of family violence without the support services, the counselling, the availability of help for those individuals outside of simply providing a bed is only going to force the woman, the children to go back into a situation that they had escaped from in the first place and make, obviously, a situation much worse than it was when they left it."

They have now taken that bold step. You can imagine the courage and determination it takes for a woman, after years and years, finally to leave that abusive situation. Then she is told after three months: "There is nothing there for you in the community. There is very little in counselling. There is very little in support services." The choices you really have are few in between, and in most cases they end up going back to those abusive situations. So the issue of beds must be addressed clearly and co-ordinated with support services in the community.

Right now in our community it takes three to six months to get women into counselling programs. That is inadequate. That is unacceptable. I think it is one of the worst tragedies our community can face when you have either to turn women away from shelters or to turn them back to that abusive situation after their stay at the shelter has expired. We are hoping that there is going to be some serious discussion on this and a large amount of dollars what come to municipalities across Ontario to deal with emergency shelters and victims of family violence.

We have also identified another area of concern, particularly with young people living in the streets in Hamilton. An extensive community process has identified the need for a 24-hour drop-in youth clinic, transitional and permanent housing and residential treatment for substance abuse. A proposal for these services has come forward and the need for provincial funding in this is essential.

It is hard to believe that in a region of this size, our first 24-hour, hassle-free type of no-questions-asked drop-in centre for people to walk in off the street, stay as long as they like, literally with no rules—the hard-core individuals who do not fit into the rest of the shelters—first opened up about a month ago. It was primarily through regional funding. A request has been made by the province. My understanding is the province is looking very favourably to approving that, but that is only a short-term measure. The budget only covers three to four months. We need this year-round, particularly in the winter months, of course. These are much more serious problems.

Day care in Hamilton-Wentworth: The number of cost-shared—by the province—subsidized spaces for day care is frozen at 1442 for centre-based and 234 for private day care. Although meeting the present needs, more spaces will be required in 1991. Waiting lists do exist for private home day care, and providers are difficult to find due to low wage levels paid. In order to address needs like ours, the following province-wide initiatives can be considered.

Increase funding to municipalities for the provision of licensed child care programs. These programs serve a dual purpose. Children are cared for in a creative environment that respects and fosters their developmental needs. Parents are assured of quality, stable arrangements. Funds should be made available to support municipal efforts in the expansion of licensed child care programs.

I ask the province to look at expanded provision of in-school child care programs in co-operation with the Ministry of Education. We are also asking to extend the payment of child care and transportation costs to those participating in academic upgrading or training/employment-related activities.

Mr Chairman, as I stated earlier, our situation in Hamilton-Wentworth is not unique. It is common across Ontario. We face the third-highest level of general welfare assistance rates in the province. As chairman of the health and social services committee, I am literally having to stand up every two or three weeks at regional council and defend expenditures over our budget, defend deficits that we as a committee and as a council are facing. The problem here is not the victim, of course. The problem is not the individual receiving assistance. The vast majority of recipients are people who are in situations beyond their control. They are in situations that they are forced into. If they had a choice, again the vast majority would rather not be in that situation where they are relying on welfare and social services.

People are hurting in our community and we are not going to turn our backs on them. However, the region cannot afford to pay what has clearly been recognized as a provincial responsibility. I think all parties in the House praised the recommendations of the Social Assistance Review Committee report, and then the follow-up Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review Committee report, including 100% funding of general welfare assistance programs in the municipalities. This was recognized, in our view, as the most imperative and the most important change the province can make to municipal funding in Ontario in the upcoming budget.

I urge this committee to consider, as I stated earlier, that emergency financial assistance to municipalities be given in 1991 to cover the increases above the 1990 rates—in our particular case, this would be $7 million, which is almost a 70% increase—and second, the implementation of the recommendations of 100% funding of course for GWA.

If action does not occur very soon, we believe many municipalities, including ours, are going to face financial disaster. We are going to have to make decisions. This program is mandatory. We are going to continue to provide it, but it will be at the expense of many other essential municipal programs—roads, sewers, transportation—which in my view are very important. However, we do not have the capability, and most municipalities in this province do not have the capability, to handle this continuous growth in what is clearly a provincial responsibility and a program that the province of Ontario should be paying at 100%.

I am urging this committee to recommend to the government that these issues be addressed, and addressed seriously, in the 1991 budget. I realize your situation is difficult. I realize cutbacks in the federal funding on the various programs are going to hurt the province of Ontario, and I think that is another fight for us to take to that level, but at the same time, the municipalities across Ontario need the help of this government, and need it now, or we are going to be facing financial ruin in the next year or two due to this particular problem.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to thank you for coming before the committee and putting a human face on change in the economic situation. You have emphasized the situation in Hamilton-Wentworth, and we have certainly heard reports from Metro Toronto that its case loads are increasing by about 80%. I am interested that yours are at about 66%. In my own region they are increasing about 69%.

You have addressed many of the areas relating to integrated delivery. In your view, is the move to the next phase of implementation of the SARC report the number one priority, or is emergency funding the number one priority?

Mr Agostino: Realizing the impact on the provincial budget and the provincial coffers that it will have, I believe that getting emergency funding to cover the situation in 1991 has to be a number one priority, but quickly followed by the implementation and maybe a staging of 100% funding of GWA programs. I realize it is a big-ticket item for the province of Ontario as well, and I realize, for example, if you implemented 100% funding, it would mean $17 million for Hamilton-Wentworth in 1991. I am realistic enough to know that that probably will not happen, but I believe that the other phase of the emergency funding would mean $7 million for Hamilton-Wentworth.

We are reasonable. We understand that there is not an endless wealth and supply of money here in the province, but we are hoping that one step is immediate and the second one is phased in very quickly following that.

Mr Sutherland: My question deals with just an overall general view and outlook. You note in your first page about how communities are more accountable and able to quickly respond. It would seem to me there is a tendency that provincial programs, and maybe it is just a perception with provincial programs, are not as quick to respond. If you go to the 100% provincial funding on these areas, do you feel that there will be any losses to responding to local needs?

Is it possible you will get into a situation where overall in one year welfare cases are up 20% but maybe your specific area is up 50%, 55% and because it is provincially administered, your area may get left out in the cold, or another area may get left out in the cold? It just seems like a very delicate relationship between who is paying 100% funding and who has control of the decision-making of where those funds go. I was wondering if you could address that.

Mr Agostino: Certainly. The 100% funding, as I understand the recommendations that have come forward and the direction we would like to see it in, is of course that it be locally administered. It makes a great deal of sense. I believe it is much more efficient and we are able to respond. By "respond," I mean shift programs. For example, we had a huge increase in numbers so we had a youth team that we quickly disbanded. We had other special programs we quickly disbanded and put those case workers to simply the general welfare assistance cases. So those type of changes at the municipal level we are going to make very quickly.

What we are hoping for is that there is a system in place in which we are going to be fully accountable, of course, about how we spend that money, but in which there are parameters set by the province for eligibility and those parameters are to be followed, but the municipality will ensure that everyone who is eligible receives the assistance and it will be funded provincially but administered locally within provincial guidelines.

Therefore, if there is an increase of 10%, your funding will increase by that much, and if there is an increase of 50%, then your funding will increase by 50% simply to reflect the community need, as long as a clearly understood set of criteria on that eligibility is relatively even across Ontario and a municipality is not paying much more liberal—a wrong choice of words—is not paying people much more than they should be getting, as an example, rates that are out of whack with the rest of Ontario. Those type of standards can be posted by the province but would be municipally administered, I think. It would have to be for it to work in a way that we would like to see it done at the municipal level.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, just one supplemental.

The Chair: It had better be short. We are running behind.

Mr Sutherland: Yes, I know we are running behind and my apologies. If that is the case, then really the difference, you are saying, from the current system is that the municipal employees who now administer the program would become provincial employees, or would they remain municipally employed but with the province picking up their costs?

Mr Agostino: Right now the cost-sharing for our staffing in administration is 50-50. For GWA rate, it is 80-20. Our view would be that the only change that would occur is that the cost, the 80-20 and the 50-50 share now would simply turn over as 100% share of the province which has been addressed and recognized through all the reports and studies that have been done. That is really the only change we would see, that the province would fully fund all costs relating to general welfare assistance at the municipal level.

Mr Jamison: That basically answers part of my question. My question evolves around the municipality handling the case load and so forth. What I have noticed is that there is quite a difference at this point in time between, for example, home visits that are required before any funds are made available. From one area to another there is as much as two weeks' difference in the waiting time. By saying that, I want to move on to the question on the 100% funding by the province. It has come to my attention, through talking to various people working at the municipal level, that it may be important to leave some funding, a portion, at the municipal level just to keep the system working on the basis of whether or not it actually ends up costing you anything or not. That way there is an assurance that the evaluation process will carry on in a proper manner. I just thought I would ask your opinion on that.

Mr Agostino: Certainly, sir. I do not think we at the municipal level are willing to work with the province to establish criteria, a set of standards, that are applicable and enforceable, but we would be open to any checks and balances in the system, as I think we addressed in here, to simply ensure that municipalities are not abusing the interpretation of the act and that they are following the guidelines that are in place. I think that makes a great deal of sense. It would force the municipalities in many ways to be a little more accountable, of course, because when it is 100% funded by the province, then I think we would be pleased to work with the province in setting up those guidelines and the criteria.

Mr Christopherson: I am cognizant of the time. I appreciate the opportunity to speak since our guest today is from my home community. I guess I would just open by saying, is this a great province or what, Dom? How the world changes in a short period of time. I would just like to, first of all, concur with most of the content in the issues outlined by Councillor Agostino. These are certainly a lot of the issues that I ran on in the election, issues that quite frankly we saw as not being addressed properly and adequately by the previous government, which are priorities on our agenda. Taking all of that in the context of the recession and the financial situation we find ourselves in is not helpful for us, but I think you have reflected and commented on that.

Interjections.

Mr Stockwell: That stagecoach slowed down.

Mr Christopherson: This Hansard stuff is going to be fantastic for going back to for quotes. Mr Stockwell and I are going to have a wonderful time over the next four years firing back and forth on his desire to have it both ways, fiscally responsible and also pushing for all the social issues. However, that is not the issue at hand.

Mr Stockwell: Look who is calling the kettle black.

Mr Christopherson: I am always pleased to have my previous Liberal colleagues here before us. The only thing I would ask, Mr Chair, in a very serious vein, is that I did not see any reference here at all to the mandatory health programs which at the time that I left was a concern because of the lack of funding and where that put us over the three-year period. Is this meant to be just a perspective from social services or is this the priority of both those departments combined and, if so, did the mandatory programs not require the same kind of attention? I am just asking that.

Mr Agostino: Primarily, and from the perspective as chairman of the committee, we have some concerns, of course, about the mandatory health programs and the fact that we have submitted a number of programs. We were willing to kick in immediately and fund our aspect of it. This perspective here today is primarily from the social service point of view—and again, if you gave me a choice and said which one is more immediately important, we believe that this is simply because of the short-term, immediate tax dollars and affordability for our residents in our community to pay for social services.

Mr Christopherson: One quick question, if I can, Mr Chair. I know I am pushing your indulgence. The priority here and the priority you have mentioned today is that the council's position, out of all the issues that they face, is that SARC—I think it was SARC that you mentioned—is the number one funding issue aside from the question of emergency funding.

Mr Agostino: Right. I am not going to speak for the rest of the committees, of course, but this is clearly the number one funding issue from the aspect of social services and health care in Hamilton-Wentworth. I think there are very few programs that would have this type of impact that we would expect to get immediate funding to any great extent. This, in my view, would be the biggest single-ticket item that would clearly enhance the tax situation in support of the taxpayers in Hamilton-Wentworth.

Mr Christopherson: Okay. I just needed to be clear on that because it is important for me as a representative here. Are you saying this is just the social services committee point of view, or is this regional council saying that out of the environment, transportation, health and social services, all the other needs, this is the number one priority?

Mr Agostino: These initiatives are primarily social orders approved by council, the directions that are in here, but primarily are social service priorities. I cannot speak for all of them. I am not regional chairman. I cannot speak for all of the region, but I believe that clearly this type of action would enhance all the region. What it would do at our own level is allow the freeing up of a lot of money that we could use for other programs in environment and the other services we do provide.

Mr Christopherson: I will just close by saying, in all seriousness, that I appreciate Councillor Agostino and members of the council taking the time to come down. I think this is the kind of grass-roots input that we are looking for, and it is appreciated. Thanks.

The Chair: In the interest of supplying Mr Christopherson with quotes, Mr Stockwell can have the—

Mr Stockwell: The question is asked.

The Chair: The question is asked? Thank you for coming, Mr Agostino. I think your briefing was very well done.

Mr Agostino: Thank you very much. We thank the committee for their time. I tried very hard not to be political and to be as fair as possible. Not once did I even raise the expressway this morning.

Mr Stockwell: Were you at that meeting, by the way?

Mr Agostino: No, I did not get invited.

Mr Stockwell: Send that guy up here.

Mr Agostino: I am on the other side. I do not get invited to those.

Mr Stockwell: I wish they would send that guy up here. I have got questions for him.

METRO TENANTS LEGAL SERVICES

The Chair: We now move to our next presentation. It is the Metro Tenants Legal Services, with Leslie Robinson. You supplied the brief?

Ms Robinson: I did.

The Chair: I would like to applaud the effort of having it on both sides.

Ms Robinson: Thank you very much. About half an hour ago I thought I would rather double-side it than staple it.

I am here representing Metro Tenants Legal Services, which is one of the legal aid clinics that is funded by the Ontario legal aid plan in the province of Ontario. We are set up to represent and advocate for tenants in Metro Toronto, specifically low-income tenants. Legal aid sets low-income criteria and the tenants we represent must live under those income criteria.

Before I go into my prepared presentation, I want to provide you with a piece of information that I am not sure everyone here is aware of. I do not know if you know that Canada is a signatory to the United Nations Covenant on Economic, Cultural and Social Rights. Through our signature to that covenant, Canada has agreed with other countries in the United Nations who signed the covenant that we feel that housing is a human right, that basic, decent, affordable and quality housing is a basic human right.

In fact we have an international legal obligation to report every five years to that international committee on economic, cultural and social rights on how we are doing in ensuring that all Canadians have adequate housing.

Before Canada signed the covenant, every province and every territory in Canada agreed to this covenant. So, while the right to housing is not entrenched in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the right to housing is not entrenched in the Human Rights Code, I think it is imperative for this committee, for this Legislature, the government and the people of Ontario to operate under the assumption that housing is a right, that we cannot go forward with any other perspective or any other point of view, except to say in Ontario all people have a right to a roof over their head at a price they can afford and a place that is decent and has decent facilities. It is from that premise that I wish to make my presentation this morning.

Metro Tenants Legal Services has been in existence since 1974. We have been representing tenants in the courts and tribunals since then, and primarily we represent groups of tenants. The issues that we address tend to cover a range of rent increases, repairs and maintenance, safety and security, preservation of buildings from demolition or conversion and security of tenure. In the past few years we have noticed that more and more tenants are living in buildings that are not zoned for housing, so that creates special legal tangles. They are also living in buildings where a mortgagee has foreclosed and the mortgagee is demanding vacant possession, although there is legislation working its way through the processes to address that specific concern.

But over the years we have been winning some battles and losing some battles, and measuring our gains and losses by the legal battles that we win and lose. In 1988 our board of directors spent a weekend evaluating the work that we have been doing with our staff, and we concluded that while we have been winning a lot of legal cases and doing the best we can in the courts and the tribunals, in 1988—and the same is true today—our client group, low-income tenants in Toronto, had worse housing conditions than they had in 1974 when we started.

So our board said that if we are going to really serve the needs and the interests of our clients, we have to step back a little bit from the individual battles and the individual cases and focus more on the supply of housing. While we still do the rent review cases and we still represent tenants with repair concerns and we still advocate for tenants, we have also over the past three years tried to participate in the arena of housing supply. We have participated with different housing co-ops and non-profit providers and we have been taking a look at municipal bylaws and building standards and those kinds of issues.

While we have been looking at housing supply matters, it did not take us very long to conclude two things about Toronto's housing market: There is not enough affordable housing, and our client base is discriminated against when attempting to access housing that is affordable to them. Such discrimination takes the form of income criteria, credit criteria, adults-only buildings, blatant racism, and a host of other bigotries that come into operation when landlords are faced with choosing among applicants for the lucky ones who will have the privilege of living in the rental units being applied for.

You can just imagine the housing situation we have had over the past few years with a landlord considering 10 20 or 100 applicants for one unit. Sooner or later the criteria start being, "You've got to be white," "You've got to be employed," "You've got to not have any children," and "You'd better have a good credit history and a good reference from your previous landlord."

We are asking today that your committee take into consideration both our observations when you are developing recommendations for your 1991 budget. The first is new housing supply. Ontario's budget must address the concern of the basic shortage of housing which is affordable for those in need of housing. This is the shortage that exists in Toronto and in many other municipalities throughout Ontario. I think Sudbury has surpassed Toronto for the lowest vacancy rate in Ontario. There are some municipalities—Halifax comes to mind—where there is a large vacancy rate, there is not an absolute need for more housing. But in most of Ontario there is an absolute need for more housing.

But the housing need is not the need for purchase homes, luxury condominiums or apartments that rent at $1,000 or $1,500 a month. The need is for low-cost housing, housing that can be afforded by the people who are without housing and that is either housing with low rents or housing that is rent geared to the income of the tenants living there.

The criteria that our clinic set for new housing or the definition of affordable housing is that it must remain affordable over time, that large rent increases just force the tenants who move in to move out again. It must be close to transit, schools, health care, shopping and other services that form the necessities to a community. It is also important that the management of the housing provide opportunities for the residents to participate in decision-making and to present their needs and priorities when management decisions are being made.

We are in a time when most tenants in Ontario, and I would say almost all the tenants that we serve, realize that they will be tenants throughout their lives. This is not a short-term place where they are living before they can buy a house and decide when the lawn will be cut and what colour the trim will be painted. A lot of us will be tenants for all our lives.

It is important that we recognize that and give people who live in rental accommodation opportunities to have some control over our housing situation and the normal control that people expect, particularly when they buy their own home, that they are going to be able to set some priorities and decide whether they are going to invest in an air-conditioning system or that maybe this is the year to fix the leak in the roof.

Our experience of government assistance in providing supply of housing has been that the non-profit housing sector does come closest to providing the housing needed by our client community. None of the programs providing money or benefits to private sector providers has met the above criteria. I recall the Ontario rental construction loan program provincially. There have been the limited-dividend program and the multiple-unit residential buildings program, and those programs do not have any assurances that the rental housing that is constructed is either in a location where people need housing or at a rent that they can afford.

The limited-dividend federal program is the only exception to that and what we find in those buildings, which are now reaching about 15 to 25 years of age, is that corners were cut and the buildings are falling apart and people are living in substandard housing. As well, when the agreements expire, the rents are going up anywhere from 10% to 48% and that is in Toronto.

We ask you to draw from our experience and, in meeting your obligation to provide housing to the people of Ontario, to take a look at the non-profit programs. While the non-profit programs, as I said, come closest to providing the housing needed by our client community, they are not perfect and there have been some problems raised. So we also ask that this committee make antidiscrimination policies mandatory for the receipt of funding for non-profit housing projects. Affirmative action policies for those who are most excluded are also necessary in order to address the unmet housing needs of people who do not measure up against the usual criteria that I listed before: You have to be white, middle class, employed and have a clean record.

The province's housing programs have to address the reality that everyone has to live somewhere. People are evicted for disturbing their neighbours. What we are dealing with now across the province, but in Metropolitan Toronto, is an effort to get all drug dealers out of housing and that is good and that protects the people who live in those communities, but we still have to address the fact that everyone has to live somewhere. Housing has to be designed that is appropriate for the needs of absolutely everybody, because we are not meeting our obligation to provide housing as a right as long as there are people living on the streets, in hostels and living in substandard conditions or illegally doubled up.

So we ask you to address the concerns that we have presented and to make demands upon the non-profit suppliers. There was a recent Ontario human rights complaint by a woman named Heather Sinclair against Peel non-profit homes because she was discriminated against based on her income. They told her that her income was not sufficient, that the rent was 30% or 35% of it and she could not move in.

Instead of moving into Peel non-profit, she moved into a basement apartment which she shared with another woman and child. She paid 60% of her income on rent and she did not miss a rent payment. She settled with Peel non-profit homes. They have altered their requirements considerably. I think there is generally good faith in the non-profit sector to take a look at these issues, but we hope that through the funding and financing budget process these kinds of issues can be addressed.

In closing, I would like to reiterate what I said in opening, that this committee and this province must address housing policies and housing supply programs with the view that housing is a right. Programs must be developed to meet the housing needs of everyone who calls Ontario home.

Mr Stockwell: I assume your association receives provincial funding.

Ms Robinson: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: How much money do you receive from the province?

Ms Robinson: I think our organization receives about $400,000, but I could be off.

Mr Stockwell: From the province.

Ms Robinson: From the Ontario legal aid plan, which is funded ultimately by the province and also lawyers' trust funds. The interest that is gathered in lawyers' trust funds also goes into the legal aid plan.

Mr Stockwell: What about Bill 4's effect on your association? Will it cause you to have less work, more work?

Ms Robinson: If it gets passed, we will be able to drop a number of legal cases that we are working on. We have looked at it and decided that we will need to refocus our energies into assisting tenants with repair problems and to focus on the proposal that there be more permanent rent control legislation after Bill 4.

Mr Stockwell: In fact the work will lower in one area, but you will increase your efforts elsewhere.

Ms Robinson: I did not address today the budget needs for legal aid clinics.

Mr Stockwell: No. I was just curious; with respect to discrimination, I heard you mention the fact that through the process it is discriminatory to discriminate against people for certain reasons and one of those reasons was that they had a bad credit rating. Is it against the law to discriminate or not give someone an apartment because they have a bad—

Ms Robinson: Oh no, it is not against the law. Many of those reasons I listed are perfectly legal.

Mr Stockwell: Do you consider it discriminatory if someone has a bad credit rating not to rent that person an apartment?

Ms Robinson: Yes, I do.

Mr Stockwell: On what basis?

Ms Robinson: On the basis that everyone has to have housing. Even people with bad credit records have to have housing.

Mr Stockwell: I see. Interesting.

Ms Robinson: You have to live somewhere.

Mr B. Ward: Is it possible that you could elaborate on your comment that in your opinion the private sector does not provide the adequate housing supply that is needed for rent-geared-to-income or affordable housing even though there has been an opportunity, perhaps, in the past for a provincial or federal grant system? Even with the grant system, the private sector did not appropriately react to the housing need. Could you elaborate on that? Is that possible?

Ms Robinson: We have not had a housing supply program for the private sector that is federal or provincial since about 1987, but they seem to come in waves. Sooner or later someone will have the idea, "Oh, let's just give either low interest rates on mortgages, loans, forgivable loans, interest-free loans, or whatever, to the private sector and get them to build housing."

In 1981 the Ontario rental construction loan program was introduced. It created housing but not in Metro Toronto. The most housing built under that program was built in a city that had the highest vacancy rate already and that was London, Ontario. But that was 1981. So they were not targeted. Basically the money was in a pot and developers were told, "Come and get some money and build some housing," but there was no targeting to need. Second, there is no control over rents.

I am working right now with a group of tenants who live up at Kipling and Steeles in the north end of Etobicoke, not terribly low-income people, working-class people, but they are mostly families living in two- and three-bedroom apartments that are over $1,000 a month. One of the biggest reasons they have had a rent increase is that 15 years ago their landlord got a loan that was interest-free for 15 years. Last year the interest got added on and it hit the tenants in the form of one great big, whopping rent increase.

People are moving out and the other phenomenon we see is that people are doubling up. There are two and three families living in every apartment. That is an atrocious situation. Those people are living in fear that they will be evicted. The services are not capable of meeting their needs and a lot of those people would not even put their names on the voters' list because their landlord had access to the voters' list and then the landlord would find out that these extra people were living there.

There are a lot of shadow people living in Metro Toronto. Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority estimates that there are 13,000 families living doubled up just in the housing authority stock.

Mr B. Ward: In your opinion, if the provincial government was looking at funding affordable housing, your recommendation would be, rather than utilizing that funding as a grant system to the private sector, that the money be plowed directly by the provincial government into affordable housing to be constructed or developed by the province.

Ms Robinson: Yes, it is our opinion and experience that that is the kind of housing that our clients' funds—accessible and affordable and decent housing.

Mr Sutherland: Actually, if I could just follow up on one question by Mr Ward: by the province or from community groups willing to, I guess, maybe make the difference? The provincial government doing it or the provincial government supplying the funds for different individual community groups to do it?

Ms Robinson: I think you could look at both or either. There is a lot of debate as to whether it is government's role to directly provide housing or provide it to community groups. There are a lot of community groups providing some very good housing, and in part our experience has been that the smaller the bureaucracy the more directly addresses people's needs.

On the other hand, I do not think that problems that exist in Ontario Housing Corp housing or housing authority housing are necessarily because the province owns the housing. I think a lot of those problems relate to the fact that the buildings have some of the highest densities in some of the worst neighbourhoods with the least facilities known, and then you cram in a whole lot of people who have a lot of needs and do not give them anything and you are going to have a problem community. It is not because the province owns the building, it is not because they are poor, it is just because of a host of those kinds of situations.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, the question I wanted to ask was the concern that seemed to come up about—I am not sure if integrated housing is the right way of saying it—but strictly low-income housing units versus mixed incomes with low income. Would you care to comment on that issue?

Ms Robinson: Yes. It is a hot issue federally these days. We hear opinions from tenants on both. We hear tenants who say, "We do not want to be ghettoized, we do not want to be put into a community that is labelled low income, therefore when we tell anyone our address they know exactly who we are and they put a label on us."

We have also heard from people who say: "I got to where I am today organizing my tenants' association because I am among my peers. I live with poor people, I am organizing poor people, I don't have to sort of compete against people that have skills for leadership in my organization. I don't have to deal with my kids coming home and saying, 'Why can't I have a 10-speed? The boy across the hall has a 10-speed.'"

We hear both and we hope that programs would be flexible so that they could construct housing that is either all for low-income people or for a mix of income. We certainly hope there will be lots of units created for low-income people, rent geared to income. We have thought that a 50-50 split is probably appropriate, but any smaller percentage of rent geared to income than that starts creating problems because there is not enough built for poor people.

Mrs Sullivan: I was going to ask the very question Mr Sutherland has just asked relating to the integrated complexes. I would like your comments on two things that kind of follow from that. One relates to the requirement that the municipalities provide a certain percentage of affordable housing as part of their planning mix and the second relates to the time factors relating to the development in moving through the planning process itself.

Ms Robinson: On the first, as you know, under the Planning Act the Minister of Housing a couple of years ago created a housing supply policy that said that municipalities had to ensure that 25% of the new housing that is developed is affordable. Our concern about that is that it is not being monitored and that nobody has any idea which municipalities are and which municipalities are not meeting those criteria.

Mrs Sullivan: I am not sure of that. I think that is not right.

Ms Robinson: That is what we are told from the developers of non-profit housing, because we in the non-profit sector have been trying to do the monitoring ourselves, given that we cannot seem to get the answers from the ministries of Municipal Affairs or Housing.

It seems to be a good policy and heading in a good direction. What people do not tend to want is the municipality to say: "Okay, 25% has to be for poor people. There is this piece of land over here by the expressway and the other one by the garbage incinerator that no one is going to build on anyway, so let's put a whole bunch of low-income housing there and then we have met our criteria."

Mrs Sullivan: Have you seen that happen?

Ms Robinson: I see that in the existing housing. If you drive up and down Highway 427, a lot of the high-rises near Burnamthorpe Road are all either limited dividend or Metro Toronto housing, a lot of the buildings that are on the Don Valley Expressway, over at Oak Street on the edge of Regent Park.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly that is not the case in my community.

Mr Stockwell: That is not true.

Mrs Sullivan: But I am wondering if it is the case elsewhere.

Mr B. Ward: That is your opinion.

Ms Robinson: That is my opinion. That is my experience in the buildings I have gone into. Maybe a lot of the buildings are not.

Mr Stockwell: There are all kinds that are not.

Ms Robinson: Okay, fair enough. It is our experience that a lot of buildings for poor people are either in neighbourhoods that are not yet developed and do not have transportation and services, or on lots of land that are less desirable. That makes a lot of sense because it is harder to market that land.

Mrs Sullivan: And then the planning process itself, I do not know if you want to throw in a comment about the maximum unit prices or not, but I think that would be useful.

Ms Robinson: Yes, I must say it is not something I am totally familiar with. The maximum unit prices I think have to have some more flexibility so that they reflect the reality of land costs and other costs in Metro. I think, as well, particularly with the introduction of Bill 4 and rent controls, that the province needs a program to convert private sector buildings into non-profit housing where there is an opportunity, where there is either a threat to affordability or a landlord saying, "I'm going to walk away from this building." But we have to be prepared to then say, "Okay, that housing is prime housing to be converted into non-profit housing."

Mrs Sullivan: With the province's participation, ie, purchase of the building?

Ms Robinson: What the province has now under the non-profit program, under the existing Homes Now program, is a portion of the units or allocation set aside for conversion of existing buildings rather than construction of new buildings, because a lot of the problem is just finding vacant land.

The Chair: Thank you for coming. I think you have given us some food for thought. We will reconvene at 2 pm.

The committee recessed at 1215.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1404 in room 228.

ONTARIO ASSOCIATION OF INTERVAL AND TRANSITION HOUSES

The Chair: I see a quorum. Before us we have the Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses, with Eileen Morrow, Trudy Don—Trudy is not coming today? Okay—and Lisa Duggan. You will present your brief and then, if we have questions, we will move on from there. You have roughly half an hour.

Ms Duggan: We did not prepare a written brief of what we are talking about today, so we ask that you listen. What you do have in front of you are several things we will be referring to in our statements. What we want to start with is to give a little bit of history in terms of funding of shelters in Ontario and what we would like you to consider in terms of the direction for funding for shelters in Ontario.

We would like to start by talking about a standing committee on social development that was put together in 1982, and it was a three-party committee that looked at the issue of wife battering in this province. One of the recommendations that came out of that standing committee, which was unanimously supported by all three parties, was recommendation 23, which is on page 57 of that report, and this is the report.

It says, "The Ministry of Community and Social Services should fund shelter services beyond room and board on a block funding basis." However, these recommendations were not implemented and funded and as a result shelters fell into severe financial crisis and were in danger of closing, so in 1985 there was implementation of the bailout and stabilization funding, which led to the initiation of a review of shelter funding by Brian Low, which is referred to as the Brian Low report. When the provincial funding review was completed in 1986, the recommendation was recognition for funding of expanded shelter services. The draft recognized block funding, but it was dropped from the final report in favour of improvements to the per diem funding and deficit funding.

OAITH opposed the lack of block funding that did not occur in the final draft of that. That model was opposed because block funding was not included in the final report. The more positive recommendations of this report were not funded or implemented.

Ms Morrow: I am going to go on from there to talk a little bit about what happened next in the trend after the provincial review of the shelter services which was designed to stabilize the funding and secure funding for shelters so that they would not close. Review and consultation was taken within the Brian Low report and responses were gathered. The result did not come about until 1988 when the Ministry of Community and Social Services presented a funding formula which was designed to alleviate the problems in transition houses for abused women. This was announced in February and was to be implemented on 1

April, so that shelters in the province of Ontario were given one month to respond to the proposed funding formula and to give their comments back.

There was a groundswell of opposition to the short length of time that was given for response to the report. As a result of the opposition to this plan, there was a prolonged consultation period undertaken which resulted in negotiation across the province of Ontario with shelters in OAITH and regional groups of shelters in OAITH, with both the corporate branch of MCSS and the program supervisors in the local regions of MCSS. Within this negotiation, what happened was that MCSS requested that the shelter network, if it was in opposition to the new funding formula, the result of Brian Low's work in effect but without incorporating his recommendations—their suggestion that we provide an alternative funding formula which was done and was approved by the membership of OAITH after much consultation among us.

What happened after that was that a group of people from OAITH and from the MCSS civil servant group began to negotiate around the alternative funding formula and the original funding formula. The end result of that made absolutely no difference in terms of the plans for funding of shelters. What did happen, however, was that MCSS promised to incorporate some of OAITH's definitions of what the shelter network was in fact providing already in the province of Ontario, and to recognize the services that were being provided in the shelters but not funded by public policy or by public money.

The result of that was Alternate Vision of the Provincial Funding Formula for Interval and Transition Houses/FRCs, which is the first thing you have before you. OAITH's alternative to the funding formula describes a definition of what actually takes place in shelters in the province of Ontario today. The funding formula which was ultimately designed as a so-called compromise by MCSS, however, recognized the work that was being done but would not recognize that it should be funded. So we won recognition of what was actually occurring, but without any corresponding support in terms of a policy to support it.

The Ontario Association of Interval and Transition Houses did not, as a group, support the final document, and does not to this day support the final document. In fact, we have yet to see the final document. We understand that the final funding formula is finished and ready to go out. In fact, we have been told it will go out for consultation. Needless to say, we are of the opinion that we do not need any consultation any more.

In 1988-89, some movement was made in some areas within the needs of the shelter network. Specifically, the province did increase some salary funding for shelter workers, which is a severe problem, and did increase slightly the staffing complements in shelters under what was known as the salary compensation and the ministry staffing ratio increases.

The staffing, for instance, was done to provide minimum staffing in order for shelters to function because, recognizing that all of this work was being done and yet not funding it, what we believe the ministry was recognizing was yet again another crisis. In other words, it was another emergency measure which was designed to keep the shelters for assaulted women functioning in the province of Ontario. What it provides is a minimum—I would underline “minimum”—staffing just to function in the shelter, and some increase in salaries in order to provide some sort of alleviation of turnover, burnout and the kinds of things that are going on on a day-to-day basis in women’s services generally.

OAITH has protested the inadequacy of these measures and has on an ongoing basis reminded the province of the provisions that we requested in the Alternate Vision formula. I should also mention that in terms of the historical overview, since 1986 the province of Ontario has been involved in an interministerial approach to the problem of wife assault, which included from that time a five-year initiatives plan that focused on 15 different ministries in Ontario and provided some funding to address a diversity of problems that abused women face, including problems in the criminal court system, community counselling, education and so on.

Ms Duggan: However, because of an inconsistent and inadequate recognition of shelter services, shelters, despite all our best efforts, are not able to meet the needs of abused women consistently in Ontario. Shelters struggle to provide the services that are recognized in Alternate Vision. However, demands are increasing and are diversifying as education, partly supported by the province—however, education programs within the shelters are not funded although specific education requests are—supports women’s rights to assistance.

The gap is widening, however, between the services we provide and the public commitment to service for abused women, as well as between the problems the public policy has identified and the actual changing needs of abused women. The province is falling behind in its support for assaulted women and their children.

Ms Morrow: I would like to turn now to an examination of our alternative funding formula, which is before you. Obviously I am not going to go through this tooth and nail, so to speak. We of course hope that you will read it. We did not provide you with yet another brief because the alternative funding formula approved by the membership of OAITH describes what the membership of OAITH, in working directly with assaulted women, sees as the way that the funding should flow at this moment and the way that the financial arrangements should be made.

I would just like to go through the highlights of what the alternative funding formula vision provides for, which is not being provided for adequately at this time.

It provides for all of the services abused women and their children require to be funded and provided. On page 3 and 4, for instance, you will find on the bottom of the page the elements of a new funding formula which describes what shelters in the province of Ontario consider to be core services; in other words, basic minimum services for abused women and their children.

These include much more than simply what often in the past has been more or less a flop house with baby-sitting approach to addressing the safety of abused women and their children. This list provides what we believe to be an adequate minimum number of services and kinds of services that abused women need in order to deal with the terrorism in their lives. As you can see, it is a comprehensive program. These kinds of functions are now recognized by the province of Ontario, but not funded.

This funding formula alternative also recognizes the need for community response to violence against women. Specifically, for example, it recognizes the need for a more comprehensive and better funded public education program rather than what is presently happening, which is a sort of project funding of specific small projects, usually in November, that will address short-term kinds of public education, but usually without the funding that would support the human beings who have to engage in this education. We feel that prevention and education are a very central point in this problem and that this is where we will begin to address the problem of wife assault on an ongoing and long-term basis.

This funding formula recognizes the need for that community response. It also recognizes and outlines specifically the staffing levels and salaries that are required to provide these services. Just to point out, one central factor in the staffing would be a requirement and a request for double staffing of shelter services 24 hours a day, seven days a week. This currently does not happen in any shelter in the province of Ontario at the moment, so we get minimum staffing during the day and we get staffing by one person, usually, at night. I think everyone who has any knowledge of violence against women and domestic assault will recognize that the safety factor here is really quite key and central, and that double staffing is required in order not to jeopardize the safety of the residents in the shelter and the staff who work there.

Apart from that, it also recognizes the incredible demand increases from women in the community who respond to education on a broader scale and who are calling the shelter and visiting the shelter without actually staying in the shelter and doing the residential service. I think everyone might also recognize that in providing those services, we can alleviate some of the distress without always engaging in very costly residential solutions, so double staffing is extremely important.

The funding formula, Alternate Vision, also recognizes and demands that the government address the issue of pay equity—equal pay for work of equal value—in the shelter system, which is another one of those systems which is currently not covered under legislation requiring a male comparator because this is an area where the staff is all female. It is another one of those areas where women are job-ghettoized. There is no male comparator.

In the meantime this alternative, which was written two years ago, requires that there be an average minimum level of salary of $35,000 per shelter worker in the province of Ontario, with a minimum of $30,000. Since that time the province has increased its percentage base 4.5% and then 5.5%. So at this point the average salary request in the alternative is $38,500.

It has always been our experience that the closer one gets to working directly with assaulted women, the less money there is available to pay for that work, so that what is happening is that advocates for abused women who are advocating to government officials are remunerated at about one third the level of the person whom they are advocating to in many cases.

This is very stressful, very draining, sometimes very dangerous work. It is appalling that there is no recognition of the value of this work in our communities. So this alternative funding formula recognizes the value and asks that it be recognized by public policy.

The alternative funding formula also outlines the need for a change from the funding mechanism, from per diem funding from the municipalities and deficit funding of the deficits after per diem funding is subtracted from the shelter budget. It proposes that the change go, once again, to block funding, the block funding that was proposed almost 10 years ago by the standing committee on social development.

The alternative funding formula also provides for phasing in, as did the original funding formula, of the improvements with definite time lines. Time lines were not given in the original funding formula, so it was more or less a wide-open situation.

I would turn your attention to pages 5 and 6, which outline the three phases that we would suggest. I would particularly like you to note that phase 3, which was the last phase that we suggested, was to be implemented 1 April 1990. That that was a suggestion that there be legislated funding of shelters for abused women and their children and that the province take on that funding 100%—gross funding, in other words, block funding—directly from the province of Ontario. I cannot help but notice that the province of Ontario is already one year behind in terms of accepting our recommendations and of funding the shelter network appropriately.

Those are the highlights that would impact on funding in terms of the alternative funding formula vision. Before we go to questions, I would just like to speak a little bit to the main focus of our presentation here, which is to encourage and support the idea of block funding, a change in the funding mechanism, for the shelters in the province of Ontario. Block funding should be instituted. Block funding has been consistently supported and proposed for the last 10 years. It has been supported in commission reports, such as the standing committee recommendations of almost 10 years ago in the first draft of the shelter review done by Brian Low. It was also suggested in Transitions, the report of the Social Assistance Review Committee.

I will give you the recommendation numbers so that you will not have to read through it all. Recommendation 244 and recommendation 247 speak to removing the funding of transition houses from the social assistance legislation and regulating them through special residential services legislation that is specific to the field; also that it be secure and not based on a per diem funding or the number of residents who are occupying the beds on any particular night or day.

What is happening that is a very big concern to us however, is that the province, through the Ministry of Community and Social Services, in fact seems to be focusing on moving in exactly the opposite direction, which would be to reinforce the same inadequate and insecure funding models which we presently have in existence.

Specifically I would like to draw your attention to the report of the Provincial-Municipal Social Services Review Committee, which has been released and is now under consultation in the province of Ontario. This is the latest report supporting these inadequate models and which will increase the municipal funding responsibility and control. That increase in municipal funding responsibility results in more inadequate rather than improved services for abused women and their children in the province of Ontario.

The presentation package that we have given you includes OAITH's response to the PMSSR and outlines specifically and in detail the problems that we have and the problems that will ensue for abused women and their children if this is implemented in the province.

Before questions—I know our time is running out—I just want to leave you with the strong suggestion that this committee recommend the block funding and begin the financial and economic arrangements that need to be undertaken to provide block funding for shelter services and that this be implemented immediately as suggested in phase 3 of OAITH's alternative funding formula vision and according to the recommendations of all of these many commission reports and groups for the last 10 years.

We have not had time and we will not have time and do not have time to even touch on the other areas affecting funding for services which address abused women's safety, for instance, in the criminal and family law system, in the education system, in housing, in children's programs, in community counselling programs, in economic support systems that address poverty, day care and so on. We do not have time for that.

However, we have included in your package copies of the statements that were made by OAITH in its lobby of provincial MPPs in November. All of you should have a copy of that already, but just in case papers are lost under piles of other papers, we have provided you with another copy. That document basically outlines all of the things that we see right now that need to be done to address the issue of women's safety and programming for women and children. It also impacts, obviously, on funding and financial arrangements of the province and the commitment that the province has made time and time again to taking action to address this issue.

Some of these statements and some of this is also included in the lobby backgrounder which all of you have a copy of. It was sent to you or picked up by you at the lobby or through the mail. It also on the back page talks about the various areas that are involved in the inter-ministerial work on this issue and all of the suggestions hat we have made and continue to make on how funding needs to be implemented to address the problem.

What is required, I think, at this point, and OAITH has suggested this before, is that there needs to be implemented emergency funding arrangements and emergency measures taken to begin this work rather than some slight increases in the base percentage. We need to have a massive influx of funds at this point in order to resolve some of the problems that are continuing and are building in the province of Ontario.

Mr Sutherland: Two questions. One, I just wanted to know if you could give us some idea as to what the additional costs would be in terms of going to the block funding model. Two, is it your sense that some of the education programs are working and that is why your shelters are becoming more burdened?

Ms Morrow: To answer your first question about the additional costs, no, I cannot give you a figure. I think that is something that needs to be worked out in consultation with us. We have stated in the past that in terms of the shelter service, it would not be beyond the bounds of possibility to suggest that the funding would have to be doubled. I know that I personally I have been told that that is a ridiculous request.

Mr Sutherland: Just on that point, do you have a sense of what—I do not have a sense of what the provincial funding amount is right now.

Ms Morrow: It is very difficult and always has been for us to get numbers. The numbers seem to be different every time we get them, depending on the configuration of what is included. The last analysis I saw was dated 1989 and the bottom line was $40 million across all of the five-year initiatives, in other words, not the shelters, but everything, so all of the interministerial committee funding mechanisms.

Okay, second question. I knew there was something else. I thought, what are they all sitting there for? I have to answer this other question. Around the education programs, I think it is really pretty clear every November, when we have increases in calls because ads are going on the television, that just that one initiative by the province of Ontario does result in increased demand and what little public education is allowed to happen in other ways, through the Ministry of Education and through the incredible efforts of shelters across the province of Ontario to provide it in spite of the fact that it is not funded, yes, I do believe that it makes a big difference.

I in fact am a public educator. That is my job personally in my shelter. I see the results of education when I go out to speak and I know that that results in women calling the shelter. Quite frankly, sometimes there is this real sense of being torn as a public educator, for instance, in knowing that you will give women information that it is their human right to not be assaulted, that assault is a crime and they have a right to safety, knowing that when they call the shelter or the community counselling program, it will not have the space to serve their need.

Mr Sutherland: I guess related to that, do you see the problem as growing? Are there more assaults occurring or are more women getting out of abusive situations?

Ms Morrow: There is a debate. Even on the front lines, there is a debate about that right now. I do not think anyone has the definitive answer to that question. To those of us working in the field, I mean my shelter is four years old and the demand for our service is so overwhelming at this point that it is at breaking point. I am not sure how long we can go on and we have more than the absolute minimum staff because we fund-raise and we raise the money ourselves. Even then, the gap widens every year and we are falling further and further behind.

There is going to be another shelter crisis just like there was in 1985, and then someone is going to have to come in and bail us out. All of that will happen over and over again. It is extremely irritating and extremely frustrating and extremely cost-ineffective, I might add, in terms of what your interest is. But all I can tell you is that it really does not matter in some ways to us on the front lines, whether the problem is—of course it matters, but in some ways, on the day-to-day basis, when we have 600 crisis calls in our first year and four years later we are getting 2,000 crisis telephone calls, never mind.

We are not funded to answer the telephone. The Ministry of Community and Social Services funds us to put in the telephone. They will pay the telephone bill 100% under emergency telephone crisis line, but they will not pay someone to answer the telephone. So what happens is that the women come into the shelter expecting service, but you are having to answer the telephone all day long and you have to balance.

Lisa is a front-line worker and she can give you an example.

Ms Duggan: For example, I work a 12.5-hour day which tends always to be a 14- or 16-hour day by the time you have finished writing up your notes. Just to verify Eileen's point, I went in to work one day at 6:40. At 7:40, I started my day and at 7:40 that night, I sat down and did not even talk to the women who were in the shelter and that only included the phone calls and the people who came in for counselling who are not in the shelter. I think that there is an increasing demand of our time. It is certainly not fair to all of the women who need the service.

Ms Morrow: Unfortunately, the province of Ontario in the past has seemed to have this policy that would seem to indicate, and perhaps I am being cynical, that shelter services should not increase their services. There should be no non-residential stuff going on there. One way of preventing that from happening is to say, "We won't fund it."

In my community, unfortunately, which is a large community with more services than most communities in Ontario, there is group programming, for instance, in a community agency, so we have community counselling program. We have the shelter crisis intervention program, residential, but nobody except us, who do it free of charge, provides crisis intervention counselling for women who are not in a long-term situation but who are also not wanting to go into what for the province would be an expensive residential service.

All of that range of services is required and they need to be funded. Our point is that it is not going to do any good to develop a mass denial attitude on this, that if we do not fund it, it will simply go away or that it does not exist unless it is funded, because it does exist and the shelters are doing all of this work. They are doing it right now.

Ontario has this fantasy that it funds shelters 80%. I also do all the financial planning and budgeting—we do many different things in our line of work in my shelter—and I know that in my shelter Ontario funds 35% of our budget. But because the funding formula says the province of Ontario funds 80% of the deficit after the municipality has given the per diem, there is this fantasy that Ontario funds 80%. In fact, it does not. It does not even recognize some of the full-time workers who work in my shelter. They are funded 100% by the taxpayers through fund-raising.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to be really matter of fact in getting responses from you. I think as a woman a lot of the things that you have said I am really responding to in terms of community services, but I would like to know what your estimates of the costs required for emergency funding are now, what the cost of block funding is not only to shelters which are members of OAITH but to those shelters which operate and which are not members of your organization, and any indication that you have of requirements in relationship to funding of secondary housing.

Ms Morrow: Second-stage housing?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Ms Morrow: I will have to answer your question the same way I answered a similar question. I do not have those estimates. I should point out, however, that the vast majority of transition houses in Ontario in fact do belong to the association. There are six or seven that do not at this moment.

I cannot give you those numbers. I guess the other way I would respond to that is that I think it is really not possible for us to give you those numbers. It is not our responsibility to figure out the costs. It is our responsibility to tell you what is needed to keep women safe in this province. We get that information from abused women and their children and we pass it on to you.

To suggest that an association which has two staff members for an 80-member organization or to suggest that individual shelters which go through the kind of constraints that I can certainly give you in detail, including the 16-hour shifts a day working directly with abused women, should be also researching and discovering what it would cost the government to provide what is needed to give women their human rights is not appropriate or possible.

I simply cannot give you those numbers. We cannot. We do not have the time to do it and we do not have the kind of machinery that this committee would have at its disposal, but we are certainly prepared to tell you what it costs us in time and resources and what is currently being given to shelters in detail, and also what else is required so that we can make those calculations and figure that out.

I guess what I would say in terms of being philosophical about it is that I do not think that money is a consideration here. We do not support the assumption that there is no money or that there is very little money, and that if the government takes it away from battered women, it will have to take it from homeless women to do that or sexual assault victims will not get support if we give the support to abused women.

I think what is required is the political will to make the decision to do this. There is plenty of money for war, for instance, and we are all too familiar with that today, and if we felt that this was an emergency, that body bags coming out of our local community homes were just as important as body bags coming out of F-618s or 925s or whatever they are, we would find the money to do this. We have never supported, nor do we support today, the idea that there is no money and that we have to be careful.

We are telling you what will keep women alive. You must do it. It is non-negotiable. It is a social human rights issue. And I cannot give you those figures.

Mrs Sullivan: And second-stage housing?

Ms Morrow: I do not have the figures for second-stage housing either, although I would suggest that second-stage housing is very important for some women. That needs to be there but what is even more important is that permanent housing must be there, that many women who are in second-stage housing are in second-stage housing because there is no permanent housing that they can afford and that is safe for them and their children.

Mr Jackson: Again, thank you for your presentation. It is such a large, complex issue for you to have to deal with and then try to deal specifically with finances.

Perhaps you could react to these brief, short statements to get a better sense of where we are at and then I have a suggested closing recommendation that you might wish to make to the committee.

A few years ago there was a figure of 10,000 on a waiting list, or put more specifically, 10,000 women who were denied access when presenting themselves or appealing for shelter. Are we far from that figure, roughly, today, to get a sense of how many women are being turned away?

The second statement that, since this is a financial committee looking at impact on budget, knowing we are going into a recession, statistics have indicated that the incidence of abuse rises in this period and domestic homicides also marginally increase so that we are actually even—although we sometimes rationalize that these are tough times for government—you must understand, we can point directly to this issue to see that this is a more complex, more compounded problem period for you.

The final point to react to is that even though the alternative funding formula is being presented again—I have seen three years of presentations on it, but—

Ms Morrow: And it will keep coming back.

Mr Jackson: —other provinces have bought into this structure in some form. There is stabilized staff funding in several provinces. It would be fair to place Ontario's commitment, legislatively staffing dollar-wise in protection. We are falling further behind and not making the progress that we are seeing in other provinces.

Those are statistics that I have seen that maybe would be helpful for this committee to understand. We are not maintaining here; we are losing ground relative to other provinces in terms of their legislated commitment.

Could you react to those three statements and then I will briefly suggest a recommendation for the committee, if you would permit me.

Ms Morrow: In terms of the 10,000 women on the waiting list, I can tell you that nothing has changed with regard to that, that we still turn away every second woman and every second child from shelter service in Ontario generally. In large urban areas such as Toronto, where there is no housing, you will be looking at a situation where women come into the shelter, then cannot get out of the shelter because there is no housing, and a turn-away rate moving upwards towards 1 out of every 9 or 10 women getting shelter and the other 9 or 10 being turned away. So it is still a serious problem and it continues to be a serious problem. It is a problem in my city as well and everywhere else in the province of Ontario.

With regard to the recession, I would make a couple of points. Yes, I think that will have a negative impact on the demand for shelter services in the province of Ontario and everywhere in the country, obviously. However, having said that, I would caution that you remember that that is not why violence happens, but that it certainly is a trigger that will increase the incidence of violence, that you remember that it will not be the cause, that when there is not a recession there will be, you know, the toothpaste not being put in the right place. But certainly when you have a good excuse, like a recession, to behave in a violent way, then it certainly removes some of the restraint from persons who are violent. That will be a problem for us.

With regard to your third statement about other provinces having block funding, yes, that is true and that has been true for some time. The province of Ontario has not developed secure funding arrangements in a similar way. In spite of the fact that we have a bigger shelter network and we have more services in the province of Ontario, they still are not being managed and we are falling behind in terms of public policy for managing that system.

Mr Jackson: Your last statement is for us not to forget that on a per capita basis, though, it is expected that the largest province with nearly 10 million people would have more beds, but on a per capital basis we are still in the lower 25% in this nation.

If this committee does not see fit specifically to isolate, and it has the power to isolate and specifically recommend that the Treasurer look at block funding—they may not go that route, they will discuss that and debate that. However, it is possible for this committee to make a strong recommendation to the Treasurer that a block funding formula be fully costed in consultation with you and then we would have some firm figures to examine.

Traditionally every year you are before this committee. I have had the pleasure—

Ms Morrow: No, actually we have never been invited before.

Mr Jackson: Well, the rape crisis centres presented some of the violence agenda in past years and they have dealt with transition homes as part of the network. However, it was not your reluctance to cost it, it is that these are very complicated figures. You do not wish to get into a debate with the ministry over them if they are your figures. It is a lot safer and easier if the ministry costs it as at least a partial sign of its willingness to look at your proposal and it is hard for it to look at it properly if it is not willing to cost it and share with you the real cost.

Would you like us to recommend that and nothing else to the Treasurer?

Ms Morrow: I would like you to recommend that block funding be implemented.

Mr Jackson: We understand that.

Ms Morrow: I understand that part of that process is that it has to be costed, obviously, but I would not be prepared to suggest that it just be costed, because people have been talking about implementing or recommending block funding and I am not prepared to suggest that what we want here is that somebody should recommend it again.

What I am saying is that somebody should implement it. It has already been recommended and if it has to be costed to be implemented, then obviously that is one of the steps that have to be taken. We understand that and we also want it to be done in consultation with us, certainly, but I do not feel it is our responsibility to produce the costs, the bottom line, so to speak, to speak in financial terms, but to consult and assist in providing those kinds of figures.

But obviously we are talking about a system where we would like to see equal pay for work of equal value, for which we cannot even give you a reasonable salary cost at this point. We can tell you what it costs right now and then we can tell you that we are being paid inappropriately. So I do not want a situation where you take what the average shelter worker in Ontario gets and then you cost a system that would have more of these underpaid people. The entire system has to be revamped in order for it to be done appropriately and with consultation and assistance. We are always there. We are always at these meetings. We are always saying we do not want another recommendation that it be recommended; we want it done.

The Chair: We are running a little behind. I would like to thank you for coming and for a very good presentation. We will be considering the information you have given us.

SHARING: A SHARED ACCOMMODATION SERVICE FOR OLDER PEOPLE

The Chair: Our next presentation is Edna Beange of Sharing: A Shared Accommodation Service for Older People.

Ms Beange: Thank you for scheduling time for our concerns today. I am here as chairman of the board of Sharing, which is a non-profit matchup service assisting older unattached persons to find suitable partners from among their peers or younger people with whom to share accommodation.

In the province as a whole, there are 16 home sharing organizations funded by the provincial Ministry of Housing in partnership with municipalities on a 75%-25% split, with a $40,000 cap on the provincial share. Of these 16 agencies, four are geared particularly to seniors: Ottawa, Hamilton, Niagara and in Metropolitan Toronto—Sharing.

The Task Force on Housing for Low-Income Single People, in Toronto, triggered a pilot project in 1985 which led to the establishment of these other groups throughout the province in the following year, 1986. Sharing itself began with New Horizons funds in October 1983 and was not accepted into the provincial stream until 1987. As you can see, these organizations have been in place for some considerable time, but the funding from the Ministry of Housing has been on an ad hoc, year-to-year basis with, in the case of Metro Toronto, matching funds.

I would now wish specifically to address Sharing and its present dilemma. Designed as it is, its activities address the needs of older adults in several ways. One of the home sharing partners must be over 55. The resulting match provides a number of benefits: reduced costs, freeing up necessary funds for other needs; live-in companionship, alleviating the loneliness often experienced by older people living alone; mutual support given over periods of illness and when problems arise; and a greater sense of security, especially in the event of a health crisis.

Becoming increasingly aware of the needs of the frailer elderly for assistance to continue to live as independently as possible, Sharing embarked on a share and care project which was two-pronged. A needs study was funded through a federal seniors independence program grant and has just been completed. I say I have brought executive summaries and unfortunately they are not in your kits. I will be happy to send them to you.

Second, a 30-week pilot project was funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services to employ part-time staff to work with semi-independent elderly to effectively match them with persons willing to share accommodation and provide some reasonably minimal support in exchange for reduced rent. This is not designed to provide a full-time companion and frequently involves someone who works outside the home. The senior providing the housing would be in receipt of support of community services such as home help or Meals on Wheels, or have a supportive family, but needs a presence in the home overnight. There are many variations. Naturally, the 30-week funding ran out some time ago.

Because Sharing was loath to lose the momentum of something which is obviously meeting a need as part of the long-term care spectrum, we have managed to limp along with some financial assistance from a service club and a foundation. At the same time, we have developed a proposal for the Minister of Community and Social Services, who has scheduled a meeting with us early in February. We have had no response from the Minister of Housing, to whom we also addressed a copy of our proposal.

Our current problem is the lack of commitment on the part of the Ministry of Housing for all the home sharing programs in the province, I might add, not just Sharing but we are specifically zeroing in on this. We were advised that funding would cease as of 31 December 1990 and Metro Toronto also followed suit with a similar withdrawing of funding. As a result of ongoing discussions, three months' funding has been provided up to 31 March 1991. The accompanying letter announcing this arrangement contained the very disturbing comment that if the continued funding was not put in place, it would give the agency time to wind down. In light of the ongoing discussions on long-term care it does not make sense to dismantle something which is working effectively with minimal staff and considerable volunteer activity.

During the past year, Sharing was given a goal of 35 matches. By 31 December 1990, we had achieved 43. This represents 11 from the Share and Care program with the balance a part of our regular stream. If this program were not in place, those 86 persons in many cases would be in need of possibly subsidized housing, a placement in a long-term care facility or some other supports. At the very least, the companionship and quality of life would be lost.

All of the home sharing agencies perform a very useful role in finding housing for a considerable number of people, without which any of these applicants would possibly be a burden on another part of the system. I was just given a statistic on that, that there were 17 until about a month ago when the Etobicoke home sharing had to discontinue because of lack of funds. In 1990, the 17 home sharing agencies made 836 matches—that is the kind of impact—and also a number of the other agencies are more housing registries than matchups. In addition to the 836 matches, they had 859 placements of putting people into self-contained units, so for a very minimal amount of money there is a lot accomplished. The advice and counselling which is incidentally provided to applicants is immeasurable.

To turn again specifically to Sharing, we are a small stand-alone organization with an effectively operating structure which, if funding were to cease, would have to be dismantled just at a time when there is such concern for provision of appropriate support to enable senior members of the community to maintain their independence to the limit of their abilities. We recognize that one-service agencies are not particularly acceptable in these days of rationalization, and for this reason have explored a number of avenues, seeking to join with another appropriate body. So far we have been unsuccessful. However, we are open to any suitable suggestion. We are fortunate to be able to rent office space in a Metro Toronto-owned building, which of course would be lost were we to cease operations on 31 March. Skilled part-time staff would undoubtedly be scattered and a loyal team of active, well-trained volunteers would move on to other things. Then, when the direction of long-term care becomes clearer, the wheel would have to be reinvented. It does not make sense that for lack of $40,000 of provincial money an effective organization which is addressing some of the most pressing needs of our older population is to be dismantled.

Thank you for the opportunity to present our concerns and ask for your consideration of the very real need for this service.

The Chair: Questions from the committee.

Mr Sutherland: I just have one. Most of the ones that you talked about seemed to be in the central Ontario area. Do you have any knowledge of any of these—

Ms Beange: The other home sharing programs?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, sort of trying to get them throughout the rest of the province.

Ms Beange: There are 16 scattered throughout the province. There are, I think, six in Metro Toronto. Ours together with Ottawa and Niagara and Hamilton are the only ones that specifically address the needs of seniors. As you can imagine, in a matching program, particularly with seniors who are somewhat more sensitive about whom they share a house with, it is quite a time-consuming effort, so it is rather a specialized type of thing.

Mr Sutherland: Is there any movement afoot or any groups that have contacted you for expanding the Sharing aspect specifically for seniors, in the other areas?

Ms Beange: No, we are a Metro Toronto agency, and a small one, as I say.

Mr Sutherland: I just thought that they might come to you for information.

Ms Beange: I think Sharing is regarded as sort of the grandmother of the group in that we have been growing since 1983, and certainly directions and activities that we undertake are appreciated by the other agencies in the province.

The Chair: Thank you for coming. It was a very nice presentation.

Ms Beange: It did not seem very urgent after listening to the women's shelters, I agree, but I think I am speaking on behalf of a quiet group of people. The seniors who are somewhat frail or somewhat housebound or are in need of assistance I think are the kinds of people for whom I am speaking. They are not quite so high profile as some of the others, but the need is there and overall it is about $900,000 for the total province, all the home-sharing agencies. Individually, it is $40,000. We think we are somewhat unique and we do need some assistance.

In your package you will find a couple of letters from SPRINT, which is Senior People's Resources in North Toronto—I will not read them to you, but you can find them there—commenting on the effect that our services had on some of their clients.

I thank you very much for listening to us. At least we have raised your awareness.

The Chair: That is the most important thing to do in the first stage.

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Royal Bank of Canada, Alex Thomson, vice-president of economics. I would like to thank you for responding to our invitation.

Mr Thomson: It is my pleasure, Mr Chairman. I would like to illustrate my remarks with some slides. I sometimes find it easier to talk with pictures. It is sometimes easier on the audience.

The Chair: I think we should probably turn out the lights and pull the drapes. Unless we are going to watch it on Mr Phillips's shirt, I think we may have to ask him to move. Maybe we could take just a short two-minute break.

Mr Thomson: My name is Alex Thomson. I am vice-president of economics at the Royal Bank. My responsibilities are to manage the economics department of the bank. Accompanying me here today is Mark Chandler, who is my assistant chief economist, who is based in Toronto and is quite knowledgeable about the economy of Ontario.

What I would like to do is to speak for about 20 minutes on the Canadian economic outlook, with particular focus on Ontario. I would like to focus in basically on three things: The first is, where do Canada and Ontario stand now in terms of the economic cycle? Second, what challenges and risks do we face as an economic nation? The third thing is the outlook for Ontario as we see it.

The first thing I would like to point out, which is obvious, is that Canada and Ontario are in recession. Essentially we have had a very strong 1980s. We have had the longest recovery and expansion phase of the economic cycle in our postwar economic history, for a little over seven years. As you can see from this chart, the economy of Canada began to decelerate in the early part of 1988. That deceleration continued through 1989, and in the early part of 1990 we moved into the negative growth range where the economy began to contract. The definition of a recession is that the economy is in a phase of the cycle where the level of economic activity is actually contracting. That is where we are now. While we do not have the full figures available, we expect that when they are available they will show that the recession in Canada has extended through to the present day.

Obviously, with the slowdown in economic activity we are seeing a decline in terms of employment growth, and as you can see from this chart, paralleling the movement and economic activity as we moved towards the latter part of 1990, we began to see actual declines or job losses within the Canadian economy. Similarly, with the decline in employment, as you can see, the unemployment rate in Canada has moved up from its cyclical peak or low point of 7.2% in the early part of 1990 to 9.3% today.

The movement in Ontario has been similar in magnitude. However, because of the extraordinary growth in the economy of Ontario during the period of expansion, as you are well aware, the level of resource utilization and the unemployment rate moved down to about the 5% level in the province at the peak of the cycle. Since the recession has begun, the unemployment rate in Ontario has moved up by about the same magnitude as the rest of the country but at a lower level, with the unemployment rate in the country now being just over 7%.

In terms of the recession, it is the culmination of a number of factors within our economy. One is simply the fact that we had the longest recovery and expansion in our postwar history. With that long expansion, imbalances and excesses began to develop in our economy. Therefore the economy moved into a period of slower growth, which is part of the natural ebb and flow of economic affairs.

The second thing that has occurred, of course, has been the slowdown in economic activity in the United States. Because 25% of Canada's economy is dependent on trade, and the bulk of that with the United States, with the slowdown in economic activity in the country south of the border, it has had impacts on our economy here.

The third thing, of course, is that we are seeing a rise in the price of oil, at least had seen until just a few days ago. Because of that rise in the price of oil, the change in relative prices and the income transfers that take place because of that rise in the price of oil, our economy went into a period of adjustment which also slowed economic growth.

At the same time, there is no question that one factor in terms of the slowdown in economic growth which we have seen has been the high level of interest rates in Canada, in comparison with the United States particularly and also in real terms—that is after deducting the rate of inflation—which gives you a measure of the real cost of funds within our economy. As you can see from this chart, while rates have come down to that point in December and have come down early in January, we still are seeing in Canada rates which are very high relative to the United States and very high in real terms.

I would like to make several points about interest rates in Canada and their complementary price within the economy and the exchange rate, because the exchange rate and interest rates tend to move in tandem. The first is that the way in which we have divided responsibility for our economic policies within the country, the Bank of Canada is responsible for attempting to maintain a low and stable rate of inflation. That is its job for our economy and the single job to which it is allocated. From the Bank of Canada's perspective, we have been facing and continue to face a relatively serious inflation problem.

As you can see from this chart, the rate of inflation in Canada has been hovering around the 5% rate over the past year or so. We have achieved a 5% rate of inflation, but a 5% rate of inflation still means that we would lose, over a 10-year period, about 40% of the purchasing power of our money. Therefore, because of that, we are concerned—I am sorry, over five years we would lose approximately a third of the purchasing power of our money. I was calculating as I was going along there and did it wrong. That level of inflation with that decline in purchasing power would lead to substantial unwarranted income transfers within our economy and therefore it would not be conducive to solid economic performance.

The other point I would make about our inflation rate is that we have achieved a 5% inflation rate in an environment over that period of time in which our exchange rate has appreciated very significantly. Because of that appreciation of the exchange rate and the fact that we import approximately 25% of the goods consumed within our economy, effectively what we have done is suppress domestic inflation as measured by the CPI because of the relatively low cost of our imports. We would estimate that effectively we have parked about 2% of a general price rise in the Canadian economy in our high exchange rate. When the exchange rate unwinds, as we believe it eventually will, that price rise will be released back into the Canadian economy. So we are, in terms of our measured inflation performance, facing an unacceptable situation.

The second point is, in terms of costs, we also have seen wage and salary rates in Canada move up to about the 6% to 6.5% to 7% level in Canada, and considerably higher than that of the United States. Effectively, since labour makes up approximately two thirds of the overall economic costs in our society, wage and salary increases at this level were inconsistent with maintaining our inflation rate even at the 5% level.

To top it all off, as you are aware, we have faced now the introduction of the GST on 1 January. As a consequence of the GST, we are likely going to see about a 1.5% increase in terms of our measured inflation rate during the early part of 1991. There was considerable concern in this environment that we are facing, with respect to price and cost increases, that the introduction of the GST would lead to even higher wage and salary increases which would feed through into prices and, therefore, lead to a round secondary and tertiary rounds, of price increases that would feed through into a permanent rise in terms of the rate of inflation.

So for all those reasons, because the Bank of Canada has a responsibility for inflation within the allocation of responsibilities within our system, they were quite concerned about the inflationary situation. But that does not explain in my mind why we have interest rates so much higher relative to the rate of inflation in recent years than we have seen in the past.

During the postwar era it seemed that unreal interest rates in the order of 3% to 5% were sufficient to slow down the level of activity within our economy. More recently, we seem to be seeing real interest rates in the order of 7% to 10% as being necessary to slow down the economy and also to dampen inflationary and cost pressures within our economy. I think a large part of the reason why we have much higher interest rates today than we have in the past is an imbalance or mismatch between our monetary policy and our fiscal policy.

What this chart shows is essentially that we have seen mounting levels of government debt, particularly at the federal level. And as you can see, we are continuing, until we have seen a very sharp rise in terms of the percentage of debt outstanding by the federal government to gross domestic product and, at the same time, we are continuing to see a deficit at the federal level of approximately $30 billion a year. The federal deficit and the financing that accompanies that place stress on our financial markets and interest rates rise in order to force other borrowers to withdraw from financial markets in order to leave room for the federal government, because the federal government, as the premier credit in the land, always gets the funds that it requires. It is other borrowers that must make adjustments.

As a consequence of the federal government placing that strain and demand on our financial markets and the necessity of having interest rates rise in order to encourage other borrowers to leave the market and to leave room for the federal government, interest rates have gone up. At the same time, part of that process has been that we have turned to foreign capital inflows in order to balance demand and supply within our domestic financial markets. As you can see from this chart, Canada also has been sharply increasing its reliance on foreign debt. What that means is that every year we are asking foreign investors not just to maintain their investments or holdings of Canadian securities, but also to increase their holdings of Canadian securities, increase their allocation of funds to Canadian debt in order to balance demand and supply in Canadian financial markets. Essentially, because we increasingly rely on foreign borrowers, we also have to provide increasingly attractive interest rate incentive for those borrowers to hold Canadian dollar securities relative to securities issued by other borrowers.

The consequence of those foreign capital inflows has been that the Canadian dollar has increased quite significantly. As you can see from this chart, while it has been fairly volatile over the course of 1990 and 1991, it has tended to average at about the 86-cent to 87-cent level relative to the US dollar. Our basic view is that the level of the Canadian dollar that would be consistent with Canada's underlying price and cost structure relative to our trading partners would probably be in the order of 80 cents. Therefore, in effect, because of the foreign capital inflows that are encouraged because of the mismatch between monetary and fiscal policy, we are seeing those foreign capital inflows, which is leading to a sharp rise in the Canadian dollar which is causing distress for people in the export business and also Canadian manufacturers and producers who compete directly with imports.

Mr Phillips: A point of clarification, if I might: The percentage of foreign debt at 35%, is that for the federal debt or for the total debt of the country?

Mr Thomson: That is for federal.

Mr Phillips: The federal, the $350-billion to $360-billion debt in Canada.

The Chair: Do you have any raw numbers in terms of absolute dollars the Canadian government owes overseas? How much of it is domestic and how much is offshore?

Mr Thomson: I do not have that at my fingertips. The overall federal debt is about $350 billion. Certainly a portion of that would be nominated in US dollars, a relatively small proportion. The other part would be Canadian dollar securities held by foreign investors. At the same time, what would also happen is that other borrowers, provincial and municipal and corporate, would be turning to foreign capital markets because of the pressures within Canadian financial markets. Therefore, it would be the entire group together that would represent our obligations to foreign borrowers, which would be creating the kind of environment in which we set interest rates.

The Chair: Just to pursue this for a moment, I think Diane Francis wrote an article in the Financial Post that the foreign debt of the Canadian government is $57 billion owed overseas, but that the private sector owes something like $260 billion overseas. Is the fact that the private sector debt is so large also part of the equation that leads to the high dollar and the foreign borrowing?

Mr Thomson: Let me put it another way. Essentially, we have had a deficit in place through quite an extraordinary expansion within the Canadian economy. An appropriate fiscal policy at the federal level and other government levels could be that you would borrow and have a deficit during times of economic weakness. When you move into periods of economic strength, the borrowing demands of the private sector move up quite significantly. What should happen in order to balance financial markets in that environment is that the federal government should move into a cash surplus position. In other words, rather than drawing funds away from the market it should be contributing funds towards the market.

What we have seen is that over the period of the expansion of the 1980s, the federal government has been a continual taker of funds in financial markets, with the consequence that other borrowers—in effect, the federal government is using up available savings provided principally by the Canadian consumer, by Canadian families. They are investing in those government instruments, which then of course leads other borrowers, where those funds are not available to them, to turn to foreign savers in order to capture or obtain the funds they want to make the investments or whatever other purpose they wish to borrow for. The fact that private borrowers have gone abroad is neither here nor there. The issue is that altogether, in terms of the demands placed on Canadian savings because of the addition of the government borrowing demands over the period of the economic upswing, when the increase in private sector borrowing occurs, we continue to see heavy demands by federal government, which has caused other borrowers to turn abroad. Does that answer your question?

The Chair: Yes, it does help.

Mr Thomson: For example, suppose we did have balance in our domestic financial markets, then a private borrower goes abroad. What would happen in those circumstances is that if a private sector borrower or any other borrower goes abroad and we have a demand and supply balance in our Canadian financial markets, we would obviously have a surplus of funds here in Canada, which would then cause us to purchase debt or other instruments abroad, so on a net basis we would come out the same. See what I mean? Looking at Canada, it is the overall gap between demand and supply which is the problem.

The Chair: Okay. I will not make my political comment.

Mr Thomson: Because of this mismatch we have had very high interest rates and a high exchange rate. What that means in terms of the current recession is that it is has been relatively unbalanced. Because of the high level of interest rates and exchange rate, interest-sensitive areas and exchange-rate-sensitive areas such as export industries have paid more than their share in terms of the current recession in comparison with the past.

As you can see from this chart, with industrial production, the slowdown became more pronounced earlier than in the rest of the economy. And as you can see from the chart, the negative numbers for industrial production basically began earlier and have been deeper than for the rest of the economy. The goods sector of our economy, and most particularly the manufacturing sector of our economy, which is concentrated very much in Ontario and Quebec, has been more affected by the current recession than they would have been if we had a more balanced economic policy structure.

One point I would like to make is that in terms of our manufacturing sector high interest rates and a high exchange rate are an important part of the problem, but they are only part of the problem. What this chart shows is average hourly earnings in manufacturing in Canadian dollars for both the United States and Canada over the past five years. As you can see, the index in the United States has been moving down, principally because of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar. The Canadian index has moved up quite significantly.

Over that period of time, it turns out that average hourly earnings, or unit labour costs, in Canada have increased in Canadian dollars at something like 42% more than average hourly earnings or unit labour costs in the United States. Only about 40% of that increase has been due to the exchange rate, even though we are taking a period of time, in 1986, when the exchange rate was at a record low of approximately 70 cents. So over that time, when our exchange rate has appreciated from about 70 cents to approximately 86 or 87 cents today, that only accounts for about 40% of the overall deterioration in the unit labour costs in Canadian manufacturing relative to the United States. The remainder of that change has principally been due to the higher increase in wage costs that has occurred in Canada, which is roughly the same as the magnitude of the increase in the exchange rate. The other factor is that we have seen some fairly significant productivity or efficiency improvements in US manufacturing over that period of time. We essentially have seen a flat picture for productivity or efficiency in the Canadian manufacturing sector.

Mr Sutherland: Could I get a clarification? You said the overall difference on the scale was 42%?

Mr Thomson: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: You said 40% of that has to do with fluctuations in the exchange, and the other 2% is due to labour costs?

Mr Thomson: That is right.

Mr Kwinter: Does this average hourly earnings include fringe or is that just the nominal labour rate?

Mr Thomson: I believe that is just the basic rate. I do not think it includes fringe.

Mr Kwinter: Do you have any figures about what happens when you add the fringe in?

Mr Thomson: I could certainly get them. It really would be about the same.

Mr Kwinter: The reason I ask that is that we have always had an advantage in Ontario—and we had someone in this morning who sort of confirmed it—as far as labour costs are concerned when you take everything in when you add the fringe, when you add the univers, medicare and all of that stuff. I am just wondering whether you have figures on that, because this gives the impression that our labour costs are non-competitive, when, certainly in the auto industry I have always heard there is an almost $10-an-hour differential between Ontario and, say, Michigan in favour of Ontario.

Mr Thomson: Somewhere buried in this mass, I have it by industry. There is no question that in terms of the differential between the United States and Canada the auto industry is one that is quite favourable relative to the others, but when you move into some of the other industries or manufacturing sectors in Canada and Ontario it deteriorates quite significantly.

The one point I would make is that regardless of how we talk about the levels, what we are talking about here in terms of the last five years is a change in the relative labour costs within our sector versus that in the United States. Of course, regardless of the levels, that deterioration is still going to have an impact on the sector here.

Mr Phillips: I just want to make sure I understood the answer you gave to Mr Sutherland. You said there had been a 42% swing in the differential between Canada and the US wage rates.

Mr Thomson: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I thought you said 40% of that is due to the exchange rate and 60% is due to wage changes. If your answer to him was that 40 percentage points was due to the exchange and two percentage points due to the wage differences, which is the right answer?

Mr Thomson: I am sorry. It is that 40% of that is due to the exchange rate change. The remainder is due to both productivity and wage rates.

Mr Phillips: That is, 60%?

Mr Thomson: Yes.

Mr Phillips: That is what I thought, but you said to him—

Mr Thomson: I am sorry.

The Chair: Given that there is such a discrepancy in the wages paid in the United States—this average is for the entire United States—do you have any sense of what it is in the immediate area around Ontario: New York state, Ohio, Michigan?

Mr Thomson: I do not.

Mr Chandler: The Ontario Ministry of Treasury and Economics has done some work in that area. They find that Canada, and Ontario in particular, is more competitive with the northeast states. But once again it is a question of rates of change, and any competitive advantage we might have had over the last several years has certainly been eroded. If you look at it, particularly with more of the southeast states, there is a big cost disadvantage there. It is something that has become more and more of a concern for the Ontario manufacturing sector. They have done some extensive work in this area and part of it involved as well what kind of benefit you get from OHIP. How is that comparable to what is being paid in terms of private insurance in the US? It turns out it is not a huge advantage for Canadian manufacturers, something in the 6%-of-payroll range. So we cannot continue to count on that as a benefit.

Mrs Sullivan: My understanding is that the comparison of, say, employee health coverage in border states, which are highly competitive with Ontario and in fact are our markets, is about $3,800 per employee, whereas in Canada in the same sectors it is about $800. So you are talking about a singular advantage.

Mr Chandler: Yes, but about 60% of production costs is made up of wages. So this, overall, would have a bigger impact. Once again, we are talking rates of change. I would refer you to the Ministry of Treasury and Economics for its studies along these lines, but it is something of big concern to manufacturers, and that is what we hear often when we go on the road and talk to them.

Mr Thomson: Let me turn to the outlook. First, let me say that we have made some fairly benign assumptions with respect to our outlook. We are making the assumption in terms of our forecast that the oil price will be in the $20-less range per barrel. As you can see from this chart, if we were to see a sustained level of a $30 oil price, then we would see a negative impact in terms of the growth prospects for our major trading partners as well as ourselves. Clearly, because of the negative impact on our major trading partners it would have a negative impact in terms of our export performance. While we are relatively self-sufficient in terms of oil and gas and other forms of energy, a rise in the price of oil of that magnitude over a period of time would lead to fairly significant income transfers within the country that would have to be accommodated with detrimental impact in terms of our growth. We are making the assumption in terms of our forecast that we will not have this kind of environment but have an oil price of $20 or less.

We are also making the assumption that we will not see any major reduction in terms of the structural deficit at the federal level. In fact, because of the recession and the effect it has on revenue generation and increased expenditures by the federal government, likely we will see an increase in the federal deficit over the next several years. We are expecting it to move up to the $35-billion range in the coming fiscal year.

Offsetting that to some degree, because of the slowdown in the demand by the private sector for funds we should see an improvement in terms of net private domestic savings. But we will continue, because of the gap between private domestic savings and the demands by the federal government, to rely heavily on foreign funds over this period of time, which has implications for our interest rates and exchange rate.

We are also making the assumption in terms of our inflation rate that we will see the consumer price index move up because of the introduction of the GST, but we are also making the assumption that the labour market will behave in a rational way and the workers or employees will not try—

Mr Kwinter: Do you hear that, Gordon?

Mr Thomson: As you obviously cannot get a tax back from your employer in a non-inflationary environment, if you are going to protest a tax there is little point in protesting to your employer; you protest at the ballot box. So we are making the assumption that the labour market will behave in a rational way, that the labour force will absorb the reduction in real incomes that accompanies the GST, and therefore we will move into a more subdued cost-increase environment. As a consequence of that, we are expecting the rate of inflation in Canada, as we move forward into 1992, to fall back to about the 4% level.

With that environment, we are expecting that Canadian interest rates will decline, with the short-term commercial paper rate moving to just below 10%. We are expecting the differential with the United States to decline. Even with that, we will continue to see real interest rates of above 5%, which will be relatively high in comparison with the past, at least prior to the last several years.

With that reduction in interest rates and differential with the United States, we are also expecting the Canadian dollar to depreciate to about the 83-cent level over the next several years, which should provide some relief to our manufacturers and export sector and import-competing areas. Nevertheless, we still think the dollar will be remaining above the level over the next several years, which should provide some relief to our manufacturers and export sector and import competing areas, but nevertheless we still think the dollar will remain above a level which is consistent with our underlying cost and price structure relative to our trading partners.

The Chair: I asked this question this morning and I would like to hear your response to it as well. Given that in January 1990 the central bank lowered its prime lending rate, which led to a decline in the value of the Canadian dollar and an immediate response on behalf of the central bank to increase the prime lending rate back up, what is it that makes you optimistic that the dollar will decline and do what you are suggesting or that the central bank rate will allow it to decline?

Mr Thomson: I can give you a half-hour answer to that, but let me try to capsulize it in a couple of minutes.

The Chair: It would certainly help if you were to do that.

Mr Thomson: What happened in January 1990 was that the Bank of Canada was looking at a series of economic numbers that looked as if the economy was in a recession. We and others were visibly revising our forecast to incorporate a recession occurring at the end of 1989. The Bank of Canada began to gingerly reduce interest rates, and as you know it reduced interest rates or the bank rate by about 25 bases points, with the consequence that the exchange rate fell very sharply by, I believe, about 3.5 cents in the space of a week or so.

First of all, I do not understand the reaction of the strange marketplace in that environment. As it turned out, that was not why interest rates rose later. What happened was that almost as soon as the Bank of Canada began to reduce interest rates, new economic numbers came out which showed that the economy, rather than moving into a recession, was still relatively robust. For example, business investment was still strong. Housing starts remained extraordinarily strong through the first quarter of 1990. Basically the economy looked to be relatively robust.

The Bank of Canada then went on to increase interest rates at that time, not because it wanted to protect the dollar but because it felt that the economy was now moving in a direction that it had not foreseen and did not expect, as did the rest of us. That is the reason the interest rates went up.

At the same time maybe the market was prescient in the sense that it thought the economy was stronger than economists were reading, and therefore reacted to the reduction in the bank rate that took place as being in some way the surrender by the Bank of the Canada with respect to its inflationary policies. That may be the case.

The point is that if the Bank of Canada makes an interest rate move that is considered by the market to be an abandonment of its inflationary policy, the exchange market will react badly. This time around, as you know, we have had reductions in interest rates over the past little while, but they have not had the same kind of impact on the exchange rate as they had earlier. Basically, I think the market does have confidence and trust in the Bank of Canada with respect to its inflationary course and thinks it is seeing signs, and we think we are seeing signs, that it is beginning to be successful.

Because of the slowdown in the economy, those signs that we appear to be relatively successful in reducing inflation are turning around the inflationary situation. The market in that environment is willing to accept interest rate reductions by the Bank of Canada in a relatively stable and gradual lowering, rather than abrupt lowering of the exchange rate. Does that help?

The Chair: That does not answer one question, why it is that our inflation rate is only about 0.1% or 0.2% higher than the American inflation rate and yet they have such a low central bank rate. If what we are really doing is battling the inflation rate using a high central bank rate, why is it that their rate is so much lower than ours at a time when our interest rates are so much higher?

Mr Thomson: The first point I would make is the one I made earlier, which is that in terms of our underlying inflation rate, the CPI is not measuring that properly. Because of the appreciation of the exchange rate over the last several years, we have dampened our measured inflation rate because of that. It is parked there. It is going to be released back into our economy.

The second point I would make is that in terms of underlying cost and price movements within the United States, particularly in terms of wage costs and other costs within its economy, it has been performing at rates that appear to be relatively favourable compared with Canada.

Therefore, the market, I think, is tending to read a somewhat more favourable situation there than in Canada.

If we can move to an environment whereby our inflation rate moves down, and moves down below that of the United States—because I certainly do not think the American experience with inflation in the last few years is entirely satisfactory either—then hopefully we can move to an environment whereby our rates will be down to their levels.

Mr Phillips: Still on the same point, this will take the dollar down by two or so points over the year, I gather, the foreign capital markets will see their capital here in Canada appreciate by 2% or 2.5%. You see this contributing maybe 1% inflation to the economy, based on the thing you went through.

Mr Thomson: Yes.

Mr Phillips: You went to an 80-cent dollar, you think it is 2%, so 1% of inflation in the economy; second, how do you manage your way with our foreign borrowers, that they do not vacate the market or—

Mr Thomson: That is an excellent question. Clearly, if you are going to have a depreciation, the thing you should do is have it immediately, because if you do have expectations that your exchange rate is going to depreciate gradually, then that feeds through, of course, into the interest rates that foreign investors will expect in order to keep them whole in terms of their own currency. But essentially what we are expecting in terms of this environment, rather than looking at sort of the smooth gradual decline, I would tend to think that over this period of time we will see the exchange rate move to a lower level.

One of the risks in terms of our forecast, of course, is if we see an abrupt decline that is considerably greater than we are expecting here. For example, because of political uncertainty, because of the constitutional debate within this country, if that causes foreign investors to question our confidence or demand a risk premium in terms of Canadian assets, then that could have a sharper impact in terms of the exchange rate. Also, if we have for whatever reason some catalytic event that causes foreign investors to lose confidence in Canada and its economic prospects and policy environment, that could also have a sharp impact in terms of the exchange rate. As I say, we are making the assumption of a relatively benign economic climate for our view in terms of the forecast.

What we are expecting in terms of our forecast is that we are essentially looking for the recession to end by the middle of this year. Effectively, what we are looking for is a relatively, if I could use this term, normal recession. We are looking for a recession that will be approximately 40% to 50% as severe as the one in 1981-82.

One of the discouraging things, I think, in terms of the outlook is that when we move into the recovery phase in the latter part of this year and in 1992, it will be a relatively modest recovery. Canada's potential rate of growth is about 3% per year. What that means is that the growth in our economic output should be about 3% per year in order to maintain a constant utilization of our economic resources because of growth in the labour force, because of improvements in productivity and because of capital investment. The capacity of our economy is growing by 3%. Therefore, we need to grow by 3% just to keep things even.

We do not expect to reach that 3% level until well into 1992. Therefore, by the end of 1992 we will probably only have achieved the level of economic activity that we experienced at the peak of the economic expansion in the first quarter of 1990. Part of the reason for that, of course, is the fact of some structural difficulties with respect to our costs. Also, while we are expecting the interest rate and exchange rate to decline, we are expecting that we will continue to see relatively high levels in those two areas.

This is kind of an awkward colour and I apologize, but perhaps I could just sort of explain. This shows real gross domestic product growth in Ontario. Essentially, Ontario experienced a somewhat deeper recession at the initial stages of the recession. The decline or deceleration of the rate of growth was somewhat steeper in Ontario relative to the rest of the country. We are expecting that Ontario will also show negative growth in 1991, about 0.3%, and we are expecting in 1992 that the growth in the Ontario economy will be roughly about the national average, just about 0.5%.

In terms of the unemployment rate, again, we are expecting to see the unemployment rate move to about the 0.5% level in 1991 on average over the course of the year. We are expecting to see it decline somewhat moderately to just below 7% in 1992 with the recovery.

Essentially, in terms of the level of unemployment in Ontario, we are expecting the rate to be approximately two percentage points below that of the rest of the country. Therefore, in terms of the utilization of its labour force and labour resources within the province, the level of utilization within the province will be greater than that for the rest of the country taken as a whole.

In terms of retail sales, we are expecting quite a weak picture. In 1990, retail sales declined by close to 2% in nominal terms. When you take in our rate of inflation of 3%, clearly that was a very sharp drop in after-inflation terms.

In 1991, we are expecting to see an increase of about 1% in current terms. Much of that is principally due to the GST and the increase in prices associated with that. In real terms, we expect to continue to see a sharp contraction in terms of retail sales within the province.

Of course, this reflects the higher levels of unemployment, and with the prospects or concern about people, about their job security as well as the decline in housing prices in southern Ontario, this is having an effect on confidence and people's commitment to spending. So we are expecting to see a relatively weak picture in 1992. We are expecting to see an improvement in terms of sales, but after inflation it will be a relatively modest improvement.

Mr Kwinter: In your projection on retail sales, have you factored in cross-border shopping and is that a significant component?

Mr Thomson: Yes, we have to some degree in the sense that the figure for 1990 clearly has been affected by that. Therefore, we are taking that into account in terms of the overall picture.

Mrs Sullivan: If you were looking at constant dollars for retail sales in 1991, what level would you be looking at, about the 1988 level?

Mr Thomson: If you are looking in constant dollars in 1990, you have a decline of close to 7%. You are looking at a decline in 1991 of about a further 4%. Putting that together, it would bring you back to where you were in about 1988 or 1987.

In terms of housing starts, clearly we have seen some very substantial declines in Ontario. We are expecting that to continue in 1991, part because of what occurred in Ontario and part because of speculation that took place in that particular market, but effectively the level of housing starts and housing completions earlier, prior to the recession, were well above demographic demand, particularly taking into account the fact that interprovincial migration into the province has fallen quite sharply, and therefore of course the province has an excess supply of inventory that must be worked off in order to lead to a recovery in terms of housing starts.

We are expecting in 1992 to see some modest improvement in terms of housing starts, but clearly the level of housing starts and housing construction that takes place would be well below that experienced in the latter part of the 1980s when the recovery was in full swing.

In terms of non-residential investment, here we are expecting to see in 1990—this is in current dollars as well, so when we show zero in 1990 of course we are seeing a decline in real terms or a contraction of about 5%. A decline in 1991, which will be completely concentrated in terms of commercial construction, will also be sharply negative, of approximately 7% or 8%, and we are expecting to see modest increase in nominal terms in 1992 and probably a further contraction in real terms.

The one point I would like to make about non-residential investment, however, is that if you look back Ontario and the rest of the country also experienced extraordinarily rapid growth in terms of overall investment. Essentially, in 1989 investment as a proportion of the economy reached a record high level. I think there were a number of factors that were taking place. The first was that after the longest recovery and expansion phase, a number of regions and sectors were hitting capacity constraints and therefore were making the investments in order to increase their production capability.

I think the second thing is—much of this investment was taking place in the manufacturing sector and principally in southwestern Ontario, because of the global competition and the increased competition because of free trade or expectations of competition because of free trade—that substantial amounts of investment were taking place in order to rationalize the production process in order to improve efficiency and reduce costs for that kind of competitive environment.

The third thing, I think, that was happening was that the cost of technology, computers and telecommunications, has come down quite significantly. In addition to that the application of that technology is now well known. Five years ago, when businesses bought a computer, the first thing they had to do was figure out how to use it. Now when you buy a computer the applications are there and they can be applied and the expenditure on that equipment can become productive and substantially improve efficiency almost immediately. Therefore, there was substantial expenditure on high technology, computers and telecommunications, in order to improve the efficiency of production processes and office systems. That was also part of the investment that was taking place.

When you put that all together, even though we are seeing a reduction in investment taking place in the recession that is now occurring, we do not expect a reduction in investment in percentage terms to be quite as severe as it was in 1981-82. At the same time, because the economy is coming off a very high level of investment, we expect that the proportion of investment and the degree of investment that is taking place within our economy will still remain relatively favourable. It would have been even more favourable if it were not contractive, but given that we are in a recession, it is still in a relatively favourable phase.

With that, I would like to end my remarks and I would be happy to answer any further questions you might have.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to pursue your last slide in relationship to business investment. Your chart shows the decline in the rate. Can you give us an idea of what the actual level of 1989 business investment in Ontario was in current dollar terms?

Mr Thomson: I could certainly provide that number to you at a later time. In terms of the overall proportion of the economy which was accounted for by investment it would be approximately 17%.

Mrs Sullivan: It would be 17% of the economy.

Mr Thomson: Yes. With the reduction we are seeing, we would expect that to decline.

Mr Jamison: Your report dealt with many of the economic signs presented this morning by the Toronto-Dominion Bank.

Mr Jamison: We had the honour of their presence this morning, and one question that was asked basically related to the ability to rebound from the recession and jobs. There is a phenomenon happening right now that makes this recession, again, different from the recession of 1982. It seems to be that permanent layoffs are occurring at a much higher level and the effect of that is obvious as far as rebound in the economy. Our figures, the figures that the government of Ontario collects, only equate to 50-plus employer groups. My feeling is that many of the 50-minus groups are disappearing. What effect will that have on our ability to rebound and what type of jobs, if any, are replacing those?

Mr Thomson: You put your finger on a critical question and one that we are examining very, very closely in our shop, and I am sure it is happening in other economic shops as well. But the answer to your question is, I do not know, and the reason is that I am not sure about the permanence.

I have heard the argument, and I hear it very often, "But this is different from the last time because the losses last time were cyclical; this time they are permanent." Now, let me sort out the strands of the answer.

The first thing is that if you look at manufacturing employment, essentially what happened was, during the period of the late 1980s, in part because of the very low level of the Canadian dollar, in the 70-cent range—I say that now the Canadian dollar is overvalued and is hurting our exports and import-competing industries. That kind of dollar, in the 70-cent range, was clearly undervalued and was providing encouragement to exports and import-competing sectors.

When we look at the employment levels from about 1986 through 1989, there was a very sharp rise in manufacturing employment in Canada and Ontario. As we moved into the last little while, we have begun to move down in terms of manufacturing employment and we have not seen something yet that is as severe as 1981-82 and we have not come back to trend. By trend, I mean the trend in terms of manufacturing employment within our nation. If you want a trend through the last 15 years, we moved well above trend in the last five years and we are beginning to come down, but we are not back to trend.

The second point I would make is that if you look at manufacturing in Canada relative to the United States, the manufacturing sector in Canada has performed; at least in terms of employment, has done considerably better than the United States.

The other point that is made is, and I have heard examples and I have talked with people, "Lose the jobs or move into the United States." I am sure it has happened, but in terms of the aggregate numbers, that happens whatever whether we are in a recession or whether we have free trade. It has been happening for years, but other jobs are occurring in Canada or jobs are moving here. As I say, in terms of employment, we have not yet seen anything to suggest that we are into something permanent.

In terms of direct investment by Canada in the last little while, as you well know, in the late 1980s we had a very high level of foreign direct investment by Canadians abroad. Those numbers have been coming down. At the same time, in 1990, through the period we have to date, foreign direct investment in Canada has gone up; not by a whole lot, but it has gone up. So the answer to your question is that it is difficult to grasp anything, that this is as permanent as opposed to cyclical. You really have to almost move to certainly the industry level, probably the company level, in order to be able to aggregate enough cases to come to some kind of sensible solution. But it is something we are looking at very carefully.

We have sort of looked at as many numbers as we can. To answer your question, we are not sure whether we can make the statement that this recession is different in the

...nse that structural changes are occurring across manufacturing as a whole—and I will point to individual examples on either side of the argument—but for manufacturing as a whole that this is occurring, that it is a structural and permanent job loss.

Mr Phillips: I feel better now than I did when I came here this morning, because both you and the TD, I think, are predicting that we will come out of the recession kind of in midyear. That is far more optimistic than I have been. The numbers I had seen were that in Ontario, for about six straight years we created 135,000 jobs; 1989 was 85,000; 1990 was minus 120,000. Full-time jobs were minus 65,000 because part-time went up by 45,000 or thereabouts, and there were 10% fewer manufacturing jobs at the end of the year than at the start of the year. I feel a bit like the person who is maybe falling and being reassured that the parachute is going to open. Both you and the TD have assured us the parachute will open.

Just how important do you feel the manufacturing sector is to the economy? It is 20% of the jobs and, I have always thought, 30% of the domestic product or something like that. Is it something we need to be worried about, or is the whole world going to fewer manufacturing jobs anyway, and just let it happen?

Mr Thomson: From an economic perspective, whether you work in resource extraction, agriculture, manufacturing or service industry, they are all making a contribution to the economy. At issue is, are you providing the goods and services that the market demands and that you can produce efficiently and well? Canada and Ontario do have advantages in terms of manufacturing, and what I would like to see is, are we creating the conditions within our country that permit that to thrive and prosper? Frankly, I do not think we have it right in terms of providing the conditions and environment in terms of policies that would permit that to happen.

Is it necessary that we produce automobiles? The answer to that is no, if we can do something better—banking, take your pick—in terms of technology or telecommunications or software or whatever it be. If we can do that better and we can create a market for that, then that is what we should be doing. But from an economic perspective, one job is not better than another.

By the way, just to illustrate the point I was making earlier, I realized I did have a chart there and it gives you a picture of where we are in terms of manufacturing between Canada and the United States.

Mr Phillips: But I gather, as a percentage of the workforce, that has probably gone from 33% down to 28% or something like that.

Mr Thomson: Yes, something like that.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, I want to thank you for the lesson on international finance and money exchange markets. I have read many articles and never quite understood it, but it is a little clearer today as to what the underlying bases are. I am not afraid to admit that I am one person who has not a great understanding of economics. I am sure some of the opposition would think we have very little understanding.

Mr Thomson: Why do I think I am being set up here?

Mr Sutherland: At the same time, I want to ask a couple of specific questions about Ontario. You talked quite a bit about the national debt and the federal debt. I wonder if you could make some comment on whether you have any concerns about provincial debt at this time, whether it is the annual deficit or overall debt picture.

Question 2 relates to the fact that the thing that irks me, not coming from the Metro Toronto area, and listening to the governor of the Bank of Canada talk about the inflation rate, that Ontario's economy was overheated and that was pushing up inflation all across, is that when Toronto's inflation rate seems to be about 1 to 1.5 percentage points ahead of the rest of the province, the entire province suffers from that fact when the Bank of Canada is reacting to that. I was wondering if you could comment whether you feel that is to some degree an overreaction or whether, as Metro goes, the rest of the province has to suffer along.

Mr Thomson: I sympathize with what you are saying. The Bank of Canada, as I say, has assigned responsibility for controlling inflation. It has one instrument for doing that and that is the interest rate. It only has one interest rate it can control, for a variety of reasons, and that is the 90-day Treasury bill rate.

When the Bank of Canada is setting monetary policy, it has to look at the nation as a whole and therefore sets monetary policy on the basis of the nation as a whole, not regions. Ontario, because it makes up close to 40% of the overall national economy, clearly has a major influence in terms of what are deemed to be national economic conditions.

In an appropriate environment, what we should be doing is using monetary policy and fiscal policy in tandem. Therefore, if we do have national policies that are geared at slowing down some regions of the country, whereas we have other regions, because of the disappearance of the fish stock or because of negative conditions in international grain markets affecting the west, the Maritimes or northern Ontario for a variety of reasons, the role of fiscal policy, because it has government spending, because it can be targeted directly, is to try and balance out the inequities between regions and sectors.

What has happened is that we have lost fiscal policy as a discretionary tool in this country because of the deficit. Effectively, we have no room to move in terms of the deficit. We are spending approximately $40 billion a year on debt service by the federal government. The old story: 35% of every tax dollar you send to Ottawa is going to debt service payments. We cannot increase the deficit in a discretionary way because of the effect it might have in terms of the confidence that foreign investors have, in terms of economic policies here. Effectively, we have lost the ability to have a discretionary fiscal policy and we have to face up to that. That is the mismatch between monetary and fiscal policy that we have in our country.

Mr Sutherland: If I may just pick up on that, if we do not have the discretion fiscally—there seems to be this very tight monetary policy—in your opinion does it seem then that there exists more flexibility in the monetary policy than has been demonstrated? You said you want to keep inflation under control and you want to slow down the economy. Somewhere there is that balancing between doing that and putting the economy into a total recession, is there not? I guess what I want to know is, at the end of it all, if you go too far one way and put the economy in a recession, is that worse than maybe letting the inflation rate run a little at 4% or 5% or whatever?

Mr Thomson: We are running an inflation rate of 4% to 5%. We are talking about having an extraordinarily tight monetary policy. The monetary policy's job is to try and contain and hopefully reduce the rate of inflation. We went through that in the early 1980s, and I hope we never get back to that kind of experience again. But on the evidence, we have not seen a monetary policy that has been overzealous in terms of reducing our inflation rate; anything but. What we are seeing is the Bank of Canada, which has as its role a responsibility to maintain a low and stable inflation environment within our country—because through other actions we have effectively reduced or made impotent fiscal policy, does that mean we have to also throw away monetary policy? Does that mean because we have rendered fiscal policy impotent, we say, "Okay, let's let the inflation rate go"? The inflation rate, if it rises, becomes a self-perpetuating movement. Clearly, if we learned anything in the latter part of the 1970s and the early 1980s, it is that higher rates of inflation lead to bad economic performance because of the speculation that takes place and also, frankly, because of the enormous swings it has in terms of wealth and income within our society which are unearned and basically arbitrary.

Mr Sutherland: If I may, I am just going on. My little knowledge of economics indicates, though, that the inflation rate during the last period, the late 1970s and so on, was substantially higher than the inflation rate of 5% to 6%.

Mr Thomson: Yes, it was.

Mr Sutherland: We were even talking double-digit inflation. I know the theory is you want to keep a control on it and not let it go, but it seems to me there is a little more flexibility this time around than last time. That is from my basic knowledge. Do you agree with that or not, or are there other factors?

Mr Thomson: To be honest with you, I would not. Maybe I am getting too old, but when I was growing up they used to call stagflation 3% inflation. Why were we having inflation of that magnitude? Now we seem to be saying 5% or 6% is okay. As I said, with 5% or 6% you still, over time, have enormous effects in terms of the level of prices and the value of money. For older people, it has a very negative impact. Also, of course, you get into a race in terms of your society as to trying to keep ahead. It also leads to a misallocation of resources such as we saw in terms of the housing market in southern Ontario, where effectively you had overinvestment in the housing market because of the sharp rise in prices, which also of course led to massive changes in terms of the pattern of interprovincial migration, which frankly was a misallocation of resources taking place. Because of that kind of inflationary environment, it led to a less efficient economy.

What I think we ought to do is say, "Look, why don't we move"—I am not wedded to zero—"to somewhere where inflation doesn't become a factor any more?" We do not worry about it, whether that is 2% or 3% or 4% or 5% but certainly I do not think it is more than 5%.

As I say, just because we have rendered fiscal policy impotent, let's not throw out monetary policy just to make it a clean sweep.

Mr Sutherland: I am sorry, could I just get the other question about the provincial debt?

The Chair: We are 20 minutes over already.

Mr Sutherland: Fair enough then.

The Chair: One last question from Mrs Sullivan.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to just move back a bit and perhaps take you out of the hat that you normally wear, Mr Thomson, and look at some of the things you have talked about in your presentation, one being structural change that has occurred, partly because of adjustment and partly because of this particular recession. As we look ahead to demographic change, which may well change our requirements in housing starts, and as well over the past couple of years an extremely high level of business investment in capital which may not move on as quickly or at the same levels as they have had in the past, if you were a government and had adequate moneys to do so, where would you put stimulus? What sector would you pump money into? Or would you use money in a different way, perhaps in human resources policies?

Mr Thomson: First of all, let me stress that I am a simple economist, not a politician or one who is responsible. I want to keep this to economics, not my own personal judgements about what things should be done, but one of the things I think we should be doing is not thinking about "Gee, where do we spend the money?" That is the industrial policy view. While I recognize that within my profession there are various views as to whether an industrial policy is an appropriate course for a government and a society to follow, my judgement is that probably not.

I think we are going through enormous change within our economy in Canada, not just this year but likely over the decade. I think we are going to see profound changes in terms of the economic environment. I do not think that government, using the application of all the wisdom that it has both from the civil service and from the elected representatives—I just do not believe that you are going to be able to make the best choices. I think that where you get the best choices is you create the environment where the market makes those decisions, for several reasons, not because the market is smarter.

We are talking about individuals who are making decisions. They are making mistakes and they are making good decisions and sometimes they are lucky. But what happens in the marketplace is you make those decisions, and if you are wrong, you back up. Okay? Also, you are not making one decision, you have got five people in competition making five different decisions, and one or two or ee or hopefully all five will be successful. Then people n see what is happening with respect to that and follow it ough copying or diffusion, as the term is in economics.

Therefore, I think the market provides more of a trial-d-error and smaller-scale approach in terms of deciding the right course for your economy than government policy, because with all due respect, government policy nds to be focused on particular sectors, the more money e better sometimes, and once you have made a mistake, is tough to back out. I think the market provides a better vironment for doing that.

As I say, the private sector has got all those faults too. ou have big companies that do grandiose things. It is the rong thing to do and they recognize it too late and they e slow to back out. That happens, but what you do with e private sector is you have multiple sources of moving ead, and it is the market that will decide. So I think that e way in which it should work.

With respect to what do you do, as I say, I think you eate the environment whereby the private sector will ork. That is not a right-wing agenda. It is just saying, ook, there's no question about what proportion of re-ources government takes versus the private sector." If you ave a private sector, regardless of what resources are allo-ated to it in terms of your society, let it work. Therefore, hat you do is you try to create the environment that akes that private sector work.

What you do is, one, you have a low rate of inflation, nd two, you have a fiscal policy that is structurally bal-anced. That does not mean you have a surplus or zero very year, but over the economic cycle, you have a truly ructurally balanced fiscal position where you have a defi-icit that is zero. What you do is you create the environment at allows the private sector to work, which can be faci-ilitating change.

One of the ways of doing that is to try to encourage a et of policies that reduce the interest rate to levels that are onsistent, with a real rate of interest that is consistent with at of other countries, in particular the United States. hat you do is you provide facilities for helping the lab-ur force change in terms of the changing economic envi-onment we are facing. I am sure that there are many other policies that we could do in terms of that way, but that ould be the answer I would give to your question. I hope was not too strong.

Mrs Sullivan: No, I think it has been very useful to is. Thank you.

The Chair: I would like to thank you again for re-ponding to our invitation to come and speak to us today. I hink you opened up a huge can of worms at the end there hat some of us would have liked to have grappled with, ut our time is running out and I am sure that our next resenters will pursue some of these ideas. Thank you very uch for coming. I enjoyed your slide presentation and our graphs.

Mr Thomson: I forgot to mention that there is a hand-out which has much of what I have talked about and more. Thank you very much. It was a pleasure.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Fed-eration of Labour, president Gord Wilson and consultant John O'Grady. They have also responded very graciously to our invitation to speak to us today, and we thank them for that. Now I assume we are going to hear a different point of view.

Mr Wilson: A slightly different point of view perhaps from the previous presenter. I cannot resist the pun that I noticed during his presentation most of you were kept in the dark.

Interjection.

Mr Wilson: We cannot match that. We are a frugal organization with limited resources, so we cannot resort to high-tech processes. At your invitation, Mr Chairman, I cannot help but make comment on at least one aspect of the Royal Bank's presentation with regard to the exhorta-tion of marketplace policies. We should perhaps keep in mind that they have served us so well that we are in the position that we are in today in 1991, and by that I mean unfettered marketplace policy.

I want to congratulate the committee for its sensitivity in inviting obviously such diverse groups as the Royal Bank and the Ontario Federation of Labour. I do not know who the careful planner was who put us back to back today, but it might be useful to the committee to see the two opposite perspectives.

I want to thank you all for the opportunity to appear on behalf of the federation and to introduce on my right Ken Signoretti who is the executive vice-president of the feder-ation, who is appearing with me today. In our presentation, and I believe you now all have copies, I would like to focus not on the broader scope of economics but perhaps on how workers are to be dealt with within the Ontario economy with regard to what I would argue is currently a restructuring that is taking place, as opposed to the com-ments perhaps of the previous presentation.

Wage protection: The Ontario Federation of Labour is aware that the Ministry of Labour currently is undertaking on behalf of the government a consultation on wage pro-tection. As members of this committee are aware, that ministry circulated a consultation paper at the end of De-cember. We take this opportunity to address the wage pro-tection question for two reasons. First, a wage protection scheme will inevitably entail a provincially underwritten guarantee of benefits, and second, in all likelihood a dedi-cated tax measure will be required to fund any sensible scheme that goes beyond providing token protection.

Both of these steps involve fiscal policy. The Ontario Federation of Labour hopes that the government will use the occasion of its 1991-92 budget to spell out in particular the details of its dedicated tax measure.

The consultation paper released by the government at the end of December was frankly disappointing. We hope that it does not signal the manner in which the government intends to handle the wage protection question. As mem-bers of this committee will recall, wage protection was one of the first policy issues on which the government announced its intention to move quickly and with serious intent.

The philosophical position of the Ontario Federation of Labour is quite simple: When benefits and entitlements are conferred on workers by statute, then the access to those benefits and entitlements must be certain and assured. The reality, of course, is quite different. In a sizeable proportion of small employer insolvencies, workers do not receive the full extent of their legislated entitlements to back wages, vacation pay, termination notice and severance pay. Among insolvent employers with fewer than 50 employees, some estimates suggest that 40% may fail to fulfil their legislated obligations to their employees.

The relevant policy question is not which legislated benefits should be ensured by the provincial government; rather, the relevant policy question is how does government ensure that all benefits and entitlements that are intended to be universal will in fact be received by the workers. Surely it would be difficult to improve termination and severance benefits as measures to deal with recession and economic restructuring when a large proportion of workers do not even receive their current statutory entitlements.

There are four, and we would suggest only four, ways to guarantee a statutory entitlement: First, pre-funding of benefits through a regulated trust fund, as in the manner of pension plans, usually backed up by a provincially underwritten guarantee fund; second, mandatory private insurance; third, social insurance in which a guarantee fund is financed through a dedicated tax measure or premium, such as UI or CPP; and fourth, a guarantee fund replenished by transfers from the province's consolidated revenue fund without any explicit dedicated tax measure.

The net claims on any guarantee fund can be reduced by two supplementary measures. The first is by according statutory wage and benefit claims a precedence over other unsatisfied creditors. The second is by increasing the personal liability of directors and officers of corporations.

The government's own estimates of the cost of guaranteeing all legislated entitlements, for example, back wages, vacation pay, termination and severance pay, is just under one tenth of 1% of payroll, and this is hardly an onerous burden.

Mr Kwinter: Do you know what the real number would be?

Mr Wilson: The total number? I would have to go back to the office and check my notes, but $150, $170.

We urge this committee to recommend to the Treasurer: First, that the government adopt a principle that when benefits and entitlements are conferred on workers by statute, then the access to those benefits and entitlements must be certain and assured; second, that the government adopt a social insurance solution to the problem of wage protection, relying on supplementary measures related to precedence of claim and/or director's liability to reduce net claims on the guaranteed fund.

Let me just speak to that second point for a moment. It is our view, strangely enough upon advice from the banking community, that what would likely happen with regard to directors is they would simply secure more private insurance to cover their liability.

Countercyclical measures: Prior to prorogation the government announced the details of the government throne speech commitment to inject new demand into the economy through public works spending. The Ontario Federation of Labour applauds this action. We agree with the government that spending on the construction sector is probably the most effective type of countercyclical spending.

Since the government announced its countercyclical fiscal measures three developments have occurred:

First, it is now clear that the recessionary momentum is greater than expected, even in the fall of last year. This is especially evident in the decline in retail sales in December.

Second, responding to this more recent sharp downturn in the economy, the province of Quebec has adopted significant countercyclical measures. The Quebec government estimates that its measures will have the net effect of injecting final demand equal to 1% of gross provincial product. The measures announced by Quebec are substantially greater than those announced by Ontario.

Third, the outbreak of hostilities in the Gulf has added a new element of uncertainty that will probably cause both families and businesses to defer major spending commitments. That is greatly speculative, I admit.

On the positive side, one notes a modest easing of tight interest rates, although the Bank of Canada apparently continues to pursue its high dollar policy.

The OFL urges this committee to recommend to the Treasurer that he reassess the countercyclical measures already announced with a view to increasing the scale of provincially supported spending on social housing and public works. The scale of Ontario's countercyclical measures should be approximately commensurate with those adopted by the government of Quebec.

Measures to deal with the structural side of the recession: The recession which is currently under way in Ontario has a much more significant structural component than did the previous recession in 1981-82. The Minister of Labour's data on plant closures give some indication of the structural dimension to the recession.

With regard to permanent layoffs affecting 50 or more employees, I draw your attention to the chart before you in particular 1982.

If you look at it, there were layoffs of just under 10,000 due to plant closures. Layoffs due to all causes were 46,047. The trigger figure is the column on the right: plant closure layoffs as a percentage of all layoffs, 21.5%. In 1990 that number is now 48.3%. I would rather use 1990 than either 1987, 1988 or 1989, because of the number of workers involved.

What I am saying is that we are clearly seeing a pattern evolve where a much higher percentage of the workforce is now being laid off and out of work as a result of closures which are in effect structural changes in the economy. Those jobs will not be there for people to go back to if and when the economy picks up or, more correctly, when the economy recycles itself and does pick up.

The above table tells us that in terms of the province's permanent layoff indicator, the current recession is already as severe as the 1982 recession, which incidentally is the worst recession since the 1930 Depression. More important, the layoff indicator tells us that a much higher proportion of job loss is attributable to permanent and complete plant closures.

The Ontario recession clearly has a much greater structural component to it than was the case in 1981-82. In that regard, the Ontario recession will be similar to the structural recession experienced by many states in the northeast and midwest of the United States in the period 1979 through 1983. This was the period in which the term "rust-belt" entered popular economic discourse.

The demand management types of measures that are available to deal with a cyclical recession are far less effective when confronting a structural recession. In a structural recession, workers are not called back to their former jobs. The signature of a structural recession is a growing pool of long-term unemployed workers, many of whom are older workers whose seniority could not protect them against layoffs caused by plant closures. Seniority, of course, has a currency when involved in a closure. A structural recession requires a major labour adjustment strategy. Just now ill equipped Canada and Ontario are to deal with a structural recession is evidenced by a study published by Statistics Canada. The study examined the labour market experience of roughly one million workers who were permanently laid off during the period 1981-84.

The highlights of that study are as follows: the largest single cause of permanent job loss was plant closure or relocation—36% of the total; 13% of these laid-off workers permanently exited the labour force; 15% of these workers were able to find only part-time employment; of the 72% of these workers who found full-time re-employment, one fifth were laid off again by 1986; 45% of workers obtaining re-employment suffered a wage loss, and this loss averaged approximately 28%; only 17% of workers took retraining, and of these only 5% identified that training as government-sponsored.

The source was Job Loss and Labour Market Adjustment in the Canadian Economy by Picot and Wannell. These data are an indictment of labour market adjustment in Canada. Moreover, structural pressures on the labour market are going to be greater in 1991, given the higher incidence of closures.

The OFL believes that the government must spell out a strategy to deal with the structural side of the current recession. The experience of the Canadian Steel Trades Employment Congress stands in marked contrast to the pattern revealed by the Statistics Canada study. CSTECH is an example of active labour market policies. It points to the scope for breaking out of the Canadian pattern: 62% of laid-off steel industry workers take retraining; labour force exit involves roughly 20% of the laid-off workers, and of those who remain in the labour force, 95% obtained re-employment; the wage loss of those who are re-employed following training averages 5% to 10%. Prior to the implementation of CSTECH programs, real wage loss averaged over 30% consistently with the general pattern revealed by Statistics Canada.

If one were to assume that approximately half of the unemployment caused by the present recession is structural, that the six-month retraining experience of CSTECH is a useful benchmark and that Canada Employment and Immigration Commission will co-operate with a program that gives greater emphasis to retraining—as they have done, incidentally, with CSTECH in waiving the rules—then the likely costs of active labour market programs would be in the order of 1.5% of the payroll base. This admittedly back-of-the-envelope estimate is broadly consistent, however, with the experience of northern Europe.

We would urge this committee to recommend to the Treasurer that Ontario move towards the implementation of active labour market adjustment programs. This will entail Ontario assuming an economic role in a field in which it has hitherto deferred to the federal government. The Ontario commitment to active labour market policies should be implemented in stages, but it should be anticipated that the fully articulated adjustment programs will entail costs equal to 1.5% of the payroll base. Estimating costs in this manner does not imply that payroll taxes should be the principal fiscal instrument to finance these programs.

The OFL also believes that addressing the restructuring problem in this province will require active capital market strategies. In particular, we believe this province can ill afford to export its pension capital. It is surely a bizarre irony that the pension fund savings of workers are invested abroad by pension managers to the detriment of the economic security and future of the very workers who created these pools of savings. The only restriction on the export of pension capital is the Revenue Canada regulations that limit the proportion of a pension plan that can be invested abroad. This limit was set at 10% but is rising under the current federal government in stages to 20%.

Ontario has a residual right under the Pension Benefits Act to regulate the investment policies of pension funds. In our view, the Ontario government should exercise this residual authority. Additionally, the government should establish specialized investment vehicles for facilitating the diversified investment of pension funds into industrial restructuring.

Finally, the Ontario government should recognize the direct link between investment priorities and the control of pension funds. Indeed, to the extent that the government strengthens the voice of unions and employees in the management of their pension system, it will reduce the regulatory burden on the Pension Commission of Ontario to actively monitor investment policies.

The OFL urges this committee to recommend to the Treasurer that the 1991-92 budget announce the government's intention to more actively regulate the investment policies of pension funds and, in particular, to limit their ability to invest outside of Canada. It would also be appropriate for the government to use the budget speech to signal its intention to reform the governance of the employer-based pension system.

4. Measures to reduce future vulnerability to recession: The OFL recognizes that measures to deal with the immediate recession must be the top priority for the 1991-92 budget. However, it is also important for the government to direct its attention to reducing the vulnerability of the Ontario economy to recession. We are cognizant of the limitations on both a relatively small economy and a provincial government. Nevertheless, there are two areas in which we believe the government should initiate policy development.

The first policy area which the government should be examining is the propensity for economic expansion to be based on credit. The increased reliance on credit by both families and businesses is one of the important distinguishing characteristics of the 1980s economic expansion. It is probably related to financial deregulation. Excessive reliance on credit introduces a significant fragility to economic growth. When businesses or families experience an erosion of their confidence, they respond by extinguishing some of their debt. This increases the recessionary momentum. The most important segment of the financial sector is obviously the banking system. Banking, of course, is in federal jurisdiction. Nevertheless, the province does have some leverage over the financial system through its regulation of the trust and credit union segments of the financial system. The OFL believes that the policy of wholesale deregulation of the financial sector has been of dubious economic value. We believe the government should reappraise the policy of deregulation which it inherited. We also believe the proposed Fair Tax Commission should be asked to examine the economic impact of the incentives to reliance on credit by businesses.

The second area of policy development which the OFL urges the government to pursue is the adoption of reserve funds paralleling the Swedish model. The Swedish reserve funds allow companies to set aside in tax-sheltered funds a certain proportion of their profits. These funds can then be drawn down without incurring a tax liability if they are used for an approved countercyclical purpose related either to investment or to labour force development. The reserve funds introduce into the Swedish economy an important countercyclical device. Given the fiscal restraints on governments, it may be desirable to facilitate the emergence of other countercyclical instruments such as reserve funds. Such reserve funds could be especially useful in resource-based regions of the province where the economic cycle is typically more severe.

In closing, the federation appreciates the opportunity which it has been afforded to present its recommendations to this committee for the 1991-92 budget, and we stand prepared to respond to any questions that may be asked by members of the committee.

Mr Kwinter: I have a couple of questions. I want to address one of your recommendations; "The scale of Ontario's countercyclical measures should be approximately commensurate with those adopted by the government of Quebec."

If we were to use 1% of the gross provincial product, that would be approximately $2.5 billion. The government had announced that as a measure to deal with the recession, it was going to inject $700 million into the creation of jobs in the way of public utilities, roads and things of that kind. The feeling is that in this fiscal period, even though $700 million is dedicated they will use a very small fraction of that by the time the budget comes around. I think the estimate was—what?—$40 million, somewhere around there. What you are going to have is a $700-million commitment, of which very little—I am not faulting the government; it is just a matter of having the ability to put this thing into effect.

It would be exactly the same if you were to suddenly find you have a $2.5-billion fund that has to be implemented. My feeling is that by the time you got it organized, by the time you decided which projects you wanted to fund, you would be well into the recovery period and you would have taken an incredible amount of capital out of the system with very little impact on addressing the problem. Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Wilson: I cannot resist one. If they had a little more money, if they knew what they had when they opened the door to the shop—

Mr Phillips: Easy, easy.

Mr Wilson: Okay, I will be nice. It is a matter of public record, anyway.

I am using the wrong title, but the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities did a rather extensive study about three years ago in which it called for considerable expenditure across this country as required, in the neighbourhood of $5 billion to $7 billion, if I recall, to restore Canada's infrastructure: roads, sewers, bridges. A lot of that work has already been done. If you take a look at the city of Toronto, the sewer system in many parts of the city is well over 100 years old and, as engineers would advise you, is rapidly approaching the point where a decision will have to be made about what is going to be done about the infrastructure. So that money can be dedicated quickly, in the first instance.

The other aspect of their national study which I thought was intriguing was that it estimated that 68 cents of every dollar spent by government returns to government in some form of tax or other, so there is a pretty darn good investment. I believe we said in our comments that it should be introduced in stages. We recognize that you cannot wait an expenditure—as you have estimated, $2.5 billion in one month as laid out—happen within the next six or eight months. But I think it is a philosophical question in part that people have to address. In a period such as we find ourselves, the recession and the retraction of the economy, do we utilize what I would argue has been proven to be effective in the past, that is, a considerable amount of dollars dedicated to social spending, for the reasons we spoke about earlier, not only return to government but also through savings the government would have with regard to expenditures it does not have to make because people are unemployed and other matters such as that?

Mr Kwinter: I have one other question. There is another recommendation you make. It has to do with the whole issue of pension funds. I am sure I do not have to remind you that I used to be the minister responsible for sions. Your recommendation is that "the government use the budget speech to signal its intention to reform the governance of the employer-based pension system." The biggest problem, and it is still out there—it certainly is here with the OSSTF with regard to the teachers' pension fund—is responsibility. Certainly organized labour has taken the position that it would like to see some sharing of responsibility for the administration of the pension funds, but basically it wants someone other than itself to guarantee the solvency of it. That is certainly the big hangup with the teachers. I do not know what the position of the current government is, but the previous government said: "If you want it, you can have it, but don't count on us to guarantee it. If we have to guarantee it, then we want to control it. If you want to control it, then you guarantee it or take your chances."

This is exactly the same situation. You know we have had some very serious discussion as to who owns the surplus and all of that. The standard response you get from management is: "We manage it. If there is a surplus we have created it; if there is a deficit we have to make it up. If you want to manage it, then you have to share that same burden of responsibility."

That has been, in my opinion—certainly during the time I had responsibility for it—the major problem we had in coming to terms. I think most fairminded people would say: "Sure, you guys are putting in money, you should have some say. But as long as we have the responsibility, when we can't be manoeuvred into the position where you're making decisions that may impact on us negatively, because you don't have the responsibility of picking up any of the shortfall and we do." Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Wilson: First, I have a question I would like to ask, because I am not familiar, as you would be as the Minister, about the particulars of the teachers' pension fund. Does it meet the full solvency and funding requirements?

Mr Kwinter: Yes. What had happened is that, I think it was in 1975, the then government in a sop—that is the word I can use—during an election agreed to fully index the pension fund. What they did not do was provide the commensurate financing to do it. As a result, since 1975 there was an unfunded liability that actuaries had a look at and said, "There is a staggering unfunded liability." Barbara, you may know the amount.

Mrs Sullivan: It is $25 million.

Mr Kwinter: No, no, it is way up around $800 million to $900 million. By the year 2010, I think it was, the actuaries felt that unless something was done to put that on a sound actuarial basis, they were going to run out of money. In the year 2010 the teachers would not have any money in their fund to take care of the obligations of those retirees. The actuaries said it required a 2% increase in contributions.

The Treasurer said: "We can make a decision. We can either let it go and let whoever is around in the year 2010 deal with it, or we can put it on a proper basis." The proposal made to the teachers—I am not trying to be political; this is what happened, and they have a different interpretation, of course—was: "We, as the government of the day, will pick up all of the unfunded liability. We will put in an additional 1%, you put in an additional 1%"—which would not be used for the accumulated unfunded liability but to make it solvent—"and on that basis we will guarantee the solvency of that fund."

The teachers' position was: "If we have to put in more money, then we have to get something for it, because right now we have a plan that's fully indexed. You guys have the commitment and you're going to have to fund it. If you want us to put more money in, then we have to get something for it." One of the things they wanted is to be able to control. They wanted to be able to say, "It's our money and we don't think it has been administered properly and we want to control it."

The Treasurer of the day said: "Fine. If you want to control it, then you have to take responsibility for it. We can't let you control it with us guaranteeing it."

That is the same thing that happens in most of these, whether it is organized labour or unorganized labour—

Mr Wilson: No unorganized labour.

Mr Kwinter: Whatever. If anyone who has a pension plan says, "We want to be able to take some control of the pension funds," the immediate response, whether it be government or management, is, "If you want to share the responsibility of administering it, then you must also share the responsibility of any negative impacts of those decisions." Usually, the response is: "No, that isn't what we want. You take the responsibility. If there are any deficits, you pick them up. But because it's our money, and we look upon this as deferred wages"—you know that whole argument. I am just curious to know what your response is.

Mr Wilson: Let me comment first from a teacher's perspective. I admit that I am not a teacher and really have no right, but you asked me the question and I will try to respond to it. Were I a teacher, I would interpret the events with regard to future liability that the person who made the promise, the government, was now saying I had to pay for it. It was not the teachers who agreed in 1975; it was the government of Ontario, the way you related the situation, who said, "We're now going to provide indexing." That does not mean indexing just from the point 1980 backwards or 1990 backwards or 1995 backwards. That means funding, which includes with it obviously full funding not only in future credits but also for unfunded liability for past service. So I would respond, I would think, much in the same fashion as the teachers, saying, "It's your promise and now you want me to help you pay for your promise." That is from a teacher's perspective.

Second, I remember the arguments generated by employers around the very lengthy hearings held with respect to the Friedland commission, where this issue was front and foremost. I believe the most constant argument advanced by employers relative to surplus ownership was risk. It was argued, as you have said, that, "We take the risk and therefore if there's a downside we have to pay for it."

But when you looked at the numbers were worked up around the Friedland commission research, it was either from the period 1940 forward or from the period 1945 forward, to that year—and that is three years ago—there was only one year in which pension funds found themselves in a deficit position, and it was only minor. The reality was that pension fund surpluses were a transfer of assets away from those who had already retired and lost purchasing power, as surpluses were simply a reflection of inflation rates which were also reflected in interest rates. What you had was current retirees on fixed incomes or non-indexed pensions seeing an erosion of their benefit level and a direct transfer of that to the income of the fund, which employers then said became theirs because it was now a surplus, it was over the actuarial projections.

I want to tell you we argued with that. We did not think that was fair or kosher and still do not. With regard to the governance of pension funds, what I am trying to signal in our proposal today, Kenny and I, is that we see a possible avenue of alternative capital to allow this province to be utilized, with the proper safeguards, as investment capital in some form or other, which would generate upward movement in the economy and strengthen it and at the same time give you this countervailing pool that would allow you to deal with those who come from other shores to Canada and say, "We will invest in Ontario and this is what we want." You would be in a position to say: "We welcome you to Ontario. These are what our rules are. If you don't like it, I'm sorry, we can't cut a deal, goodbye. We'll use this over here."

Pension capital generated along with community investment funds—I would argue before this committee that if you were to say to people in northern Ontario and many places where there are single-, two- or three-industry towns, that were they given the ability and the encouragement to develop community investment funds or RRSPs, for example, rather than putting it in a bank instrument they would put it in a mutual fund dedicated to that community, not much different from the greater Vancouver experiment, and say that those funds could be utilized for investment in their community, my guess is that they would opt for that.

I would guess that workers would feel more secure that their funds were being used to generate economic activity within Ontario and within this country than they do by finding out that their funds and pension funds have been utilized in east Asia to provide facilities that are going to erode their job security in this province. That is what that suggestion is all about.

But we cannot get to that because it is not yet recognized in the law that plan participants, organized workers, middle management people and others have equal governance over the funds as the plan's sponsors.

This is my final point. I can tell you that during the whole Friedland debate, and this is the God's truth, I had numerous calls—I did not keep a record of how many, but obviously quite a few—from people who were middle management people in manufacturing and retail, in the service sector and the banking sector, who belonged to pension plans and were saying to me, "I can't say anything publicly about this, but you guys can and keep it up, cause we're with you."

Mr Kwinter: Another problem is that Ontario 37% of the workforce in Canada. We have 70% of private pension plans. Private pension plans are not mandatory, they are voluntary.

Mr Wilson: About one third of the workforce pension plans.

Mr Kwinter: But as I say, of the pension plans there are there, 70% of all the private pension plans in Canada are in Ontario. In order to make this really work you would have to make pension plans mandatory, because otherwise you have some people being able to benefit and other people not and you are penalizing the good guys opposed to the bad guys. The point I am making is that the more onerous you make the governance of a pension plan when it is not mandatory and is voluntary—instead of having a defined benefit plan, they say: "Who needs this? Who needs all this sort of hassle of having to sit down and do all this? We're going to go to a purchase money plan."

Mr Wilson: They did the same thing with income tax when they started—we found ways to deal with them.

Mr Kwinter: That is the final thing. How do you deal with it?

Mr Wilson: You find ways to deal with it in the same way you do on the Income Tax Act. You can introduce regulation, or if necessary legislation to deal with the kinds of situations. I do not think that anybody creates a pension plan as a plan sponsor without giving some consideration to how their offer or their situation fits with the competitive mold, when they are competing for services with people who work in their enterprise.

Pension plans in the organized worker sector have somewhat different bent to them, but relatively they are the same thing. They are negotiated and we have always looked upon them as a deferred wage. They are counted as part of the package when they are negotiated. The employer gets credit for that in the package calculation in terms of its argument in trying to be competitive within the industry. I do not see any conflict there; I really do not.

Mr Kwinter: The conflict I see is that when you have a defined benefit plan, it is a promise. It is a promise to the worker that when he retires he is going to get X. When there is a defined payment plan, all that says is: "You put in X dollars. We'll put in X dollars. It will be administered and if there is money at the end, good luck to you, and if there isn't, that's too bad."

Mr Wilson: Let me give you as an example one of the larger crown corporations, Ontario Hydro, which sits down with surpluses that have been generated and dedicates an amount of that as an increase in inflation recognition factor for those people who are currently on retirement. They also use part of that surplus to generate a higher level of benefit for those people who are currently in active service. Then they also hold a portion of that back in reserve.

That pension plan has not gone broke. I would suggest to you that both the union and the employer in that situation ow fully what they are doing. All I am suggesting to you another avenue of the assets of Ontario Hydro's pension n. I have not got it with me. I can certainly find out ere they are invested, but it would seem to me that we ould want to take advantage of giving people the oppor- nity to be able to invest those funds, and they are vast in s province, in Ontario and in Canada, as opposed to ipping them off to southeast Asia.

The problem we have is that the money managers, the nsion fund managers, have a fiduciary responsibility ich says they are required to bring the highest return ssible within group investments. So now when we have owed the federal ceiling to increase on a threshold up to %, that gives them more opportunity to play the dollar arkets out there, but all of that has a negative effect in al in the end upon us. We have the cases of examples, o that I am aware of, where workers' pension funds in ntario have been invested offshore to build a duplicate ility which closed the one in Ontario. That is absolutely, th great respect, asinine.

The Chair: Before moving on, I would like to indi- te that having been involved in the pension debate with e teachers, it is a little more complex than what we ard. There are some very serious disagreements between e federation and the government. I am not going to get to it, but actuarial projections differed from the federa- on and from the government and created a huge differ- ce in terms of what money would be allocated.

Mrs Sullivan: I am not going to make a political tement before I go into my question. I have been inter- ted for a long time actually, Gord, in the kinds of propos- s that I read about first in the newspaper the other day. I ink you had a news conference or something on your ension proposals. If we look back at the history of Que- ec, we see what kinds of very interesting changes they ade in their economy through the pooling of capital ough the caisses populaires. In fact, I do not find your oposals coming from any political spectrum, if you like.

In my view, Michael Wilson has already recognized e potential of using the investment pool of, for instance, OMERS, in which we must invest every day $2 million to the markets. Wilson has introduced a program through hich capital pools such as OMERS or other pension lans can place their funding through venture capitalists nto private sector operations, and they do. They have been ery effective in moving emerging companies into being rviving and growing companies.

Mr Wilson: Barbara, if I can, the current private sec- or pension plans had no restrictions.

Mrs Sullivan: No, I know. One of the things I am ayng is that I am interested in seeing additional dialogue n this area at the provincial level, seeing where and if the federal program, which has proven to be successful for merging companies, can be balanced or whatever. I do ot think that in this next budget—who knows what the easury will come up with? I just do not see this becom- g something that can be a major part of this budget, ecause it seems to me that there has to be a lot more iew of this situation.

One of the areas that has concerned me about the pro- posal, both in terms of what you said today and in the news conference that was reported last week, is where the return on investment would come from for the pension plan, and there must be a return on investment, if the investment was in labour adjustment programs. If that capital was being moved into labour adjustment programs, where does the ROI come from for the pension plan, and if there is no ROI then what would the position of the Ontario government be in terms of providing a guarantee of funds going back into the plan or in terms of working and directing those labour adjustment programs?

Mr Wilson: I think there are two things crossing over here. I do not think we suggested nor did we talk today about pension fund investment in labour market programs in the sense of labour adjustment. What we talked about was economic labour market policies on the one hand, which also can be complemented, for example, although I did not say it specifically, with community development funds. That is where some moneys could be spent. You have to change the rules. The rules have changed out there, so we have to be concurrent with that, be able to get some of our objectives in Ontario and, strengthening our economy, be able to change some of the old rules under which we operated.

One of them is the fiduciary responsibility, as an example, where you might say to pension fund managers in this province—not only the question of restriction of overseas investment—"We may relieve you 4%, 5%, 10%, 12% or 15%"—I do not know what the number is; we would have to sort that out—"of those funds in that pension fund," which could be invested in some form of social investment; for example, affordable housing.

It may not kick an immediate rate of return that would be equal to the highest private market rate of return, but you are only dealing with a small percentage of the funds. Even if you took that amount, it has a considerable impact on an economy like ours, particularly if they were co-ventures where the municipality or the province is sitting on land and is prepared to get involved in processes like this. This is how you could really rev it up.

There would be guarantees for the pension fund, because the return on those mortgages, assumably, would be at least equal to one or two points under what the investor—I had better be careful. It would be less than what you could get in stocks and bonds in most cases, but not all cases. If you averaged it out over 20 years, you may be trailing three points on the private market, but only for a percentage of the funds. In return for that you are giving people access to a commodity that they might not otherwise have, including some people who are participants in that pension fund, so there is a balancing act there.

The other thing is that I think I make the argument of restructuring and I really do believe it, and for another reason other than the arguments around the trade agreement. If you look at what is taking place in the world today, the US is the largest debtor nation in the world. They are attempting to redress that debt. Part of that strategy is the trade agreement with Canada and part of it is their import and export arrangements with countries like Japan and Germany where they are going to start calling in chits and already have. They have a serious problem and have to address it. Number one for them is going to be them.

Being aware of that, I would suggest to you that the numbers we recount in our submission can be measured with some validity in that there is a restructuring going on, part of which is a response to the US's position in trying to address its own deficit. That is why you are seeing some multinational corporations, US-based, moving operations out of Canada. What allowed them to do it now is the trade agreement, which now lets them back in, where before they might not have under other trading arrangements that existed prior to the trade deal. You are familiar with all that argument anyway.

If that is true, then we have to start changing the approaches we have had traditionally in how we attract investment to this province. One of the ways you do it is to set up a countervailing pool of capital, not maybe sufficient yet, but the Caisse de dépôt is a classic example where they quite frankly have been able to do it, to generate sufficient capital, admittedly around a cultural recognition that we cannot take advantage of in the same way as Quebecers do. But maybe we can find that single force in Ontario that unites people around an identity with Ontario much in the same way the cultural identity has been in Quebec. If we created a Caisse de dépôt in Ontario with the same allegiance that the Caisse de dépôt has to Quebec, then you can say to multinationals: "You want into our markets?"—if you can deal with the trade agreement in another way—"Then this is what our deal is. If you don't like it, have fun."

Mrs Sullivan: Can I just ask if the OFL has looked at the federal program in terms of the pension fund investments. Basically what happens is that through the venture capitalists there are equity investments made that are singularly important in that it is not debt that is going into the company.

Mr Wilson: You have to be careful, and I recognize the point that with pension funds you are dealing with people's future livelihoods. That is why I argued you can dedicate funds to certain sectors in the economy which are safe and at the same time provide a social good for the entire economy. I really do not see venture capital in the way that term is normally applied being very attractive to pension funds if you are concerned about security, but there are, in some community development situations, funds that can be developed for that community where you can make a go in a venture capital sense of investment; for example, secondary industry around mining, where you can become quite competitive. You have the workforce there and you can generate the growth of communities rather than the decline.

You would deal in those kinds of activities, but you would have to be very careful about it. You cannot just say, "Here's a licence to go out and invest pension funds holus bolus." That is why I tried to say a more prudent course is to begin with a percentage of the fund being dedicated.

Mrs Sullivan: That is what the federal program does.

Mr Wilson: I cannot understand the federal government's reasons, then, for going the other way on foreign investing; I really cannot. If they are trying to do that, to encourage investment in Canada, why are they making it easier to invest more money—not easier, allowing pension fund managers to invest more money outside the country? They are in opposite directions.

Mrs Sullivan: They also make money through emerging companies, substantial money, because emerging companies have to pay higher prices than, say, the existing stable companies with traditional access to markets.

The Chair: Mr Phillips?

Mr Wilson: Wait a minute, Gerry. I make speech for nothing; I charge for questions.

Mr Phillips: How about answers? We have heard today from a couple of banks that are more optimistic than some of us felt coming in here. I have about five points, Gord. You could say you only get one question.

First, I would not mind the OFL's point of view when we may come out of the recession. Second, I think some of us felt that perhaps there were more jobs moving elsewhere, manufacturing jobs, than the banks seemed to think. I would like your thoughts on whether you have a handle on that and whether we should be concerned about it. The third thing is that two of your big recommendations, the wage protection fund and the labour adjustment are in round terms—I do not know—$200 million and the other is $1 billion. You mentioned payroll tax in both cases. Is it tied to the payroll tax? Is it a quid pro quo in your mind or is it, "We've got to do this," and one suggestion is to fund it through payroll?

Let me just finish off here. The fourth one: Your pension thoughts, I think, are extremely interesting. The philosophical argument that I get into down the road of pensions is that I think employees feel they could take their money now in salary or defer their salaries into pension. I think down the road, increasingly, individuals will see their pension as their money—no one else's, but their money. Therefore, your recommendation, which is to tell them that they must take a part of their money and put into a lower rated return, will it wash, I am saying, with employees down the road?

The last one: I did not see anywhere in here, in terms of the recession material or the economic outlook, recommendations, as we go through this restructuring, that would encourage and help employees to acquire firms. I thought that, just as the pension thing was here, we must have seen some recommendations from the OFL in terms of that being helpful.

Mr Wilson: First, we might comment on is the rate of return. Do not overexaggerate it, because what I said was that if you took a 20-year frame, given the rises and falls in the market, a stable investment in real estate is likely to yield substantially not much less. It is going to be minimal under the marketplace, I would argue, if you take a 20-year frame.

If you are talking about employee stock ownership plans, the answer would be no, we are not interested in it. You have equity in the company, you have investment in the company but you do not have any control over it. If you are talking about some of the experiments that have been engaged in in the United States and one or two in Canada, where effectively a group of employees bought, controlled and operated a fund, yes, there is some interest in some segments of the membership of my federation. There is not an interest in others. It becomes an ideological fighting point in many ways.

Mr Phillips: That is why it is not here, I guess.

Mr Wilson: You might say that we are not unlike governments, trying to find the best solution for everybody.

Mrs Sullivan: He was not elected on that platform.

Mr Phillips: The recession in the manufacturing—

Mr Wilson: It is interesting. The person shall go unnamed who used to be very close to the Prime Minister is now the chief executive officer of Campeau Corp. I checked numbers with him yesterday at a function I just happened to be at and he was at. Our projection together is that I do not see any upturn in the economy until probably the third and fourth quarter of 1992. And by the way, the prediction was a prime rate of about 10.25% by the end of the year, our bank rate, a prime rate.

The other was the significant difference between 1982-83 and our coming out of ours. The 1982-83 line was almost straight up. It was a quick recovery and it was a fast and strong recovery. This one will linger like a shallow up bowl. For a long period of time we will have a very low growth factor. Part of that is the restructuring application.

If you look at the analogy we made with the 1979-83 period in the United States, they went through a structural impact upon their economy while our recession in 1982 was a reaction to their restructuring. Ours was cyclical, therefore—for that and other reasons. But if you went down to the bottom of the pot, you would probably find that that was the most substantial reason. What is different now is that they have undergone their restructuring. The auto industry was carved by a third, the steel industry was cut in half. A great amount of their manufacturing base was severely restructured. We went through a cyclical turn. Now we see the exact opposite. We are undergoing the restructuring and they are in a cyclical downturn. They are addressing it through their policies to deal with their deficit and the recovery of their balance of payments deficit.

I see this recession in Ontario as not one that is going to be enjoyable for anybody, particularly the workers. Why did we specifically focus on the points that we focused on? Because the people who are the most severely hurt are those people at the lower end of the income scale or those people who have no control over the decisions that impact upon them, that is, either workers in unions or workers not in unions. The reality of it now is that unions exert very little control over those investment decisions by, particularly, multinational corporations as to whether or not they want to remain in Ontario and produce or whether they want to go somewhere else. So what we are seeking is, in the budget, some indication of moving to protections for those people.

Mr Phillips: One question I do not think you answered, at least directly is just that the presentation from the two banks today left me the impression that once we start out of the recession, which they think we will start out in midyear, and tramp on the accelerator the manufacturing jobs come back.

Mr Wilson: To where?

Mr Phillips: That is my point. I guess their point was that they come back to the plants that right now are still there and will just gear up. I am interested in your perspective.

Mr Wilson: Where are the jobs? We are not seeing any influx of—

Mr Phillips: I am asking the question.

Mr Wilson: You have also to remember, I think, in the context of whom you heard it from, that banks never go through a recession. They win on the wave up and they win in a trough too.

Mr Phillips: They just plain win.

Mr Wilson: That is right. I think that message was conveyed to them, if I recall, by the Premier about a week ago, with great joy and enthusiasm throughout the retail and manufacturing sector of employers, who said: "Yes, that's right. Why are we always taking the going?" not to mention workers on mortgages and the rest of it.

I do not see where the replacement of jobs will be. If we drift to a larger measure of part-time and service sector jobs, yes there will be jobs. If you are at a CEIC you count job for job, so it does not matter, to use the popular vernacular, whether you are flipping hamburgers in McDonald's or whether you are a highly paid industrial worker. It is a job in their stats. Where it shows up is how many small businesses go belly up because workers do not have decent jobs that pay good money that allow them to spend in the local economy and in the Ontario economy. Therefore, I do not see where all of these jobs are going to be replaced as value jobs. The bank may be looking at numbers which talk about part-time jobs, that talk about accumulation of part-time-full-time jobs in the retail sector or jobs in the service sector, all of which are paid considerably less than the jobs we are losing. What we are losing in this province, by and large, is the well-paid industrial job that has been the mainstay of many of our communities. They are not going to be replaced.

Mr Phillips: Just on the last, on the payroll tax, how tied are you, in your recommendations, to that being funded by payroll taxes?

Mr Wilson: You are talking about the wage protection fund?

Mr Phillips: Both of them.

Mr Wilson: You could do it by that or by a combination of the other measures we have proposed. Why we suggested the liability tax—I will be quick on it, okay?—is that we have had experiences, particularly in the garment industry, where company A, owned by Mr B, closes down and then two weeks later he opens company C down the street. It is essentially the same business. The workers are out of luck. Why? Because the company went insolvent. Insolvency means everything you have is an asset. It is already pledged and so there is nothing left for the workers to recover. But it does not prevent the owner and/or the directorship from moving down the street and opening up another operation. I said to you we did a little checking with some people we know in the banking industry. We asked how directors would react to that. They said they would simply increase their directors' liabilities through private insurance.

So there is any number of vehicles you could use. Then the insurance companies would have to bargain.

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, I just think if you are sure that they could, given the extra liability insurance that is now required and the pollution protection and so on—

The Chair: Come on. We are running a little late.

Mrs Sullivan: It is optimistic.

Mr Jamison: Are we finished? Okay. An interesting part of your submission, Mr Wilson: You allude to a structural recession requiring a major labour adjustment strategy. Further on in your submission you mentioned one particular scheme or plan that went forward during the steel recession, the CSTEAC.

My question really is whether or not you could explain further what that particular plan was about and, secondary to that, what we as a government can do to assure the development of skills that are required for the future. My opinion is that we cannot do it alone. It is going to take a partnership approach. I would be interested in hearing your point of view on that.

Mr Wilson: I guess the short and sweet of it is that Stelco and other steel companies understood that they were going to undergo a restructuring. The unions' reaction to that was, "We have two choices, we can either be in the dialogue or out of it, but it is going to happen anyway, so we are far better to be in it."

Admittedly, the CSTEAC experiment dealt with downsizing. What it did though was calculate that the people affected by the restructuring were going to have to be facilitated in such a fashion that they could be useful either in that sector or in some other capacity as workers who are home working for a living. So that is simply what they did. They approached it that way. They did not take the view that neither the company nor the union—that okay worker is going to be unemployed. "We are sorry you are unemployed and good luck." I mean, they felt some responsibility for what they were going to engage in, then began to put in place the mechanisms that allow people to be able to recover themselves. That was essentially the experiment of CSTEAC.

Now there is another one, EEMAC, or the forest products experiment out in British Columbia, the electrical industry of forest products, where it is more proactive in terms of talking about how people move within the industry or within the sector and keeping them active and fully employed. Of course, there is some difficulty with that now, not so much in the electrical industry now, certainly with the forest industry out west in that some of the federal government policies around the trade agreement are causing great discontent on both sides of the equation. I hope that answers it, but that is a simple part of the discussion.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick question because it is a guess there are two avenues of thought. We are in a recession, I think, no one can deny that any more. We have to admit that we are in recession and facing tough economic times, but one school of thought is to take the laissez-faire attitude of, "Do nothing; get your financial house in order; the private sector will eventually pull it out." The other school of thought is to direct government involvement as much as possible through capital expenditures. The gist I get from this document is that it is the position of the OFL that our government of Ontario should take a proactive approach to battling the recession through capital expenditure programs and, as well, conducting that battle planning for the future through progressive policies, which is what the four pieces of information that come from the document—

Mr Wilson: We would argue that the government should be an interventionist government when the market prices are unable to meet the needs of the people within the jurisdiction of this province.

Mr B. Ward: Take a proactive approach to the recession.

The Chair: I would like to thank you on behalf of the committee for coming and giving your views. We appreciate the input. This committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The committee adjourned at 1730.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 23 January 1991

The committee met at 1004 in room 228.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION

ONTARIO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We have a quorum, so we can begin. Before we begin with the Ontario Home Builders' Association, everybody should note that we have a new updated version of the agendas for the next two weeks.

Without any more ado I would like to welcome Al Libfeld from the Ontario Home Builders' Association. We have half an hour.

Mr Libfeld: I am the president of the Ontario Home Builders' Association. I am also the president of Tribute Corp., a large home builder in the Toronto area. Over the last eight years we have built over 4,000 homes.

Ontario Home Builders' Association is a province-wide organization of 4,000 members. We have 33 locals, locals being Toronto, Sudbury, Windsor, Ottawa, etc., and Kingston of course. We pretty well cover the province. We build over 80% of the new homes within the province. We also represent the renovation market within the province. I appreciate the opportunity to speak with you today. You have, I guess, our budget submission and we hope that you will read it through carefully.

As we all know, we are in some tough economic times. There is a recession going on, there is a war going on and there was a lot of uncertainty in the marketplace which caused a lot of construction not to be built last year and, we regretfully predict, this coming year as well. Interest rates were a concern; the matter of the GST was a concern; free trade was a concern, and the war is also a concern. All those first items are basically removed or being removed. Hopefully, the war will end soon and that will be removed as well and get the buyers back to work.

Last year, the starts in the province were 62,000, which was a 33% drop from the year before. Just to give you a bit more framework, in the very buoyant times of 1987 and 1988, we built over 100,000 units in the province. Last year and this year we lost a lot of jobs. We, as builders, laid off many of our workers, our subtrades laid off workers, the suppliers of course had to lay off workers, and it went further. It went into the manufacturers of appliances, of furniture, up and down the line, and a lot of these jobs were lost permanently and some of them temporarily.

We did a survey recently that predicted that, if the economy does not turn around in the next six months, 20% of the builders in the province who responded suggested that they will not make it through the next six months. So it is a tough economy and hopefully it will turn soon. We are optimistic that it will turn. We have not had good sales in the Toronto area now for two years and the rest of the province for about a year and a half.

So there is some pent-up demand. Immigration is coming in and we are optimistic that, with the end of the war and the remainder of the uncertainties going and interest rates dropping, it will turn around. But we want to work with this government to help things turn around. We do not want to be caught in the same problems that we had in the last boom-and-bust cycle. It is no good to jump around from 100,000 down to 60,000 and back to 100,000. There are problems with that, getting the men in the good times and laying them off, which is even a tougher situation, in the bad times.

We want to develop a partnership with this government. We want to work continuously. We are on call and we will answer any questions or come to speak to you. We want to educate as well, quickly. I want to emphasize "quickly." As builders, we are very impatient people. If the house is sold and the lot is ready, we will go throw up a home in three or four months. That is not thrown up; please excuse that. It is put together properly and livable, and we are very proud of the product we build in Ontario. But it does go up in three or four months because that is our psychology and housing is important around the province. So in all the items I put in front of you today and everything else, we want to emphasize quickly.

I would like to highlight some of the items to get us out of the recession and possibly stop the problems once we go a little further down the line and demand comes back.

The first group of items is regarding economics, and I am only picking several of the items due to the time frame that we have here this morning. The first one is we want to urge the present government to maintain a strong commitment to deficit control and, thereby, responsible, good fiscal management. We think that is quite important for now and for the future.

The second in regard to economics is we are very interested in promoting apprenticeship programs in construction for young people. Young people, for whatever reason, do not look to the trades until they are a little later on in years, especially women. There is an education gap, for whatever reason, and we want to push that so that they get into it earlier on and they realize in high school that there is a very viable career alternative, that the dollars that qualified tradesmen can make are significant, $30,000, $40,000, $50,000, $100,000, depending on the craft and the level of skill and how hard the person works. It is quite appealing, and we want to ask for an advisory council for the construction industry to identify the labour shortages so that the apprenticeship programs get put into place quickly.

We would like the government to further its commitment to infrastructure. We were very pleased to see the $700 million in the throne speech a couple of months ago.

The equation between infrastructure and development was made, and we were quite pleased to see that as well. But we want you to understand and the government to understand that infrastructure is the basis for everything getting done. You cannot build houses, you cannot build apartments, you cannot build schools, hospitals, anything without the infrastructure. It is the raw material. You need the roads and the sewers, and whatever further commitment the government can make towards that will solve a bunch of problems.

First of all, it will get people back to work. It is projected that the $700 million will create 14,000 jobs, but the spinoff after that will probably be even more significant because we can build the homes, we can build the apartments, we can build the social housing, all those things, and house the people and whatever else. We would like you to seriously consider increasing and continually looking at the infrastructure around the province, because it is becoming in short supply.

Right now, we have a lack of demand because of the uncertainties in the market. Down the road the lack of demand will turn. There are people now knocking at all our sales offices. They are not ready to buy yet but they will be in the near future, once they think their job is secure. They need the bigger home or they want to move out of the apartment, or whatever the situation. We also have big immigration numbers coming in over the next five years, so we have to plan for growth and deal with growth in the future.

The province previously announced the sewer and water corporation. It got a little bit of fanfare when it was announced about a year ago. We would urge you to dust it off, bring it forward again and basically push the agenda on it. We only got brief details on what it would do and what it would look like. I believe there is only one gentleman and one secretary running this water and sewer corporation as of now. It makes a lot of sense to deal with this cross-jurisdictionally, to put in water lines through many regions and whatever else, economies of scale. It makes a lot of sense and it helps deal with the infrastructure problems.

Our number one recommendation on housing is we want to urge the government to drop or rescind part III of the Development Charges Act. Part III, as you are probably all aware, is the part of the Development Charges Act that deals with education. We firmly believe, as the majority of you do as well, that education is everyone's concern, everyone's responsibility, and it should not be placed on the backs of new home purchasers. It hurts the affordability situation and it is just unfair for a new home purchaser to pay for something that his next-door neighbour, moving into an existing home, does not have to pay for.

We are committed to going to court. Again, this is not news to any of you, but we have committed ourselves to go to court because we do believe it is unfair, and we will be going to court on constitutional grounds, subject to your not pulling the plug on this faulty bit of legislation.

We made the argument when the bill was passed that you cannot count on the housing industry; it is boom and bust and we go through cycles. We are right in the middle of a bust. Eight thousand homes were sold in the greater Toronto area last year. The numbers are much too low. We put an appropriate figure to building the schools or helping to build the schools. We urge you to live up to your ideals in this situation and remove the Development Charges before we have to spend our good dollars in the courts. The government has to spend taxpayers' dollars in courts.

The next housing recommendation is we would like the land approvals process streamlined. It is cumbersome. We have been involved in several studies with the government over the last bunch of years. It takes a good 10 years for a piece of farm land to become a piece of productive land. We do not want to step on anyone's toes. We want the environmental things to be taken care of properly. We want everything else to be taken care of properly. But we want the time frames shrunk. Ten years is ridiculous for a municipality that wants to go forward on a piece of land not be able to. It just takes that amount of time to go through the process.

We have a parcel of land in Ajax now that has been designated. We want to build homes and social housing on it and we have another two years to go. The draft plan has not been approved yet, which is part of the problem, but the parcel has been designated that way for over three years now. It is five years to create something that will create jobs, create housing, all the good things that we all want and need.

What we are suggesting there is put together an umbrella policy to do it quickly. We are talking about 12 months. I can build a subdivision of 200 homes in 12 months. This government can go through the paper and decide what to do within that same time frame. We really think it is doable. We really think it is important for all our sakes so that the next time the demand comes back, as I said before, we will have the quantities of land so that the price escalations will not be there. People will not be paying huge dollars and it will smooth out the situation. We would like the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to be the quarterback of this. We think it is in their bailiwick and that they can do it. Again, it is extremely important.

Other recommendations for short-term measures to speed up the approvals process are:

We would like rationalization of the condominium and land titles registration process. It takes a year now to get a condo registered, and it takes 12 to 18 months to get a parcel of land through land titles.

We would like the establishment of the Seaton development as a model for fast-track approvals. Seaton is great, but we have got to get going on it. Seaton has been talked about for ever and no homes are getting built there. It is a shame to waste that parcel of land when we are going to need the housing units in the next little while.

We would like nomination of more members and greater resources to the Ontario Municipal Board. Things for whatever reason, get bogged down in the OMB, and we do not believe they have the capacity to deal with them expeditiously. It takes six months to a year to get to trial sometimes and sometimes it takes three to four months to t a transcript for the judgement typed afterwards, which much too long a time, and it slows down everything.

Our other recommendations are that we would like to ramp the non-profit housing. Basically, we want to get more involved in it. We want, possibly, to go out to tender; decide in this location we want 1,000 units and let all the builders, all the developers, everyone, go out and tender the project and forget the performance bonds. We all have parcels of land, but performance bonds are expensive and they are prohibitive to a lot of our smaller members around the province. We want to build these units.

We were very upset to see that the first piece of legislation regarding housing was the rent control legislation, because of the retroactive nature of it as well as that it reduces supply. We are concerned with supply more than anything else. That is why we are upset.

To summarize, we urge you to read the document that we placed in front of you. I believe at the beginning of our terms we mailed to you all a copy of Housing: Re-creating the Dream. It is very comprehensive and it outlines pretty well all our issues and all our beliefs, and it packages them very well. If you have not received that or you would like another copy, please give us a call and we could make as many as you need available.

We have the experience to build—as I suggested, I build—and our members make up engineers, architects, surveyors; we have municipal governments as members; we have lawyers, builders, contractors, suppliers, up and down the gamut, renovators and developers.

Next week we have the pleasure of meeting with the treasurer, and I thank you for the opportunity of meeting with you. The door is open. I would appreciate meeting individually, collectively, at any time or with any of our people. We have presidents around the province. If there are any questions, I would love to entertain them at this time.

Mr Stockwell: I note that you are suggesting there are going to be 55,000 new home starts in 1991. How many of those would be non-profit units?

Mr Libfeld: It was a tough one. We doubled that this week. We know the government is committed to the 30,000 units and we hope you are successful in it because we will become a part of building it, but we think that is overly optimistic. We know how to build and we are in January now and it is going to take a little longer to get going.

The gross number was 55,000, which included the social housing. We are only guesstimating that they will be successful in the 10,000-15,000 range, but it is a guess. We hope you build them all; we really do.

Mr Kwinter: The 55,000 does include the 20,000?

Mr Libfeld: Yes, it includes what we believe will be within the 20,000. We do not think you will make the 30,000.

Mr Kwinter: That is the point I am making. Does it include the 10,000 or 15,000, or does it include 20,000?

Mr Stockwell: That is the point I was making.

Mr Libfeld: It is 10,000 to 15,000.

Mr Stockwell: So it is 10,000 or 15 you are putting in. You are saying you are not going to do 5,000 or 10,000?

Mr Libfeld: Yes. I am not sure where it is going to drop.

Mr Stockwell: Then yourselves—let's call it 15,000, you think—from the private sector you are going to do 40,000?

Mr Libfeld: Correct.

Mr Stockwell: That is off from the 1990 numbers—I saw them in here—62,600?

Mr Libfeld: There was some social housing there, about 4,000 or 5,000, so 58,000 in comparison.

Mr Stockwell: You are expecting the social housing to double?

Mr Libfeld: At least double; hopefully, we will do more.

Mr Stockwell: I do not think so. Next one: lot levies. With respect to the sewer improvement, schools, etc, you have taken a hard line on lot levies.

Mr Libfeld: On the education portion.

Mr Stockwell: Only the education portion?

Mr Libfeld: The education portion is the one we are attacking.

Mr Stockwell: You have regional councils weaselling in on that money as well.

Mr Libfeld: We have alternatives. We are suggesting municipal bond financing. We are suggesting doing things more in advance instead of retroactive levies dealing with the situation after the fact. You know, you have the need, then you get the levy and then you build the school, but people are already living there. We are suggesting that all governments deal with things beforehand.

Mr Stockwell: So you build the school before you build the houses?

Mr Libfeld: No. You build it in conjunction with the houses. You raise the dollars beforehand with municipal bond financing, general revenues, previously with the province's dollars or a larger proportion of the province's dollars.

Mr Stockwell: You are not really fussed with municipalities floating bonds, then?

Mr Libfeld: That is what we are attempting to push.

Mr Stockwell: You think that is a proper and sound financing method when it comes to infrastructure?

Mr Libfeld: Yes; pay it off over a longer period of time.

Mr Stockwell: Much like debenturing?

Mr Libfeld: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Except the difference is that you would not have lot levies.

Mr Libfeld: No, we have no objections to lot levies for services.

Mr Stockwell: Like sewers and sidewalks.

Mr Libfeld: Sewers and water, roads and whatever.

Mr Stockwell: You just do not want to pay for the schools?

Mr Libfeld: No, nothing like that.

Mr Stockwell: Let me go to the next house, the 25% affordable housing component and how you are following that rule or guideline—I am not even sure if it is law or not. I do not think it is because I know that some municipalities are enforcing it, others are not, some have higher, others have lower. Do you find it difficult in certain instances to meet that and do you take your 25% offsite in most instances when you are building single-family residential?

Mr Libfeld: It is relatively new. There are a couple of plans going through that have been outside. There are a couple of municipalities I have dealt with and within the general area of the municipalities this section will be 25%. Everyone is doing it a little bit differently, from what we understand at this point.

Mr Stockwell: We had a group in yesterday from legal services suggesting that in fact it is going offsite. The good development goes in this spot, then you take your 25% and put it beside a highway. Do you find that to be the case?

Mr Libfeld: Not specifically, no.

Mr Stockwell: Is there much going onsite or is most of it going offsite?

Mr Libfeld: I am familiar with a couple of projects onsite, yes.

Mr Stockwell: Are you familiar with more offsite? I would like to know how this is working from your point of view. I do not think it is working.

Mr Libfeld: Where I am developing, the municipality is doing it in areas, but it is not necessarily onsite. There is not one area less desirable than the other area. There are no major roads or trains or anything like that. So I do not believe it is a problem as of now.

Mr Stockwell: Are you in fact meeting that 25%?

Mr Libfeld: In co-operation with the towns. The towns are attempting to enforce it, and under their—

Mr Stockwell: Definition of “affordable.”

Mr Libfeld: —definition we are meeting it as an industry around the province.

Mr Stockwell: But the difficulty, again, is what is affordable.

Mr Libfeld: Every town has a different idea.

Mr Stockwell: Metro’s definition of “affordable” is certainly different than some areas outside of southern Ontario, at least, anyway.

Mr Libfeld: Everything is affordable in some of our areas in the province.

Mr Stockwell: The other point is, with efficiencies in the system, etc, you are suggesting that the cost of houses would in fact be reduced, the cost of construction, the delays, etc. I am curious about that. I have always been a believer in the free market system, but I am also a firm believer that those who build are going to charge what the market will bear. Do you not? Regardless of how efficient the system is, if you are going to make $100,000 a house, you are going to make $100,000 a house. You are not simply going to drop the price because, “Gee, it’s a more efficient and we can make more money here.” If a house worth $300,000, you are going to sell it for $300,000 regardless of whether or not $250,000 is a reasonable return.

Mr Libfeld: We are in the business to make a dollar but with quantities of lands competition will take over. You do not have that problem in the majority of locations in the United States where they do not have the infrastructure problem. They put in the roads and sewers way in advance. For a very large home, you pay a third of what you pay in the Toronto market.

That is not the problem. We want to build more. We want to build for less money. It is the quantity of land that can get into the system, because there is not the infrastructure and that is the basic problem. There are only so many lots in the next year and a half or two years, that can be built. If demand comes back, we are going to be faced with the same thing we faced in 1986, 1987 and 1988. We as an industry do not want that. We would rather have a smoother playing field, have the quantities there, have people have more of a choice and bring down the prices.

Mr Stockwell: Really, in a nutshell, you are suggesting that during this economic slowdown the best thing for a government to be doing would be building the infrastructure, creating the lots earlier and then when the market heats up again there will be enough on the market so they are not driving the price out of people’s affordable range.

Mr Libfeld: Exactly.

Mr Jamison: I just want to get a feel for the impact you feel your industry will have concerning the GST and its effect on your ability to provide housing at a reasonable cost.

Mr Libfeld: The GST was more expensive than the federal government suggested because of the land component that is presently being taxed. There is a rebate on inexpensive homes of 2.5% and there is a removal of the other tax, the manufacturers’ sales tax. In the Toronto area it is suggested that it will cost 1.5% to 2% more. Outside of the Toronto area in the rest of the province, in the smaller locations there will not be a significant cost because the land component is not that significant. That is basically where the difference is. So there is a cost of 1.5% to 2%, but the problem with the GST is twofold. Number one, they put an artificial cutoff date of 31 December and the majority of the builders, suppliers and manufacturers basically delivered everything on 31 December. Now we are all walking into the new year stop-start, so to speak, and everyone is getting comfortable with using it so it is not going to be the issue it was before. It is on the back burner, so to speak.

Mr Kozman: My name is Brian Kozman. I am the director of policy and research. I think it is fair to say that there was an anticipation on the part of the industry that the GST would skew some buyers into the end of 1991. That did not occur because of the obvious economic turn. Builders who had hoped for that skewing, people bringing forward their buying decisions, brought a lot of product on stream so there is a lot of unsold inventory sitting out there.

That created problems for us in so far as you now have product on the market, but no buyers. The carrying costs of these houses and that land were very difficult and it has created problems for builders. We were quite pleased with the statements made by the Minister of Finance just before Christmas that they were extending the deadlines for getting back the rebates on some of that unsold inventory, because I think there was a recognition that there were a lot of homes sitting out there that were posing problems for builders and developers in terms of carrying costs.

Mr Kwinter: One of the statements you make is that unless the economy improves, 20% of the home builders are going to go out of business. What is your definition of improved economy? What things are you looking for? Are interest rates the key? What is the key?

Mr Libfeld: Interest rates are probably at the top of the list, and they are coming down. We did a survey among our members. We sent out to about 300 members and 116 responded. Of those who responded, 20% said they were in dire straits and if it did not turn around in the near future they would be out of business. That gives you an idea. I think interest rates are a key, but we would like the government to consider a lot of the proposals that we face before you today in the remainder of the document that are placing in front of you.

Mr Kwinter: We have had two of the major banks in here and they are saying the economy is going to improve in mid-1991 and will continue to improve in 1992 and 1993. There are some questions as to whether the interest rates are going to change because of the government's desire to put a cap and dampen inflation, so you could have this anomaly of the economy improving but interest rates not. What I am really trying to determine is, if the interest rates stay high and the economy improves, is that going to solve your problem or is it still going to be a problem?

Mr Libfeld: That is fine, but high interest rates cost more to produce a home. It is part of the component. It takes time to build a home and whatever else and the purchasers have to pay more for their mortgages, so it is part of the equation. Of course we would like lower interest rates, but a good economy with high rates is a catch-22. I am not exactly sure. Normally it does not happen that way.

Mr Kozman: High interest rates are only one component of why the consumers out there do not have confidence in the economy. They are uncertain about what their job situation is going to be. They are uncertain about job opportunities. They are uncertain about what the war is going to hold. All of those things interact, I guess, to influence their buying decisions. They are making the biggest decision, in terms of a purchase, in their life and all of those things combine. Interest rates are a big component of that. In the mindset of the consumer, "I can't get into the market if I'm looking at 13% interest rates."

Part of our concern is that that artificial barrier is blocking them from making a decision. Right now the industry is starting to get smaller-sized units on the market, looking at a lot of multifamily stuff, town homes, that sort of thing. The market has responded to the tough times by trying to put out a product that is more in line with the buying power of the consumer. I think if we have some of the things we are asking for in terms of a more streamlined land approvals process, more land on the market, more infrastructure upon which you can base the foundation for new communities, that is all going to help in terms of getting that buyer a bit more confident about his being able to follow through on his decision to buy a house.

Mr Kwinter: The interest rates are more than artificial because the higher the interest rates the higher your income has to be to meet the mortgage qualifications. You may be ready to buy a house tomorrow and then find that the interest rates have gone up 1% and you are no longer qualified, because the mortgage company does not determine that your income is enough to carry the higher interest rate mortgage.

Mr Libfeld: That is definitely part of the equation.

Mr Kwinter: You talked about one of your recommendations dealing with the fact—I know this to be true—that the workforce is aging in the construction business because not enough young people are coming in. You are suggesting that the government has to really address that. One of the problems is that there is a social sort of hangup. The average mother would not be thrilled if her daughter came home and said, "I'm going to marry a bricklayer," only because there is this kind of lack of appreciation of the value of manual trades and skills and what they contribute to society. I think that is something everybody has to sort of contribute to changing, to give a social value to the fact that there are people out there doing these jobs.

They are very lucrative. You know the standard gag about the doctor who comes to the plumber and says: "How come you're charging so much? I only charge so much." The plumber says, "When I was a doctor, I used to charge that much too, but now that I'm a plumber this is what I charge." They make a great deal of money, but there is not that social acceptability. I think this is something the industry has a responsibility to work on as well, because it has to be shown that these are valuable jobs both in an economic and in a social context and that they make a valuable contribution.

That then carries on to the next concern I have. You are talking about the apprenticeship program. There are problems because there are barriers to entry into the apprenticeship program because there are controls put on by the people who are already in it. It is a matter of controlling their industry. How do you deal with that?

Mr Libfeld: We suggested to the government as early as last week—we were in to see the Ministry of Skills Development—that we want the ratios to be changed. Anyone who wants to learn a trade should be able to get into it. It is tough when the ratios are four or five to one, five journeymen to one apprentice. The access should be there. Not all firms, subtrades and contractors have teaching organizations, so you have four or five to one, but in essence maybe you have 20 to one and things like that. A lot of our trades and a lot of our workers in slow times and whatever go into the manufacturing industry. They go into all sorts of different aspects of our economy, but they are qualified electricians, they are qualified plumbers. We are a great training ground. We probably do more training than any other industry in the province and we are the largest employers, as of now, of any industry in the province. That is the way around it: reduce the numbers and we will get the people in there.

Mr Phillips: I would like your estimate of what is the right number of new households each year that we should create. I know it is difficult. We know how many households have been formed. What is the right number? Otherwise, in bad times you will be here looking for more roads and in good times you will be here looking for something else.

My second question is, your advice to us here is, I think, during difficult times the temptation is to spend your way out of a recession but you do not believe this is the answer to Ontario's current problem. Your advice to the committee, I think, is to spend more money on infrastructure and to go further into debt by funding, through debt, schools and things like that. So both of those recommendations are kind of, "Cut somewhere else, but spend here." Knowing that almost 90% of our budget is health, education, community and social services, debt servicing and the stuff we are talking about, if we cannot cut elsewhere, would your recommendation still be to spend here and take the debt up?

Mr Libfeld: It is very difficult to tell an unemployed bricklayer or electrician today, "You're sitting home because we have other responsibilities." The most important thing to him right now is to get out and get to work. Infrastructure will solve that problem, not only short term but long term. If we have the infrastructure in place, you will not need to know the quantities of housing units. The industry will build the quantities of housing units. When the demand is there, we will be able to build them because the infrastructure will be there; when the demand is not there, we will not build them. But we will not come to the boom-and-bust cycle with prices, because there will always be competition.

Mr Phillips: The problem is, you say, "Maintaining control of our deficit must continue to be a top priority with the government of Ontario." I would think you are saying to us a higher priority than that is what you are recommending.

Mr Libfeld: Municipal bond financing is spreading it all over a longer period of time.

Mr Kozman: We are not talking about willy-nilly spending and going into debt in the province. We are talking about a co-ordinated system whereby this government can get back into the business of providing infrastructure, upon which the growth of this province depends. In our opinion, that responsibility has not been there in the past little while. I think we would have liked to see more investment in the infrastructure, in the foundations of communities, upon which we have to build.

Obviously there seems to be a dichotomy of saying "We want deficit control on the one hand, but on the other hand we want to put in place more spending on infrastructure." We view that infrastructure as an investment. It is an investment in the future of the province. It allows us to build more homes built and it allows the province to get a more attractive commercial base and industrial base. I don't think they are mutually exclusive things. I think they can work together and I think that if we take a look at streamlining some of the problems we have identified, we can reduce costs in other areas.

Mr Phillips: As you know, we will wrestle with this here. Well, the Treasurer will. We will give him a nice report, but he will wrestle with what size the deficit is going to be. I just want to make sure that when you look at that you realize your recommendations to us are going to be kind of two ways.

Mr Kozman: I agree.

Mrs Sullivan: I am going to be all over the place with these questions. I wonder, first of all, if you could give us an indication of whether you have seen a move in your workforce out of new home building into renovation, and into your membership.

Mr Libfeld: Some of the members; my own firm has a renovation wing. The economy was such that renovation did not grow last year. Actually, people were concerned about even renovating last year. It could be the case in the near future, but as of last year there was no move.

Mrs Sullivan: Are you seeing any indication that GST rules will mean that renovation becomes more attractive as a portion of the activity of your industry over the next period of time?

Mr Libfeld: All the surveys and all the economic data suggest that it will reverse itself with new home construction. New home construction was the larger of the two. They will reverse over the next little while.

Mrs Sullivan: What impact would you see that GST has on your labour force?

Mr Libfeld: Our labour force does the new home construction and the renovation. We represent both industries. Our labour force does the work on both new and old product.

Mrs Sullivan: Basically what you are saying is that although there may be a change in what the industry is doing, the labour force would be constant, no matter what it is.

Mr Libfeld: Yes. A plumber is a plumber. He works in a new home or an old home.

Mrs Sullivan: I was interested in some of your comments on Seaton. I wondered if you had entered into discussions with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs relating to the R-2000 component in that Seaton project, if you had talked at any length with those people and whether you thought it might be worth while to look at the building initiative, at things like district heating.

Mr Libfeld: I am not that familiar with district heating, but it was very preliminary with the previ-verment. We had several consultations with them and 2000 was never mentioned.

Mrs Sullivan: The third aspect relates to demographic change and the impact that will have on housing starts over the next period of time, not immediately, but we certainly know the impact of housing starts as an economic indicator. Is the OHBA looking at, say within the next 10 to 15 years, a change in the nature of housing development as a result of changes in demographics that may in fact change the economic indicators over a long period of time?

Mr Libfeld: We had a couple of speakers yesterday. We had the presidents' and EOs' conference in Toronto, where all of the 33 presidents from around the province came in for a two-day seminar. The economic speaker suggested it is going to be changed. The baby-boomers are getting older. They are going to possibly want move-up homes or condominiums and there are fewer people following us who are in the starter field, so yes, the demographics will change. The only wild card in the equation is immigrants and where they come from and what kind of dollars they are going to be either creating here or bringing with them.

Mr Kozman: While there are going to be more move-up buyers in the market, it is also important to realize that there is only so much land out there to build upon. Boundaries are changing to try to meet the needs, but I think you are going to be looking at more compact development, higher-density development, hopefully if the municipalities are willing. I think you are looking at more multifamily housing. The industry is equipped to deal with that, but we need a partnership with the municipalities to bring that about. The not-in-my-backyard syndrome that prevails out there in many cases prejudices our ability to move towards that higher-density type of housing and development. I think that is going to have an influence as well, in addition to the demographics that are going to be coming.

The Chair: We would like to thank you for coming today. We appreciate your brief.

ONTARIO GOOD ROADS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Good Roads Association, David Murray, president. To the members of the committee, we are now running behind time. If we could keep our questions brief and to the point, we could still be out of here at a reasonable time. Please begin.

Mr Murray: We recognize by the clock that we did run a little over with the last delegation. We will try to be as brief as possible. I think you have been circulated a copy of the brief from Ontario Good Roads, and with your permission I would like to just go through it quickly. At the end of the presentation, if there are any questions of the committee, we have some members of the board of directors here and we would try to briefly answer those or clarify.

My name is David Murray. I am president of the Ontario Good Roads Association. I would like to introduce my co-directors. With me are Dan Zakula, area superintendent, roadways division, regional municipality of Niagara and OGRA first vice-president; Robert Dempsey, OGRA second vice-president, and Len Rach, director of engineering, transportation department, municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and an OGRA director. Also present with us this morning are Sheila Richardson, our OGRA executive director, and Diana Summers, OGRA policy adviser.

On behalf of the Ontario Good Roads Association, we are pleased to be here this morning and discuss those issues that OGRA feels should be considered by this committee as it develops recommendations for consideration in the preparation of the upcoming provincial budget. Mr Chairman, it did not go unnoticed this morning that your last delegation, the Ontario Home Builders' Association, made some mention of the importance of roads infrastructure, and I thank them for bringing that to your attention.

OGRA is a municipal association with 750 member municipalities, both urban and rural, large and small. Municipal representatives who sit on our committees and the board of directors include both elected representatives and appointed municipal officials, so the interests of municipal road and bridge infrastructures are well represented.

OGRA's mandate is to present the road-related concerns of the municipalities to the provincial government. We are aware that the government is facing a large deficit that is expected to grow even larger. We also know that during the course of these hearings, this committee will hear repeated pleas for funding from a variety of deputations, all requesting urgently needed funds for a variety of deserving causes. Yours is not an easy task and we wish you well in your deliberations.

We have come today, as in years past, to remind members of the importance of a road system in good repair and capable of meeting demands placed upon it. The throne speech provided an indication that this government is prepared to address the needs of the public infrastructure, and we of course welcome that initiative.

As municipalities, we are ready and anxious to take on the challenge of meeting transportation needs and demands and placing these demands in the context of other, broader expectations of today's society. We know, for example, that environmental concerns rank high on the public agenda and that the municipalities must keep this in mind as they embark on road-related projects. We are also aware that public transit will play an ever-increasing role in the movement of people, at least in our larger urban centres. OGRA recognizes and supports this role that public transit must play in our efforts to protect the enhancement of our environment. We believe that a balanced approach to the provision and maintenance of both roads and public transit will best serve our economic, social and environmental priorities.

The problem, of course, remains where to find the necessary funds. We would like to reiterate our recommendation that a one cent per litre fuel tax be introduced and the revenue generated dedicated to road needs. We recognize that dedicated taxes reduce the availability of funds for those sectors that do not have an obvious source of revenue, but we believe that public acceptance of increased taxes will result if the specific target and use of the funds is indicated.

Revenue from fuel taxes has been mentioned as a source for several possible initiatives, but OGRA believes that road needs are the legitimate recipient of those funds. We calculate that revenues from this source would go a long way to addressing the road needs in Ontario.

I would like to emphasize that this is not a plea for more roads, but for better roads. Roads in good repair could help both our economy and our environment by moving goods and people quickly and efficiently. It also makes economic sense to spend public funds on road repair and maintenance, which is far cheaper than road construction. It also protects the investment of public funds that we have in our infrastructure. Perhaps we should also note that there is a high labour component of road projects, which will surely be important during the recessionary times ahead.

Insufficient funding for roads is not going unnoticed. Today road funding is less than 10% of the provincial budget. Municipalities are doing what they can to help offset inadequate assistance from the provincial government. Almost 75% of the municipalities in Ontario are undertaking significant road work without the benefit of provincial subsidies, resulting in increased local taxes or increased lot levies. In fact, the full impact of government underfunding of roads has been cushioned by municipal decisions to provide road construction and maintenance beyond that covered by provincial subsidies. Compounding this are indications that the government will look to municipalities to assume certain roads or portions of roads that are no longer deemed to serve a provincial purpose.

In general terms, we would like to caution the government that this is not the time to introduce new policies and programs which are to be paid for by municipalities. Simply, if the government cannot afford them, neither can the municipalities.

Another area that we would like to mention briefly is that of deconditionalization of road grants. As some of you may be aware, AMO—that is, the Association of Municipalities of Ontario—has issued a discussion paper entitled New Dimensions, which recommends that municipal road grants and other conditional grant programs be eliminated and the funding allocated through a new municipal general support grant.

OGRA is opposed to deconditionalization and believes that the road grant should be improved, not replaced. Right now, payments to municipalities are based on road needs and are responsive to municipal needs and the ability to pay. Within this grant, municipalities can determine their level of expenditure on roads, as well as their road needs priorities. We recognize that the existing grant system has many shortfalls that should be remedied and we have offered to work with the Ministry of Transportation to eliminate inconsistencies and duplication in the grant structure.

OGRA recommends in the strongest possible terms the need to improve the existing road grant, not replace it. Some 160 member municipalities of OGRA have passed resolutions supporting this position. The issue of possible deconditionalization will likely be debated in the coming months and we wanted to take this opportunity to voice OGRA's position on the record.

Another issue of prime importance to OGRA is the need for grade separations and improvements to level crossings. The federal government seems intent on allocating its responsibility to participate in the funding of grade separation projects. There are currently over 80 outstanding projects awaiting approval in Ontario and we would like to hear what action the provincial government intends to take in the absence of leadership from the federal government on this issue.

OGRA appreciates the opportunity to have these discussions with you. We wish you well in your deliberations and hope that our comments will be of some use to the committee.

Mr Kwinter: In the years I travelled the province literally from end to end, I would say the most common request I had from municipalities outside of the greater Toronto area was for four-laning the highways in that particular area. The feeling was that if they could only have a four-lane highway, all great things would happen; industries would locate there and they would have economic activity, everything would be greater.

What are your feelings about that? Do you think this is a priority and this is something the government should be doing?

Mr Murray: I do not think, in a simple form, that is the total answer to what municipalities in the province want. As an elected official—I realize that all of you are elected officials—certainly what I am hearing as the first complaint, after dogs and loud music next door, is the condition of roads that people drive day to day to go to work. That seems to be priority 1.

Some of the social things that were mentioned a few minutes ago in the other presentation are what I choose to call motherhood issues, and they are very important. As far as the roads are concerned, in the north four-lane roads seem to be a high priority; I am talking about the true north of Ontario. In the central southern section, I am not so sure that four-lane roads are really the answer. The infrastructure and the condition of those roads, to get to work and for services, seems to be top priority with the people I talk to.

Mr Christopherson: My personal background is city and regional council for five years, so I am familiar with this issue at that level and understand the funding problems. Aside from positions taken by councils, the one cent per litre fuel tax is something that at least has intrigued me.

I would like to ask a quick question, and I am just suggesting this hypothetically. If the price of oil should skyrocket as a result of the war and it were to stay at extremely high levels for a sustained period, would you still feel that this is the best way to go? Or would that mitigate your recommendation and would you feel that with that situation happening perhaps this idea should be held off a little? What are your thoughts on that, if that scenario were to happen? Or do you still think this is ound, fundamental structure as to how we ought to be funding roads and the costs?

Mr Dempsey: If I could answer that, my name is Bob Dempsey. I certainly appreciate the opportunity to talk to you. The one cent a litre fuel tax we calculate would generate $80 million to $100 million a year. Interestingly enough, that almost coincides with the dollars of deficiencies which the present Ministry of Transportation budget does not fund. Municipalities, the upper tier in the counties especially, kick in close to $75 million a year in additional funding over and above what is subsidized, 100% municipal tax dollars if you wish.

The Canadian Automobile Association and all of those types, the Ontario Trucking Association, have all said there is a fuel efficiency related to fewer potholes. If we can make the roads more efficient and move goods and people quicker, as opposed to idling on the Don Valley parking lot at 5 o'clock, then we are going to spend an awful lot less money on fuel and the cost of fuel. If your government can see its way clear to allowing the roads to be better quality and higher capacity to move goods and people, then the price of fuel is not going to have as big an impact on your economy.

Mr Christopherson: Let me very briefly follow up on that. Are you suggesting that the automobile associations and those organizations would be supportive of this move?

Mr Dempsey: I am not sure what their official position is on a dedicated fuel tax, to be honest. I should not go on record as saying what they feel. I do know they support better quality and higher capacity road systems, naturally.

Mr Christopherson: It is how we fund it that has always been the bugaboo.

Mr Stockwell: On the one cent per litre, I can see your argument. How long do you think before some government comes along and steals your one cent, though, and applies it elsewhere? That is famous, for governments to dedicate it for about a year and then steal it and put it someplace else, and then you are back here telling us, "Gee, if we could only get that one cent back, life would be wonderful again."

It never seems to work that way. Some government dedicates it for a year, then something comes along that is so much more important and everyone cries they need money and someone says, "Gee, we have about $100 million from the one cent a litre." I would like to hear your comments. Do you really think that is going to stick with good roads? Do you believe governments down the road will buy into this dedicated one cent for ever? It will just be another form of tax applied to the general revenues, just like the tire tax was the first year it was introduced.

Mr Dempsey: That is exactly what I was going to address, the tire tax. The fishing licence was dedicated towards restocking our streams.

Mr Stockwell: The air conditioning tax on cars in the 1970s. I am not blaming one government. They all do it.

Mr Dempsey: The commercial concentration levy in downtown Toronto: I do not know whether that is dedicated to specifically relieving that problem—

Mr Stockwell: It is dedicated to general revenue.

Mr Dempsey: We feel it can generate $80 million to $100 million per year to the present approximately $725 million a year subsidization budget that the MTO distributes to municipalities. If that is increased by $80 million to $100 million and you wish to abandon the one cent a litre dedicated tax, as long as the $80 million to $100 million stays so that municipalities can do their long-range planning of projects and you do not, all of a sudden, cut their transfer payments by $80 million to $100 million in the future, then I think our concerns are allayed.

But I have the same fears that you do, that they would take away the one cent and then drop our transfer payments by the equivalent amount. That would be disastrous.

Mr Stockwell: In your recommendations, there is no guarantee that that one cent would stay.

Mr Dempsey: I do not think we can guarantee what government is going to be sitting in power, either.

Mr Stockwell: Exactly. The difficulty I have is that I believe the only way you stop governments from spending is not to give them the money. I think if you generated another $80 million to $100 million on one cent a litre, you guys would not be getting it inside of two years.

Mr Dempsey: The one thing the government of Ontario has to remember is that for every dollar it spends, the municipalities pretty well match it dollar for dollar.

Mr Stockwell: Not any more.

Mr Dempsey: In order for us to qualify for the $80 million to $100 million you would add to the budget, we would have to come up with $80 million to $100 million on average. The subsidization rate for transportation is about 50% across the board. So you are getting a $2 bang for a $1 buck, because the municipalities are coming up from the other direction to match your dollar.

Mr Stockwell: It is kind of nice to be at the provincial level and be able to see the municipalities picking up the responsibility. At Metro we picked up responsibility for road improvements, etc., at 100-cent dollars. The comment I always made as a Metro representative was that the biggest mistake we made was committing the 100-cent dollars, because it took the provincial government off the hook. Have you canvassed your members and asked them what their plans are in the future. If they keep picking up the 100-cent dollar programs, then really the provincial government can say, "Well, it's getting done without our money."

What is their position on the 100-cent dollars? Are they going to continue to pick it up? If so, I think you are arguing against your case. I have always thought that way: "If you're going to pick up the 100-cent dollar programs, then don't come crying poor to me."

Mr Dempsey: I dare say you could avoid repairing the Gardiner Expressway. You had to spend whatever it took to repair it. You cannot abandon your duties.

Mr Stockwell: You could have avoided it. I was on council. You could have avoided repairing it: you close it down. And you expanded it by a lane.

Mr Rach: The argument in terms of spending 100-cent dollars is quite valid. On the other hand, even with the 100-cent dollar expenditures that the municipalities in Ontario are throwing into their road programs, we are still falling behind on rehabilitating the system. In Metropolitan Toronto, there is a long list of roads slated for reconstruction but there just is not the funding to reconstruct those roads at present.

Mr Stockwell: Municipally?

Mr Rach: Municipally. The money just is not there.

Mrs Sullivan: In the NDP Agenda for People there was a recommendation made that the Trans-Canada Highway be four-laned and there was a budget figure attached to that of $100 million. Could you tell me how many miles that would buy?

Mr Murray: It is difficult to say. In some areas of northern Ontario $100 million would not go very far. In other areas of flatlands, you can buy a lot more four-lane highway on a flat terrain than you can through a rocky terrain that curves around lakes, etc. So it is difficult to transfer $100 million into kilometres. It depends on what sections you are talking about.

Mrs Sullivan: What would the range be—10 miles to 50, or 1,000?

Mr Murray: If I can just expound our position on that, we have talked to the Ministry of Transportation on this issue. What it is attempting to do is to develop truck passing lanes in certain areas and maximize the bang for the buck in that area, not an entire four-lane Trans-Canada from one end of the province to the other, realizing that is financially difficult to ever achieve. But there are sections where it would make sense that you could put in truck passing lanes, etc., to increase and improve the flow of traffic around people hauling campers and heavy truck traffic. So the $100 million, on our recommendation, should be studied very carefully and built as passing lanes in certain sections.

Mrs Sullivan: How much does it cost to build on flat land, say, a kilometre of highway?

Mr Murray: I am not sure of the budget figures, but to build something like a 401-type of cross-section would likely be a million dollars a kilometre, would it not, Len? Or would it be more?

Mr Rach: I think it would be more. Generally speaking, to widen the metropolitan urban arterials is running anywhere from $2.5 million to $3 million per kilometre.

The Chair: Is that just for a two-lane road?

Mr Rach: We are talking of, say, widening a four-lane to six lanes or a five-lane road to seven lanes.

The Chair: The numbers in the budget from last year have cost of highway construction in southern Ontario at $1 million per kilometre for two lanes, $6 million for four lanes and $15 million for six lanes. So these numbers incorrect?

Mr Rach: We are talking of generally reconstructing the pavement and widening and moving utilities. We are not looking at property acquisitions or very expensive items.

The Chair: Of course, you are talking about a different type of construction with the 401. It has, what, a 10-inch to 18-inch concrete base, with a two-inch to three-inch layer of asphalt on top?

Mr Rach: Yes.

The Chair: If you are talking about a northern road, you are talking about different grades of asphalt and so on because of freezing. Also, you are talking probably about two layers of three-inch asphalt, which makes it a different cost, does it not?

Mr Dempsey: The one thing you have to recall, and what I do not think any of us talked about, is interchange. They are really where the money gets poured in, because you do not know whether you want multilevel interchanges like the 400-401 or whether you can have at-grade interchanges. That is where you can chew up an awful lot of your dollars. To estimate dollar per kilometre to build a piece of road is really an individual estimate on each case.

Mr Phillips: I just make the observation, because you mentioned 50-cent dollars, that I think that era is gone. The new government has committed that it will not impose municipalities programs like that, where they fund part of it and then expect the municipality to pick up the other part of it. So I would not count on that in the future, because they think they said that if they launched a new initiative they would not impose that on the municipalities but rather would fund it. It may not be as easy to leverage those dollars in the future.

Mr Dempsey: What I am quoting is the historical picture of the amount of money spent by municipalities and the amount of money spent by the government in the roads and infrastructure in municipalities. It works out to somewhere around 50-cent dollars.

Mr Murray: To take your question a little further, you are finding, for example, in our municipality that our grant rate is 53%, 53-cent dollars. Our municipal council is throwing into that pot, if you will, for strictly roads purposes another $100,000 to $150,000 of tax dollars straight from our taxpayers. Our experience in our road program is that even with that influx of funds, direct tax dollars, we are just managing to hold our own relative to the roads with almost no new construction. It is almost a break-even situation in our small municipality of 10,000 people.

Mr Dempsey: One document you may wish to look at, and unfortunately we do not have it here to present to you, is a brief done by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. In it they tried to calculate the economic impact of spending $1 on roads to what it does for the economy. I believe it was a factor of about two, but I am not sure. It is something that in recessionary times the provincial government should look at, because, as we said in our brief, road projects are very labour-intensive projects. It will definitely help an unemployment situation. A healthy economy is an employed economy. For every dollar you spend on roads you are going to get it back in sales tax and income tax and fuel tax, because your people are going to be busy and they are going to be back out spending again, as opposed to trying to maximize the impact of UIC cheques and just being able to exist.

The Chair: If you could send that brief along to the clerk, I am sure he would distribute it to the members of the committee. I would like to thank you for coming today and giving us this brief. The construction of roads is a very complex, complicated and expensive topic, so it is nice to have some input on this. Thank you very much.

EXECUTIVE FURNITURE GROUP

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Executive Furniture Group, Mark Miller, president. If you could begin, please.

Mr Miller: I would like to thank you for this opportunity to give a presentation to you on a topic that has been of some great concern for me and my business for the last two to three years.

Instead of reading my brief verbatim, I wish to summarize it and expound on some major points. I wish to describe the nature of my business, furniture rental, describe a particular problem with the provincial sales tax as it is related to my business and recommend certain solutions which I hope in turn will be suggested for review by the honourable Treasurer of Ontario.

I am the president of three furniture rental companies, two in Toronto and one in Ottawa, and we have been in business for well over 40 years. In case you may not know, a furniture rental company rents furniture for residential use and also to companies, but I am here before you to really speak to you about the residential side of my business. My company rents to individuals who wish to acquire furniture for their living room, bedroom or dining room. I also supply homemaker packages which include utensils for the kitchen. I do carpeting, I do vertical blinds, even do maid service. I do everything.

In the past it has been very popular because little credit is required to do so; second, it is very flexible for individuals to do so; and it eases personal financial pressures of money tied up in other things. It is helping quite a lot of people these days especially through the recession.

I also rent to middle- and upper-middle-income people. The gamut would include newly arrived immigrants, students, victims of home disasters, separated or divorced people, relocated employees, including diplomats, and I do have quite a few politicians in the city.

Furniture rentals have always been subject to provincial sales tax, and as a businessman operating in Ontario I have always collected provincial sales tax and gladly considered it my duty to do so. However, over the last 8 to 10 years, a new service industry, which I do have respect for, has gained predominance in the housing rental market, especially in the larger urban centres. This can be described as the furnished suite or apartment hotel or furnished condominium, in other words, units that rent furniture for the living room, the dining room, the bedroom, that have kitchen utensils, that have maid service and supply everything else, but with one added feature, a shell to put that furniture in. They rent exactly as we do, but they are not subject to provincial sales tax. Often this industry achieves a substantially greater amount of rent because they are furnished suites.

Five minutes from here, on Bay Street, there is a building which, when the building was first created, I rented furniture to in a number of the units. Then the units were gradually converted into furnished suites. Right now, a non-furnished suite in this building you can rent for, say, $1,200 a month for a one-bedroom apartment. But now, with the furniture in it, it rents for $2,500 a month. They are not subject to provincial sales tax. This exists in an area—and I am only quoting as of April—where there is a 0.5% vacancy rate in Metro Toronto and it is lower in the city of Toronto.

Therefore, as a business renting furniture and paying provincial sales tax, I feel discriminated against as a business offering the same service. Furnished suites are converting vacant units and transforming them into a business on which provincial sales tax collection is not required, provincial sales tax without the government knowing it has taken on a regressive nature. I say this because the provincial sales tax seems to be encouraging furnished suites by not putting on the provincial sales tax, and is encouraging apartments or condominiums away from the marketplace where the lower- or middle-income people cannot afford to move into these units.

I have two solutions, and I have a feeling I know which one would be preferred if it was taken. The first one is to really make our business equal to their business. When I purchase my furniture from the manufacturers and I pay the GST, I would like to be allowed to pay the provincial sales tax also at that time. I will pay the provincial sales tax so that my customers will not have to pay the provincial sales tax when they rent furniture. Or make it mandatory that landlords, condominium owners or management companies that are renting furnished suites collect from their tenants or from their clients a provincial sales tax which makes up the portion of the furnished suite. Or I should say, they could calculate just how much they are overcharging on the suite for the furniture and collect the provincial sales tax on that portion. That too would make their industry equal with mine. They are in the furniture rental business; I am in the furniture rental business. I am collecting provincial sales tax; they are not.

I feel quite emotional about this only because I know the industry very well, I know the people who run it and they are very nice people. The thing is, I know that when they purchase their furniture, which may be one of the questions you may raise, they often get their furniture from the manufacturer too, but they do pay the provincial sales tax at that point. I just want to have their industry recognized. It is such a new industry here in Ontario that really statistics are very difficult to find out. CMHC just has not done anything to really focus on the furnished suite market. I believe that with further study, this probably will become quite an issue.

In conclusion, my plea is for equality. Let us be equal. We are doing the same service and it should be considered equal under the provincial sales tax.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank you for coming before us and presenting your concerns from your point of view in your particular service sector. I think part of our committee's mandate is to provide opportunities for individuals and organizations such as yourself and we appreciate your taking the time to come forth.

One avenue for you to take—and you have expressed your concerns before us in a very articulate manner—would you consider perhaps preparing a brief for the Fair Tax Commission so it could evaluate your concerns as well?

Mr B. Ward: You can take that under advisement.

Mr Miller: Absolutely.

Mr Hansen: What about apartments that have fridges and stoves? Are you going to call those furnishings or would you call them appliances? There are a lot of apartment buildings here in Toronto and all of Ontario. Are you including that in the 8%?

Mr Miller: Let me put it this way. Often clients of mine need to have stoves, refrigerators, dishwashers and microwave ovens and I collect provincial sales tax for that. Yes, I would include that.

Mr Hansen: I just wanted to get clarification there, because this would affect just about everybody in Ontario.

Mr Miller: Yes, it would. Or exempt me from charging.

Mr Hansen: So the landlord that has two apartments with a fridge and stove would be required to remit to the government for that fridge and stove even though he only has maybe two units like that.

Mr Miller: Yes. Again, I feel, for the appliances themselves, that would make up a very minimal part of it. If it was suggested that be exempt from taxation, certainly that would not bother me, because that is very minimal in comparison to what the complete furnished service offers.

Mr Hansen: I think the other thing too is that with a landlord possibly with a fridge and stove, let's say the law came in on 1 May, does he take the valuation of that fridge as being worth $100 and the stove is $100 and you charge 8% on that? These are just some questions referred to in the brief and it is something new to me.

Mr Miller: Absolutely. When you talk about appliances, though, because that is not really my business—

Mr Hansen: It is all part of it.

Mr Miller: —and that is a completely different lobby. I was making a comparison of just one apartment before and when I said unfurnished, it did include a refrigerator and a stove. But adding the furniture and the extra services on, it increased by well over 100% in value on a rental basis and still no provincial sales tax was collected on that. That furniture will continue to be rented for well over five, six, seven years before it is renovated.

The Chair: Are there any other questions from the committee? Seeing none, I would like to thank you for your brief and for sending it in early enough for us to have a chance to read it.

CO-OPERATIVE HOUSING ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario; Dale Reagan and Penny Bethke, if you could begin with your presentation, please.

Ms Bethke: Certainly. We would like to thank the committee for offering us another opportunity to make a presentation to you this year. My name is Penny Bethke, I am the executive director of the Labour Council Development Foundation here in Toronto. I am also the president of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario. Dale Reagan is executive director of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario.

The Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario, which we refer to in short form as CHAO, represents the co-operative movement at the provincial level in Ontario. Our organization is made up of members of the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario which include currently the 12 resource groups that develop non-profit housing co-operatives across the province, the seven federations of existing housing co-operatives and a staff association largely based here in Toronto at the moment, and there are other emerging federations and staff associations across the province that we represent.

We currently represent approximately 25,000 households of co-operative housing in the province, which are scattered among 400 housing co-operatives across the province to date. There are several areas that I guess you would like to highlight in our presentation. I am going to spend my time talking about our first major recommendation on non-profit housing supply and Dale will talk about the other recommendations that we would like to make to the committee.

In our brief, our first point under the issue of non-profit housing supply is that beginning in the 1991-92 fiscal year, the government should include funds in the provincial budget for a non-profit housing program to follow up on the successful but now exhausted Homes Now program.

We know that the NDP government has indicated its intention of initiating a large-scale non-profit housing program in 1992, and currently is undertaking an affordable housing supply strategy planning process within the Ministry of Housing until 1992. But as some people would say until the real thing comes along, we need a strong initiative in the coming fiscal year for a variety of reasons.

I will speak of something that remains very close to my heart. Given that the Homes Now program units have largely been allocated to projects across the province and that all our resource groups have to look forward to in the coming year is an increasingly diminishing federal support for the development of co-op housing, whether it is at the national level or through their cost-sharing agreements with the provincial government, in order to have a supply framework, an infrastructure that continues to exist across the province in regions like London and Sudbury and tawa and Windsor, we need to have additional initiatives coming from the provincial government to get us through the point in time when a new provincial housing program is developed in the course of the next year and in effect implemented in 1992.

Also, given my own connection with the labour movement, I am particularly sensitive to the fact that we are experiencing a 60% to 70% unemployment rate in the construction trades right now and that housing traditionally, as an economic stimulus, can provide roughly 2.2 jobs created for every unit of housing built.

So it is particularly important, during the recessionary time, that we use a well-known, tried-and-true method that not only deals with the issue of job creation but deals with the incredible need for affordable housing in this province. The economic stimulation that can be provided has to be weighed with the fact that in a time of recession, with a softening land market, particularly areas such as Toronto, we know that this will be a time where we can conceivably buy land more cheaply, build housing more cheaply, and if ever there was a time to invest more provincial money in the housing market, that this was it. We feel that this is the time, in the coming year, where the province stands to get more bang for its buck in terms of delivering housing units and creating jobs. Certainly this is a major reason for us to commend that a special initiative is required for the coming fiscal year.

As I have indicated, we would hope that this initiative would be part of what would be a continuing non-profit supply program, that the government would choose the non-profit and co-operative sectors as a centrepiece of its initiatives in terms of providing affordable housing for rentarians in the coming years.

Certainly the Ministry of Treasury and Economics has apparently provided projections that by the year 2000 there will be approximately 450,000 people requiring rental housing in Ontario. That would mean, in order to meet that need alone, just the sheer growth in population, we would need to develop an additional 18,000 rental units a year. That does not address the need that the continuing expansion of the public housing waiting list also has, that there has been a 60% growth in the last three to four years in the families on public housing waiting lists. The non-profit and co-operative tenure options provide a method for dealing with the full spectrum of need for those who cannot afford home ownership in the low and moderate income bands.

One of the ironic things, I guess the co-operative housing sector in particular, has not always seen itself as a major player in the market, but we are responsible for a large portion of the housing starts in the province now because there is effectively no rental housing market here, unless you consider condominiums that have been built and cannot be sold and are rented out because they just cannot be dealt with in any other way and would stand vacant otherwise. Non-profit housing has been one of the most significant providers of rental housing in the last few years.

I think what is particularly important as well for us as sponsors of co-operatives across the province is that we offer a choice in tenure for people in non-profit affordable housing initiatives. For some people, the non-profit landlord-tenant model that the municipal non-profits and the private non-profits provide would be their choice. We know, from the kind of demand that we have to attend information meetings for new housing co-operatives under development and the phone calls our housing co-operatives and our resource groups and our federations get, that there is a high demand for co-op housing as an alternative in the non-profit housing tenure form.

Last, one of the other initiatives that the co-operative housing association has been involved with in the last couple of years has been the conversion of existing rental stock. We see this as an important initiative for a variety of reasons. Again, part and parcel of our principles has been the notion that people should have some control in the decision-making about their housing. Tenants have a right to this as well. Allowing tenants to purchase their building from their landlords, do necessary renovations and manage the buildings themselves gives an opportunity for us to provide those tenants with the security of tenure that they have not known in the private rental sector and, second, to address the needs of our aging housing stock for some kind of rehabilitation and renovation, at the very least to try to address energy conservation issues.

In broad strokes, those are the reasons why we feel there has to be an initiative in the coming fiscal year in particular in the non-profit and co-operative housing area. Dale will talk about our other recommendations.

Mr Reagan: In order to make sure that we have time for questions, I am going to only briefly highlight the additional areas where we have recommendations. I will touch in particular on housing on government lands and provide a little bit of background there. But I will only highlight without further comment the recommendations in the other areas, so we will simply leave it to any questions you may have for further background there.

Starting with housing on government land, just as a little bit of background, I think all members of this committee will remember that in 1987 the provincial government announced a Housing First policy under which any surplus provincial government land was to be made available for housing development if the land was suitable for housing development, and if it was not suitable for housing development, the funds generated through its sale should be targeted to a housing development fund which would be used for further housing initiatives.

Of course, this announcement was greeted very enthusiastically by ourselves and other housing advocates as providing a major opportunity for the development of affordable housing across the province. However, that enthusiasm soon began to diminish when the promise of this initiative failed to be realized. There are a variety of reasons for that, including a simple inability among the ministries concerned, especially Housing and Government Services, to actually bring the land on stream as quickly as was needed. We have so far to date seen very little of that government land actually made available.

We were also concerned when we heard the details that the policy actually had a de facto requirement that only 35% of the housing on provincial land be made available as affordable housing, and by that was meant the housing that is affordable to people up to the 60th percentile. The effect of this was that 65% of the homes created on government land could in fact be made available to people in the highest 40% of income within the population. So there was a major concern about that. Then we found in addition that the housing development fund which was to take the resources generated through sale of lands and make them available for further housing initiatives was never realized. It is simply a notional fund and those funds have never contributed to further housing development.

So our recommendations are that all surplus government land for housing should be used exclusively for non-profit housing, except on larger sites where we recognize that planning considerations will require some variation on that. But in that instance, all of the housing developed should be affordable, albeit with a component of ownership housing on it. However, any ownership housing developed on government land will need initial and long-term safeguards to guarantee its continued affordability, so it is not only available to meet the needs of the initial owner but continues to be available in the long term.

If this government policy is to have any practical effect, we feel that it is necessary that all provincial ministries and agencies should be instructed to compile detailed inventory of their land holdings and be directed to work with the Ministry of Government Services and the Ministry of Housing in a co-ordinated way to develop an action plan to bring those lands into housing use.

Finally, we are recommending that the government follow through with the initial intention of creating a dedicated housing development fund when land is sold for other purposes, that the funds go into this housing development fund which would be used to generate additional non-profit housing opportunities.

Those are our recommendations in the area of government land.

We have three other areas of recommendation, which I will simply refer you to. The first has to do with the land transfer tax, and our recommendation is that all non-profit housing projects should simply be exempted from the provincial land transfer tax. The current situation is that the government is charging the tax on the one hand and then subsidizing it on the other. The problem is they are subsidizing it with borrowed money, so it is actually costing the government more than it would simply to forgo the tax on non-profit housing. It would be a simple initiative and it would create significant savings.

In the area of how we target government housing resources, we feel that two earlier initiatives, the Ontario home ownership savings plan and the low-rise rehabilitation plan, were both ill conceived and have failed to live up to their original purposes and we do not feel they have a place within the current government housing strategy.

Finally, we feel that, even though it is not currently the issue that is most on people's minds in a soft real estate market, nevertheless it is timely to consider reintroduction of a speculation tax that would be directed at speculation in non-owner-occupied housing in Ontario. There is some background provided on each of those recommendations in our brief.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank the delegation for presenting such a progressive and forward-looking document. I just have two quick questions and then I will ask an opportunity for other questions. In today's economic climate—we are in a deep recession and real estate prices are in fact falling in Toronto as well as other areas—do you feel that a speculation tax is still relevant and that your committee should be recommending to the Treasury to explore the concept of a speculation tax in today's economic environment?

Ms Bethke: I think it is from the point of view of this is the second recession I will have worked through as a non-profit housing developer. We know what happened after the last recession. There was a great boom in real estate prices. So I would not immediately argue that introducing a speculation tax is inappropriate during a recession but is appropriate during a boom period.

In effect, having a speculation tax on non-owner-occupied housing or on land, if it is in fact the government's intention to provide the kind of stimulus in housing by developing 20,000 non-profit housing units a year, that kind of entry into the land market will fuel land prices whatever you can do prior to that significant entry into the market to hold the line on the softening land prices that have now experienced would be of benefit.

One of the unfortunate timings of the Homes for Ontario program was that it was introduced approximately a year before the peak in the land market. One of the difficulties that many co-operative organizations had when the government announced the program was in trying to go out and buy land once the government had made that announcement, because people thought: "It's the government. The pocket is always deep; therefore, whatever the market will bear is what we can charge these people."

Believe me, we are in a very different situation today with the daily calls from developers who have condominium projects that were ready to go and no market for them. Suddenly they have discovered the world of non-profit housing, which they discovered seven or eight years ago and are back to talk to us again.

So I think what we would like to see is a way of dampening speculation in land, which will always remain one of the three fundamental components of the cost of developing non-profit housing. In order to reduce the initial capital cost and the long-term subsidy cost to finance those non-profit housing projects, we think you can do something about dampening speculation on land.

Mr B. Ward: Just to follow up on the two programs you recommend be eliminated, the home ownership program and the low-rise, which you touch on at the back of your brief, is there anything else you would like to expand on about your feelings on those two programs? Are they simply not working or inadequate and the moneys could be spent elsewhere?

Mr Reagan: Yes. We have not put these recommendations at the forefront of our brief. They are not very much on our minds. I do not have the figures on the takeup of the Ontario home ownership savings plan, but it has been very small compared to what was originally promised. We do not figure it is going to have a major impact. I guess our overall position is that government expenditures should be directed towards non-profit housing or should be directed to non-profit initiatives rather than providing assistance to housing which takes its place in the market and has no control on its ultimate cost.

This program has so many built-in deficiencies which account for the lack of takeup. It is not a practical mechanism for actually accumulating a down payment on the kind of housing available, especially in the Metro Toronto market. We feel that it is being used largely not as a way to generate savings to purchase a home, but as a tax shelter and as a way to buy into the reduced land transfer tax that is available as part of the program. For a very nominal contribution you become eligible for the reduced land transfer tax, and it is a disproportionate kind of benefit. What the program was ill designed is our main concern, and so we feel it can usefully be eliminated.

The low-rise rehab program brings us into the much larger area of discussion of how the private sector rental housing industry needs to deal with the aging housing stock. I am sure, as part of the rent control review process, those kinds of issues are going to be examined in depth, but the solution is not to have an open-ended kind of program where there are no tests as to whether the landlord has made an honest effort to maintain the housing over time and it is simply available as a grant if you want it. There have to be some kind of controls built into those programs to make sure that they are going to serve the intended purposes. Those controls simply do not exist in this program.

Mr B. Ward: And on that basis you recommend that the program be ended?

Mr Reagan: That is right.

Mr Phillips: Thank you for your presentation. I would like to get a dimension on the moneys that we should be thinking about. I think in An Agenda for People it was $190 million in year 1 and $380 million in year 2. Is that the kind of order of magnitude that we should be looking at in terms of including in our budget for your recommendation?

Mr Reagan: The figures that are associated with the Homes Now program, the 30,000-unit initiatives, when the operating subsidies involved under that program are mature, over a three- to five-year period in the case of Homes Now it will be something over $300 million a year, so for 20,000 units a year at maturity, using the Homes Now financing vehicle, we would be looking at $200,000 to $250,000 mature subsidies if the financing that was used for Homes Now is available.

In fact, we are very conscious of the very significant costs that are involved in the supply-side subsidies involved in constructing non-profit and co-operative housing and we are currently working with the provincial Minister of Housing to examine an index-linked mortgage instrument which we developed for the federal co-operative housing program, which has just completed a five-year experimental phase.

Canada Mortgage and Housing has evaluated the instrument and found it to be very successful in reducing the long-term costs of providing funding for housing, so we are recommending that it be introduced provincially. I do not have a direct comparison against the Homes Now financing, but as compared to conventional financing, Canada Mortgage and Housing found that it reduced, in net present dollar terms, the cost 20% over the life of the mortgage.

If the government were to follow through with that kind of initiative, then the annual costs would be reduced, but that is still under discussion. I would say $200 million to $250 million in that region, for operating subsidies using current program design.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to get an idea of when we reach your objectives and we look at the budget. You think it would be an additional $200 million to $250 million. Is that the way we should think about it?

Mr Reagan: Using the ministry's cost figures for Homes Now.

Ms Bethke: Yes, and in particular and I am mindful that we are talking about this current 1991-92 fiscal year, if in fact there is a provincial index-linked mortgage instrument that becomes available to use with the future provincial program, then a recalculation of what the exposure in terms of long-term subsidy dollars would be.

We would also have to take account of the extent of our zero-dollar land leases on provincial government lands, and that impact on reducing the costs. There are a variety of ways of having it impact on reducing the costs on financing this program. Certainly, the province can do a great deal about land and about the cost of the money to finance projects.

Mr Phillips: But at this stage we should be thinking about $200 million or something like that.

Mrs Sullivan: The area that I represent has had experience over the past five years in a really enormous change of community interest in providing non-profit housing and an enormous surge in co-operative housing involvement. As well, we have gone through a very trying experience in bringing government land on stream and providing an affordability component on that land in that area that happened to be located in Glen Abbey which, as you understand, was planned development, but there were certain attitudes that existed there. That was a relatively small site in terms of government land that is available. How do you define a large site? Are you talking about a 200-acre site?

Ms Bethke: Yes, we would call that large. Normally a 10-acre site, I believe, in our policy is where we would say this constitutes a large-scale site. For example, there are half a dozen sites in Metro Toronto that have been identified as sites that the Ministry of Government Services is going to release. My own organization is doing a development on the former site of the chief election office on Lombard Street, which is a half-acre site. That is the smallest of the sites.

I am not sure exactly which is the largest of the sites, but I suspect it would be the Keele-Falstaff site, the Ministry of Transportation site, near Keele and Highway 401, and that is roughly 10 acres. Obviously, not all communities would see the development of neighbourhoods, for example, like the St Lawrence, coming into their neighbourhood, that scale of non-profit housing development as being appropriate, and even in the St Lawrence there has been mixed development. There is condominium development there as well as non-profit housing development. On that large-scale a site we are not looking to create what people will rationally or irrationally perceive as ghettos. We are trying to create natural communities, and natural communities have an income mix and a wide range of income mix, not in a very narrow income band either for the very well-to-do or for the very poor.

Mrs Sullivan: It is interesting representing a riding from outside of Metro Toronto, as I think most of the people in this room do, to see the different concepts of what a large parcel of government land is in comparison with what is considered a large parcel in downtown Toronto. Land holdings in my area are in the 100-acre to 200-acre size.

One of the things that struck me this morning was the Ontario Home Builders' Association's estimate of housing starts. Their estimate was that realistically perhaps 10,000 to 15,000 units of non-profit or social housing would come on stream in the current fiscal year. The government has announced its intention to allocate 20,000 non-profit housing units. Those of us who were involved in really encouraging and working within our communities to get the Homes Now program moving ahead saw that in fact what we had anticipated occurring and hoped would occur over a very short period of time is taking a lot longer period. Are we building too many expectations in the community on the government side by saying, "Yes, we're going to have 20,000"? When do you see that delivered?

Ms Bethke: Part of this has to do with having a supply framework that can deliver those units, and 30,000 units projected to be delivered over three years would have been 10,000 units a year. I suspect that in the municipal non-profit and the co-operative sectors, we were better able to move on that. We did not have the advantage that the municipal non-profits have of land banking, for example, so I know one of the major hindrances for the co-operative movement in responding to the initial proposal call was that we did not always have land to attach to our non-profit sponsors, that we had to go out in a very hot market and try to acquire it.

As a consequence, the co-operatives did not get as large a share of the unit allocations under the Homes Now as we thought we could have reasonably expected. The minister at the time, Chaviva Hosek, said to us that the reason for this was that private non-profit groups, like church groups, came forward and surprisingly had land available. My own suspicion is that there may have been a lot of well-meaning but inexperienced sponsors who wanted to do something and, as neophytes in the housing market, had no idea how complex a process this was going to be.

I am not sure that even with the most co-operative municipal government—I use the city of Toronto as an example. We have historically seen it being favourable to the development of non-profit and co-operative housing but the planning processes in the city of Toronto are longer than anywhere else. With two- or three-year development time frames to get a shovel in the ground, that is a lot of energy for volunteers to track a process. If there is not an experienced group of people, such as I know exists in the co-operative housing resource groups across the province to assist groups in getting through that process, it does take a long time to get through. But it is fundamentally a very complicated process and the mere announcement of the program during a boom period did not give us fast-track municipal approval and did not immediately give us experienced people who could manage their non-profit projects through the process.

Mrs Sullivan: You have not particularly put any emphasis on streamlining the process, but it seems to me that the cry has been not only for the money and commitment but also a streamlined process. I assume you want to underline that again.

Ms Bethke: Yes. We made a presentation to the Ministry of Housing several years ago on how at least the administration of the Ministry of Housing could be streamlined. At the time, we were remarkably smug, because basically the ministry turned around and announced what we had suggested it do.

I do not think there is a resource group across the province that has seen any evidence of streamlining in the processes of the ministry. It has been the most galling thing for me, to have spent the energy we did in saying "This is how you could make things work easier," but to guess it is the way of bureaucracy. They were not prepared to take more of a hands-off attitude to let things move along a little more quickly. I do not know what the province can do about streamlining the municipal approval process; that is Ministry of Municipal Affairs turf. I am assuming that carrot-and-stick methods need to be used to facilitate the achievement of the provincial objectives in the housing policy statement.

Mrs Sullivan: You talked about maintaining affordability over the longer period on ownership of housing on government land. Has your organization looked at land trusts such as are used in some of the American states and in Britain?

Ms Bethke: Yes. It happens that I am the secretary of the board of directors of the Inner City Land Trust in Metro Toronto. There are currently two co-op housing land trusts, one based in Toronto, one based in Ottawa. We are currently having a major debate with the Ministry of Housing around certain fundamental issues. They are not sure the co-operative housing movement can be trusted to have a land trust, in effect to create out of our land co-operative of co-operatives so that our housing remains affordable and non-profit after the mortgages are paid off down the road.

There are many legal impediments in the incorporations of co-operatives currently and in the agreements with government, but when the agreements with government are terminated we want to see a way of maintaining that asset in a non-profit co-operative sector. The issue of land trusts has been discussed by our movement nationally for the last eight to 10 years. Finally, two land trusts have been created in Ontario and our national organization is continuing to try to develop a policy about what the ground rules for land trusts across the country would be.

At the moment they seem to be primarily a vehicle related to new housing development. When co-operatives already own their land, like any other Canadian they do not know why it should be put into a land trust. The idea of owning the land is good. We have not yet entirely sold the existing housing sector on deeding their lands to a land trust, but certainly some major work has been done so that little over 2,000 units currently of co-op housing in the Metro Toronto region are in a land trust.

Mr Christopherson: If you have already acknowledged this during your presentation, I apologize. I was trying to read it at the same time as listening; I am partially successful at that. Thank you very much for coming today. Given the time constraints we are under, I will move quickly to a question.

Under II, item 2, "Ownership housing developed on government lands must initially be affordable (as defined in the Planning Act policy statement) and measures should be taken to safeguard the long-term affordability of such housing." What type of measures did you see? Most things I have heard about so far have been a time period. The criticism of just a time period—three, five years—has been that at the end of that time period you still have the original problem and over the long term will negate the benefits of the original initiative. Did you have anything in mind? Have you thought of any mechanisms that should be looked at?

Mr Reagan: Quite frankly, we have not. We have been making exactly those kinds of points to government since the initiative around government land was introduced. There was no target for non-profit housing set on government land, simply the notion that it would be 35% affordable, all of which could be ownership housing with no built-in mechanism for guaranteeing its long-term affordability.

We are not aware of any sure-fire way of controlling speculation on ownership housing over the long term. We know that various kinds of shared-equity approaches have been introduced so that some of the gain that comes upon resale is recaptured and perhaps directed back into further development. That kind of approach might merit exploration, where if there is an increase some of it is used for social purposes.

That is exactly our concern and we are not sure there is a ready answer.

Mr Christopherson: Did you give any thought to the idea of the leasing of the land, a 99-year lease, where in effect the province still maintains control over the land and therefore can put certain attachments to it in terms of what can be done? I did not throw that out initially to see if you came back with it. That was probably the closest thing to an idea that might work that I have heard, and I wonder what your thoughts might be on that.

Mr Reagan: Leasing was our preferred model. We prefer leasing to property sector land trusts in the case of co-ops and land trusts in the case of non-profit. We were told that leasing of ownership housing was not on the table, that it would not be achieving the purposes the government had in mind in creating an ownership housing opportunity for people. I think there is some merit there, but at least in our discussions with the previous government—we have not had any discussions with the current government on this—we were told it would have to be a pure ownership model.

Mrs Sullivan: Where was that resistance from—MGS or Housing?

Mr Reagan: We have dealt with Housing on this. As you know, there is a deputy minister responsible for government lands who has been dealing with this area, and most of our dealings have been with him.

Mr Hansen: My question is sort of an answer: that the Ontario home ownership savings plan should be eliminated. It has only been in for two years. After talking to the Ontario Home Builders' Association, taking a look at people who are saving money here in Ontario to get into the private market—I know we all have interest groups. Your interest would see that this be discontinued and go into co-op housing. I am not against co-op housing. I started back in the late 1970s involved right at the very beginning in the Niagara area. It is one of the largest items down there and they want to get more into the rural areas also.

The question comes that we take this money out of the private sector and give it back as RHOSPs or, as it happened once, that you could go out and buy furnishings, and then wind up folding the plan. Do you have any thoughts on this? You said to eliminate it.

Ms Bethke: Our sense is that whenever the government—and this includes the federal government—has created home ownership schemes, if the scheme allows $5,000, $10,000, $20,000, what you have effectively done is add $5,000, $10,000, $20,000 to the price of the home. That, for us, is the fundamental difficulty. We do not believe you are reducing the cost of the housing to the first-time home buyer by creating these schemes. All you are doing is raising the ceiling of the price those people are going to have to pay. I think that is part of our very simple sentiments in the matter.

To reiterate our concern, we are very cognizant of the limited financial resources the government has. If you want to invest in housing that will remain permanently affordable, we do not know how you do that in the private ownership market where there is an opportunity for a tax-free capital gain at the end of the day.

Fundamentally, the initiatives for first-time home buyers have always been good for the initial group that has been able to buy those homes. They have won the lottery.

For everybody else, the prices of those homes have risen to market. The people who were involved in the assisted home ownership program schemes 10 to 15 years ago were able to hang on when interest rates went through the roof and their loans became due after five years when their mortgage rolled over. They are the ones who profited from that. But those homes have not remained entry-level homes after the first-time home buyer had gotten them.

We have a fundamental intellectual problem in figuring out how to solve that, because that is the way the market works. It could be that a 99-year land lease, if you could find a mortgage lender who would lend people money on that basis to finance the cost of the home—that was our understanding at some level, that leasing land and condominium ownership did not mix, that you had to have freehold title if you were going to have some kind of condominium ownership.

I think those two things are just fundamental in our attitude. I certainly recognize the desire of people to own their own home. We would like them to think about co-housing as a way of owning their own home without the opportunity for speculative gain on an investment.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming today and giving us this brief on the co-operative movement. If there are any further questions, we could perhaps talk to you a little later on?

Ms Bethke: Absolutely.

The Chair: This committee is now adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1212.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1406 in room 228.

AUTOMOTIVE PARTS
MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: I am going to include myself in this and see a quorum here. We will begin with the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association. Steve Van Houten is president and Jim Carter is the director of policy development.

Mr Van Houten: Thank you very much for the opportunity to appear before the committee and to present to you information about the state of the automotive industry in Canada as we see it, and the ways in which that bears upon or should bear upon the financial, economic and legislative planning of the Ontario government.

I have made arrangements to have a slide projector here and a screen and we are fully equipped. With your indulgence, Mr Chairman, I will use the slides as I go through the discussion. Of course, I would be pleased to entertain questions or interruptions throughout or after, as you or committee members wish.

First of all, just to size the industry for you, to profile the industry a little bit, the automotive industry in Canada is one of the very largest industries in this nation. The industry total, the vehicle sector and the parts sector together—these are 1989 vintage figures—produced approximately $43 billion worth of goods, vehicles and parts. Most of that is vehicles and about $15 billion worth of parts. Although these are national totals, approximately 90% of the production in both the parts sector and the vehicle sector in Canada is in the province of Ontario. So we are a $12-billion or $13-billion industry in this province.

You should also know that 80% or better of that production total is exported. So we are a major generator of foreign exchange, foreign currency. Almost all of our exports are to the United States. There are from time to time exports to other countries as well.

The employment figures are interesting. Direct employment of 160,000 was shown for 1989 and again 90% of that would be in the province of Ontario. That is direct employment. The spinoff impacts in sectors that produce goods that we consume or provide services that we consume etc, would be about triple that figure. Again, 90% of it would be in Ontario.

You should know, however, that it is a measure or an indicator of the way in which events are moving very rapidly in our industry that those numbers are already substantially out of date. In the parts sector alone, we have lost approximately 10,000 jobs from that figure. We are no higher than 75,000 direct jobs currently.

Mr Kwinter: Are those permanent losses?

Mr Van Houten: Almost all of them are. There will be very few that will return. Some of course are the result of plant closures, bankruptcies, companies rationalizing or constricting their production and closing down plants in Canada and Ontario as part of that kind of program. Some are layoffs of parts of the companies' employment staff in the effort to improve productivity.

Basically the trend is downward in our employment. That 85,000 figure is clearly a peak that we are unlikely to reach again for, I would say, many years, not just several years. When the shake-out that is under way currently in the industry is completed, I would guess that instead of 75,000 jobs we will be somewhere around 50,000 jobs, hopefully generating the same level of production adjusted for inflation, etc, as we have now.

In fact, as one noted industry analyst in the United States at the University of Michigan puts it: "Think of it this way: If you employ two people in your business now to generate a certain level of production, you'd better figure out how you are going over the next handful of years to generate the same level of production with one person. But do not be deceived. Your choice isn't between two or one employees, your choice is between one or zero, because if you endeavour to remain at two you will be uncompetitive and you will go broke." That is certainly a reality in our business. There is no doubt of it.

This is really where the automotive industry is located in Ontario. There is a corridor 25 miles or so either side of Highway 401 from Windsor out past Oshawa, with another branch along the Queen Elizabeth Way down towards Niagara Falls in the Niagara area, where probably 90% of that 90% of the Canadian industry in Ontario is located.

This is very clearly the industrial heartland for Ontario. It is certainly the industrial heartland for the auto parts industry and there are a number of towns, cities, communities, counties, villages and townships in that area which depend to a very high degree on automotive parts production. There are not too many cities where vehicles are assembled in quantity, although where there are there are high concentrations of vehicle assembly employment, of course. There are many communities in Ontario where parts production is located in a substantial way.

If you look at what has been happening in the market, this too is out of date. Again, for calendar year 1989 the Canadian automotive market was about a million cars—you see there 999,000 passenger cars—and about half a million trucks. The truck market has peaked out and indeed softened a little bit and the car market in fact in calendar year 1990 is down about 10% from those figures. That is a very substantial drop, very substantial indeed. I would suggest to you that it would be surprising indeed, despite what my colleagues from the vehicle sector may say to you later this afternoon, I will be mightily surprised if we return to 1989 levels of sales in 1991 or if we have any increase at all in sales in 1991 compared to 1990. We are after all in a recession.

This is a very complicated chart, but I can simplify it for you. One of the major problems we have in our industry right now is overcapacity. It is a term that people have been talking about for a number of years in the industry. It was always referred to as a threat. It is no longer a threat; it is a reality. There are about two million units of assembly capacity in North America which are not needed to satisfy current demand for motor vehicles. That is a lot of jobs and of course a lot of jobs in the parts sector that supports those two million assembly jobs that just are not necessary.

A big part of that phenomenon, the overcapacity problem, has been the advent of the transplants through the 1980s. The left-hand side of the chart summarizes the transplants in the United States. The right-hand side of the chart summarizes the transplants in Canada. If you just look at the column farthest to the right in each half of the chart, that tells you quite a lot, the column that is titled "Jobs per Hour." That is auto industry lingo; it means units of production per hour. It is not a reference to a job that a person has; it refers to the car or the truck.

Looking at the first one, 60 jobs per hour, Nissan's plant in Tennessee in the United States. That means one car or truck per minute comes out the end of the assembly plant. It does not mean it takes a minute to make a car or truck—it takes hours—but they are a minute apart on the assembly line.

The interesting point is this, and from our point of view in the parts industry a very significant point: In the Big Three plants in the United States a typical production rate would be about 60 vehicles per hour, 60 jobs an hour, or a quarter of a million vehicles a year on straight time, steady state production. A Big Three plant in Canada, the same thing, about 60 jobs an hour, sometimes more than that. It depends on the type of vehicle, how it is equipped etc. Out in Oshawa, General Motors is building trucks at 60 per hour. They have the capacity to build cars in each of their two car plants in Oshawa at over 70 jobs per hour. Those are full-sized plants in Canada.

The transplants in the United States are also full-sized plants for the most part. You see job per hour figures in and around 60 or pretty close to it, in some cases exceeding it. If you look at the transplants in Canada, a very different story is told. These are one-half, one-third or one-quarter size plants. They are not economic plants and frankly we have a major problem in trying to sell to them. In fact, we have a major problem indeed trying to sell to the transplants in the United States, because they tend to want to source very locally first before they entertain bids from foreign suppliers, i.e. Canadian suppliers.

Thinking about the Canadian transplants, think of it this way. You are a Canadian supplier. You want to bid on a part for, let's say, the first on the list, Toyota, Cambridge. You have to make investments, maybe add a new bay on the plant for the new widget you are going to make for them, reorganize your production system, tool up, buy some new equipment, train your people etc., all for 60,000 widgets per year. You are competing against the domestic supplier of Toyota in Japan who is probably making a couple of million of those widgets a year and he can make the 60,000 during lunch-hour on Friday. You are probably not going to be competitive pricewise, and very often we are not competitive pricewise.

There is an interesting phenomenon that is related to this one. The transplant assemblers have in many cases brought their domestic suppliers from Japan, primarily, to North America to accompany them and set up shop around their assembly facilities. About 400 parts companies from Japan have set up shop in the United States and only 19 in Canada.

If you look at the grey bars there, you can see there 1.7 million units of assembly capacity among the transplants in the United States and a little less than half a million in Canada, but that still means we have significantly more than our fair share of 10% of the transplant assembly investment in business. However, it is divided into too many pieces that are much too small and are not economic. We do not have 10% of the parts plants. We have 5% of the number of parts plants, but in fact those plants are on average a whole lot smaller than the average size of those 400 in the United States.

What it adds up to is that about 99% of the Japanese parts investment in production in North America has gone to the US; 1% has gone to Canada. Why? They know that those assembly plants are not economic customers and they are not going to ask their suppliers to come over and make non-economic investments in support of them.

It is a big problem for us, though.

Mr Kwinter: You have 400 parts manufacturers supplying 1.7 million.

Mr Van Houten: Right.

Mr Kwinter: On the other side, you have 19 supplying nearly half a million.

Mr Van Houten: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: Those 19 are not serving the same purpose as the 400?

Mr Van Houten: No. What happens is that when a transplant company is deciding what parts to source locally, there is kind of a natural order of things and you are getting a little bit, from my point of view, into the content question, which of course I would like to discuss.

The first thing they are going to buy locally is glass because if you ship it from Japan it will be broken by the time it gets here. The next thing you are going to buy is tires and seats because they are full of air and it costs a lot to freight them, so you are going to buy those locally.

After that, it starts to thin out really quickly. Even with the low volumes, glass, tires, seats and probably carpeting and maybe the occasional doodad, you will buy locally. Once it gets past that, the economies of scale just are not there. Those 19 parts plants in Canada are all making either very low value added components or else very freight intensive components.

With the 400 plants in the United States, you start to get into a little bit more serious value added type of production—suspension parts, steering system parts, air-conditioning system parts and the like. They are qualitatively different as well as in sizing.

Here is another thing that is going on in the parts industry and it distinguishes us very much. I must emphasize, from the vehicle industry. The yellow line shows the consumer price index. This is in the United States, by the way, but the trends would be similar in Canada. The green line shows the retail price of new cars. Those two lines interweave one another. In other words, vehicle prices have been more or less tracking CPI over the past several ears. The red line at the bottom shows parts prices. We're not making the same kinds of gains at all. We have suffered since 1982—that goes to 1988 so by 1990—more than a 15% real decline in prices compared to vehicle prices, and in fact now our prices are going down in absolute terms.

The quid pro quo of the long-term contract you get is that your price is going to go down every year in absolute terms. If you sell a part for $1 this year, you will get 97 cents for it next year and 94 cents the year after that. The vehicle company does not want to hear about your labour costs going up. They should not have gone up. They do not want to hear about your material costs going up. "That's our problem. Deal with it. Get more productive." That is the kind of pressure we are under.

The latest innovation on this, by the way, is that effective January of this year, a few weeks ago, Ford has set up a system with its suppliers throughout North America whereby in addition to the price decline that is built into your long-term contract, there is a further provision—unilaterally imposed I might add—that for every dollar you invoice them, they will pay you 99 cents. Why? Because they think it is a good idea. You do not get a choice other than to give up the business entirely.

The Chair: That is free enterprise.

Mr Stockwell: That is exactly the question I was going to put to you. It is free enterprise. Obviously if you are not making money, somebody is going to go out of business, but somebody has to be supplying that part to them at that price and still making money, so what is the point?

Mr Van Houten: Sometimes they do it and still make money. Sometimes they do not. For example, I use a different example: At General Motors right now there is a provision in its labour contract in the United States with the UAW that has bearing upon some of this. Right now GM is reintegrating. Instead of out-sourcing, they are in-sourcing. Why are they in-sourcing? Frankly, they are taking business away from Canadian independent suppliers and putting that business back into internal GM plants in the United States. Why? Two reasons: One is that those internal GM component plants in the US are underutilized in some cases. They have excess capacity so they want to fill it up. Sometimes that is an economic decision.

The major reason, though, has to do with what is called the jobs bank in the UAW contract in the United States. What it says was put into their collective agreement for the first time in 1987—maybe it was 1984; frankly, I forget which, but it is still there now. Basically it is a job security program which says that with regard to this issue the company and the union will get together, make a list of parts which are purchased from outside and consult with one another and agree on which parts should be taken away from outside suppliers and brought back in-house.

When they do that, they are in many cases actually increasing their cost. The reason they are doing it is because if they do not do it, they have to pay those UAW workers on the jobs bank anyway. Simplistically, it is like this: They make a part with $30-an-hour labour. We can do it for $15. Therefore they should out-source, right? Except that they have discovered that if they do that, in many cases they will have to pay the $30 to their internal worker in the United States anyway. So it becomes $45. They pay him the $30 to do nothing; they pay us the $15 to make the part. It is a short-sighted kind of solution and certainly a second-best solution, but they are doing it.

Mr Stockwell: That is an interesting thing you have told us. What that has to do with this, I am not sure. The question is, you are producing a product. They are buying that product. They are saying, "We're not going to pay you unless you build it for this." Somebody is supplying it to them for that price. Therefore, I assume somebody is making money.

Mr Van Houten: No. In some cases, yes. In cases where they in-source it, as I just told you, they will lose money in a lot of cases.

Mr Stockwell: So your 15% decline on billings, what has that got to do with in-sourcing? You are billing them X amount of money. You are losing 15% in the last so many years because your billings have in fact dropped.

Mr Van Houten: Correct.

Mr Stockwell: So your billings have dropped.

Mr Van Houten: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: You are still billing them, you have lost 15% and somebody is still making money.

Mr Van Houten: We are not making money. Our industry is about a break-even industry right now. The parts industry in other countries may be making some money. The Big Three in the United States, who are our customers and have contributed to our reduction in billings, if you will, may be making some money, but they are making a lot less than they were a few years ago. And they are taking some decisions which are not in their long-term economic interest. They are clearly not in our short- or long-term economic interest and that is why I raise it with you.

Mr Stockwell: Finally, then, if I assume that what you are saying is correct, in the next couple of years I should see a lot of those businesses such as yours going out of business.

Mr Van Houten: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Because they are asking you to supply it too cheaply.

Mr Van Houten: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: Then when you go out of business they will be able to find that product elsewhere at the price they want to pay.

Mr Van Houten: At least in the short term.

This is another part of our problem, the exchange rate. As I said, we export 80% of what we make. When the dollar goes up, as it has done very substantially over the last three years, that has a very direct, immediate and negative impact on our profitability. What happens is that when you sell your part, which 80% of the time you do to your US customer, he pays you in US dollars. You bring the US dollars back to your bank in Canada. When you take them to your bank, your banker converts them to Canadian before he deposits them and guess what? Your revenue is not as high as it was before the Canadian dollar appreciated. Nevertheless, we incur our costs in Canadian, and they have been increasing apace.

We did a study about a year ago of the cost-competitiveness of our industry. This chart is taken from that study. What it indicates is that for a typical steel part stamper in Canada, if at a 75-cent Canadian dollar his gross margin was 20%, it is cut in half when the dollar moves to 85 cents or 86 cents, which of course is what it has done.

Canada traditionally was by far the number one foreign source of parts for the United States. This chart is in US billions because it is looking at the situation from the American point of view, our major customer's point of view. We have been shipping them, in US dollar terms, around or about $10 billion worth of parts every year for a lot of years.

In 1989 we lost our first-rank position to Japan. A lot of those Japanese parts are coming to the United States, of course, to go into the transplant vehicles assembled in quantity in the United States.

Mexico is also a growth area on the horizon, which in the next few years, a short number of years, frankly, is going to be a very substantial and important competitor for us. They are ramping up the scale of their industry considerably in Mexico, and they are also trying to increase the value added quotient, if you will, for their industry.

Historically, and still to some degree today, if you examine the industry in value added terms, this is what you see. The really high-tech stuff, the antilock braking systems, active suspension systems and the like, tends to be manufactured in Japan, the United States and Europe. Historically, and until now, Mexico has been chiefly a source of very labour-intensive parts. Their labour, after all, costs about $2 an hour in our industry, all in, including benefits.

Canada—it overlaps with each, the up side and the down side—tends to be somewhere in the middle. We have a high percentage and high quantity of stampers, casters, plastic molders, etc.

Now, Mexico wants to move up. When they do and as they do, among the first people they bump into, primarily in the US market, will be Canadian suppliers. We have to move up too. The reason it is a pyramid is because it indicates that there is less room at the top. It is not easy to do.

Some people have the view that our industry is a rust bucket or a rust-built industry. Let me assure you that is not the case. Across the bottom is a list of many different types of computer-based technologies that are in use in our industry. The pink bars show the percentage usage of those technologies in our industry five years ago, the blue bars show the percentage usage a year ago, and as you can see, in every instance it has gone up very significantly.

Another way of expressing that is to examine our engineering expenditure as a per cent of our sales. In Canada, even compared to our competitors in the United States, through the latter part of the 1980s we increased our engineering expenditures quite significantly.

As we get into a more high-tech industry with more sophisticated technologies, we need the skills base to go with it. In 1985, a little less than two thirds of our industry was composed of unskilled workers and a little more than 10% skilled. By the mid-1990s, just a few years from now it will be about equal blocks, equal components of unskilled, semiskilled and skilled. Only one third will be skilled at that time, down by about half from where we are today.

Where do you get the people who have those skills? You sure cannot hire them. Here the bottom axis of the chart shows a variety of skilled trades and skilled occupations. The blue band shows the percentage of firms that cannot find people within at least a two-month period to fill roles in things like the mechanical trades, engineering trades, foundry workers, millwrights etc. Just looking at the first one, mechanical skilled trades, more than half the people in our industry right now, our companies, take at least two months to find a skilled tradesman in that area and another 10%, 15% or 20% take at least two weeks or two months to find somebody with that type of skill.

Mr Fletcher: What is your industry doing to get more skilled people into the workforce? What apprenticeship programs do you have?

Mr Van Houten: It is a big problem that is being addressed in a variety of ways. Until recently we were able in some cases to get people from overseas, from western or eastern Europe, to fill some of these jobs. You cannot really do that any more, at least not from western Europe because our standard of living is not relatively a whole lot more attractive than theirs. They do not feel a great desire to come to the promised land of Canada any longer. So that is a problem. A solution that used to be available to us really is not any longer in a practical sense.

Training of our existing workforce is and has to be a very major piece of the solution for us. Our workforce after all, in total terms is declining in size. On a net basis we are shedding people, not hiring people, and even in absolute terms we are not hiring a whole lot of people. So really it has to be training from within.

Mr Fletcher: I realize that.

Mr Van Houten: That is a major initiative for us.

Mr Fletcher: You have told me what the problem is again and my question was, what has your industry done to try to fix the problem?

Mr Van Houten: I believe I told you two things that we have done. One is to bring workers from overseas. That is a solution but it has gone away. Another solution is to train. That is something we are doing and trying to do more of. In fact, we are in discussion and negotiation with the Ministry of Skills Development, Ontario, and Canada Employment and Immigration with regard to new sectorally based training programs.

Mr Fletcher: I realize that also. Twenty years ago we knew the problem was that there was a shortage of skilled workers, and we have always been going to Europe. Yet industry—even now—did not 20 years ago start implementing programs so that we would not be in the situation we are in now. You missed the boat when it came to trying to train the available workforce we had.

Mr Van Houten: You may well be right. I decline to apologize for misjudgements that may have taken place 20 years ago.

Mr Fletcher: I am not looking for apologies.

Mr Van Houten: I was not working in the industry at that time. However, this is 1991. We still have a 75,000-person industry. We would like to keep it as high as we can and be as competitive as we can and we are doing things now and in the future to ensure that we maintain a strong and competitive industry in Canada and in this province, with some difficulty, I must confess.

Mr Jamison: What you are saying is that you are willing to work with various partners as far as skills development is concerned at this point, recognizing the ongoing need.

Mr Van Houten: We are willing to and in fact we are doing it. We would like to do more. When you are a non-profit industry, which is what we are, and you are in the competitive battle of your life, which we are—and this recession for us is a lot different from the one 10 years ago, which was really a declining demand-based recession; this is a restructuring recession, at least in our industry—there is not a lot of money to spread around. We are going to have some companies die because they have great intentions, great plans and no cash to deliver.

Mr Kwinter: Just to comment on that, and you can correct me, I do not know the exact status recently, but Magna, which is the largest auto parts producer in Canada, had its own school and I think it has closed it down.

Mr Van Houten: Yes, they have. In fact, we looked at trying to take it over on an industry basis, in co-operation with a couple of government agencies. The timing did not fit and we failed to do it. I wish we had. We are still working on comparable initiatives and hope to bring something to fruition, and in fact expect to this year. But yes, they did have one and they closed it down. It was a great facility. It is too bad they did it. Why did they close it down? They did not have any money. They could not afford it.

Mr Kwinter: There is one other problem and that problem is that companies like Magna, Devtek and some of the others go to the trouble of training people and as soon as they get trained they go somewhere else because they now have a marketable skill. Once they have it they can take it and shop around. That is another problem. How do you deal with that, I do not know.

Mr Van Houten: No question. In fact, that is a direct result of this shortage. When you have that kind of difficulty in hiring people, it takes you two months to find somebody who has any skill. Then you want to enhance it further, but for another 50 cents or $1.50 an hour you can get another job really easily down the street. A lot of poaching, as it is called, does in fact take place.

Mr Fletcher: If we trained our medical staff or our doctors the same way that industry is training for the future we would be in a lot of trouble with skilled people to take care of our medical profession. I think that industry has been over the years—and I do not mean just over the last 20 years, but before that they were saying, "What we need are more skilled workers, more skilled people to do the job," and they did not get involved then, and now again I hear the same story. I am hearing it every 10 years, the same story, "What we need are skilled people." Yet industry is not pitching in to try to get people. No matter what Magna did as far as one company, it has to be a corporate decision and it has to go across the whole spectrum of industry, not just in the auto parts programs.

Mr Van Houten: I do not disagree with you. You are absolutely right. I would not argue that we have done everything that we should have done; we have not. Again, with all due respect, I think the educational system has some responsibility to bear for this. In fact, for example, in dealing with the Canadian Auto Workers and Skills Development and the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission and so on with regard to specific training initiative for our industry right now, one of the key questions is whether or not we should be targeting it at things like literacy skills, numeracy skills, reading and writing. With all due respect, if we have to design a training program that is targeted at that, then that tells me the educational system has made a major mistake, has failed to discharge its responsibility, because I do not believe or accept that it is the business community's responsibility to redo grade 8 or 10 or whatever it may be because it was fumbled in high school.

Mr Fletcher: I would tend to disagree with you on the education system because I know the education system is second to none, as far as I am concerned personally. Coming from an educational background, I know what the education system is doing. As far as trying to help out the business community, there are many boards throughout Ontario that already have implemented apprenticeship programs which go through the system.

Mr Van Houten: Yes, I agree. I understand that.

Mr Fletcher: Now, I think it is partly industry's turn to start taking the ball from there. There has to be a partnership, but not everyone who comes out of our educational system is illiterate.

Mr Van Houten: We have a lot of people who do not know how to read and write or count, unfortunately, so I am afraid I have to disagree with you.

The Chair: Could we move along with the presentation, because we are running out of time and I would like to get to the end of that.

Mr Van Houten: Okay. A lot of other problems and issues and pressures are afoot in our industry. Another source of fresh cost for the parts industry—I will only look at one halfway down the left-hand side: black-box capability. It used to be that the car company would deliver to you a set of blueprints and specifications and ask you to quote the part, how much per part for, say, half a million a year. Black-box capability—that is something a supplier now has to have—means that the car company comes and says: “Look, I want you to provide me with an air-conditioning system, about two and a half pounds, delivering so many BTUs of air-conditioning power for a car of such and such a size. Go away and design it, engineer it, prototype it, validate it, test it. Then, by the way, quote it. If I decide to give you the business, then you can make me half a million a year at the new improved declining schedule of prices which I may decide unilaterally to take down further.” The point is that it is tough to make a buck in our industry and it is tough to stay alive in our industry in Canada right now.

We need to be competitive. What does that mean? It means we have to be good, a lot better than we are, at creating and applying and protecting new technology in Canada. I would say in our industry we are mediocre and not better on average at that.

We need a strong supply of low-cost capital. We do not have any low-cost capital in Canada for our industry. We need a skilled, flexible and motivated workforce. Again, we are probably okay, but that is not good enough. Trade needs to be a national priority. I think it is in our industry. We export 80% of what we make. Trade policy needs to be a national priority for us and I do not think it is.

A few indicators of competitiveness: You could draw up many lists and the story would probably not vary a whole lot. Corporate income taxes: In Ontario we are about as good as the traditional US jurisdictions, slightly worse. Personal taxes on management are a whole lot higher in Canada than they are in the United States. Our wages in Canada are higher than they are in the United States by a significant amount. We are the high-cost jurisdiction here in Ontario as far as wages are concerned. That is partly offset by the fact that social costs are a little bit less expensive in Canada for the company than they are in the United States because the government picks up more of the tab, if you will, but that in turn rebounds back into personal income taxes.

When you look at that chart, the only area where Canada is appreciably ahead of the United States is in social costs. In other words, we lost three and won one. That tends to be the case in most charts of indicators that tend to be used in our business.

The Chair: Are those all quoted in American dollars?

Mr Van Houten: No, those were all Canadian dollars.

Mr B. Ward: I have a question. Are we going to flow through and then ask questions or are we going to ask questions as we go along?

The Chair: Sorry, you are right. I just needed a clarification on that.

Mr Van Houten: Shall I stop or go ahead?

The Chair: How much do you have left?

Mr Van Houten: Not too much.

The Chair: Okay, if you could finish and then we will have a few minutes for questions.

Mr Van Houten: This chart indicates relative changes in manufacturing labour productivity, output per person, zeroed on the US, the US remaining constant at 100 since 1951. For many years Canada had the second highest degree of productivity in industry among the G-7 countries. We lost that status in the mid-1970s. We are now in fifth place, with the US still at the top, so our labour cost is the highest. Our productivity is fifth best. It used to be better. It has been declining in real terms since.

Manufacturing unit labour cost performance: Labour cost performance means that the lower your performance, the higher your costs. Again, compared to the other G-7 countries, Canada has had a labour cost deterioration. In other words, our cost has increased relative to our major competing industrial nations.

This is a difficult chart to read. It makes, I think, a simple point. Across the bottom are many, many areas which impact directly or indirectly on our competitiveness: everything from wages to pension costs to legislation in areas such as pay and employment equity, environmental regulation, things like exchange rates, interest rates and so on and so forth. The point is this. Using any of the bands, say the orange band, one jurisdiction might decide “All right, we’re going to be high wage and high pension and related costs. We’re going to have to make up for that in order to be competitive by being lower than average in some other areas. The green jurisdiction—I cannot read from here exactly; maybe that is California—has decided that it is going to have very stringent environmental regulations. But if they are, then if they are going to be competitive overall they have to make up for it in some other way.”

I get the feeling that in Ontario we are trying to be in the reddish-coloured band across the top. We want to be a leader in everything. We want to have indexed pensions when no other industrial jurisdiction with which we compete in North America has that. We want to have pay equity when nobody else has it. We want to have very stringent environmental regulations. We want to have very stringent health-care regulations. We want to have high wages and we do have high taxes. Our interest rate is high and our exchange rate is unfavourable. You cannot be a leader in all of these fields on a sustainable basis. It is not possible and it will not take place. We are shedding jobs as a consequence.

All right. This is the last chart I have, Mr Chairman. There are a number of things that I think our industry needs to remain competitive. Not very many of them cost very much money. With regard to people, we do need assistance, I think, with training. That means we need financial assistance from government because we do not have enough money to do everything we need to do.

We also need a good integrated program, which we are in the course of developing with government and with the labour movement. I think our educational system does not yet have a sufficiently technical focus. We need to increase the supply, in other words, of people who have the kinds of skills that industry is going to require over the next many years.

Flexibility: That is an item I have not talked about in this presentation, but it is something which we need desperately and which we lack. When the CAW, for example, issues a policy statement, which it did a year ago, ying that team concepts and quality circles and the like e bad because they are instruments of management propaganda and are against workers' interests, that is desperately bad news for our industry. It is absolutely the wrong way to go. If we are not going to make our labour force productivity quotient higher in terms of the price of labour or hour, we have to get better in terms of flexibility. We e nowhere near where we need to be.

Technology: Yes, we need a greater focus on that. I ould say that with the federal government, we have been successful in rearranging and in some cases liberalizing e system of R and D tax credits as they apply to our industry. That is good.

With regard to trade policy, I think we need to change e North American content requirement in the free trade agreement. The former provincial government in Ontario agreed with that position. I should say that all of the major constituencies in the industry in both countries agree with at position with two exceptions. One is the group of companies which own transplant firms in Canada—not ose in the United States that I am aware of—and the other is the federal government of Canada, which obviously is hewing to the interests of the companies that own ansplant assembly operations in this country. We think at is a mistake. We are not competitive with the Canadian dollar at the level it is when we have the other elements in our cost profile at the level they are at.

With regard to our social policy, frankly we cannot afford the social packages and regulatory packages that we are burdened with right now. I fear that our province and our country are on the course of embedding an entitlement mentality, if you will, that is going to ensure that we are permanently uncompetitive with countries with which we must compete and do compete every day, and we are losing a lot more than we are winning.

With regard to the finances of the province, the reason I think much of this has some relevance for you is that our industry, employing the number of people it does, generating the revenues, taxes and foreign exchange that it does, is under severe pressure, is losing ground a lot faster than is gaining ground and is not going to be the strong source of employment and production and technology in the future it has been in the past unless some changes are made.

That is the end of the presentation. I will be happy to take any questions or comments.

Mr B. Ward: I would like to thank you for the fine presentation from your association's perspective on the ramifications of this year's budget on your industry.

Just a quick question. You mentioned the lack of skills in our labour force. I concur that we do have a long way to go. As parliamentary assistant in Skills Development, I am very interested in promoting that aspect where we have a highly skilled workforce. The only problem is, how do we get from where we are to where the future should be?

Mr Van Houten: Correct.

Mr B. Ward: It was through the work of the previous liberal government that we signed a sectoral agreement with the electronics industry, which I think is a major achievement. It is one of the few times where the industries and the organized agents who represent labour as well as government have managed to agree that there is a problem, let's work together and solve it.

Do you feel there is that level of trust in your industry as there is in the electronics industry between the industries and the organizations that represent the workers so that we can achieve this type of agreement? I know we are working towards it. The concern I have here is that level of trust.

Mr Van Houten: I cannot evaluate the question about the comparison of the level of trust. There is sufficient trust that we are in fact working together in the development of a program that I think will be similar in structure to the electrical industry one, that I hope will be at least as effective as the electrical industry one. The proof ultimately will be in the pudding, I suppose, but I am confident that we will do it successfully. My colleagues at the Canadian Auto Workers share that confidence, I believe. We have had a number of discussions with them. As I say, we hope to have something in place in calendar 1991 along the lines of what was done in the electrical industry.

Mr B. Ward: What can I say? That should have an immediate or short-term influence on upgrading the skills level as well as working with labour, government and business towards an overall, long-term strategy of upgrading our skills.

Mr Van Houten: Yes. That does not mean we do not have a long-term supply problem, because we do.

Mr Stockwell: We were reasonably competitive in the early 1980s, it seems to me.

Mr Van Houten: Yes, I agree with you.

Mr Stockwell: Now we are in the early 1990s, and you are telling us we are not competitive. It seems that is the bottom line.

Mr Van Houten: That is right.

Mr Stockwell: I am not disagreeing with you. I do not think we are competitive either, frankly. The question I have is, how did it happen? Did we lose our competitive edge or did everyone else simply become more competitive, or is it maybe a combination of both?

Mr Van Houten: It think it is both.

Mr Stockwell: In fact we have suffered through a process that has cut through our competitive edge, and everyone else has decided to get in the ball game and has become more competitive. It is just that simple?

Mr Van Houten: No question, yes, it is just that simple. We have lost our competitive edge in a couple of ways. One has to do with the dollar. Frankly, when we had a 72-cent dollar, we were banging out parts like crazy and having fun and making a lot of money doing it. It was not difficult, in fact it was easy to turn to our workforces—which, by the way, had made concessions and the like and had gone through some tough times in the very early 1980s—it was easy in the mid-1980s to turn to them and say: "All right. You are asking us to share the wealth? We will." Our labour costs increased significantly.

Frankly, when boom times are on, governments begin to think, "Now is probably a pretty good time to think about implementing some new social programs," which the economy can afford to bear and to provide. That is all great. But when the dollar goes up, demand goes down. Other new competitors with some pretty impressive capabilities make their presence felt. That begins to look like a house of cards that you have built. Your competitive profile deteriorates. That has certainly happened.

Mr Stockwell: One quick point. I agree it is a house of cards. To a great extent, that is what it has been built on through the 1980s, a house of cards. What if the dollar just jammed back four, five, six cents tomorrow? If the dollar jammed back four, five, six cents, would you be immediately competitive?

Mr Van Houten: No. If the dollar does back up four, five, six cents, that does not mean that we instantly have black box capability, which we do not have enough of, and until quite recently were not asked or required to offer. Neither does it mean that all of a sudden there are a couple hundred thousand new tool and die makers available to us. Those guys are not there. Yes, it would help, but it is only part of the solution.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation.

Mr Van Houten: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman, for your time and that of the committee.

ONTARIO TRUCKING ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Trucking Association; Raymond Cope, president. You may begin.

Mr Cope: Thank you, Chairman. My name is Raymond Cope. I am president of the Ontario Trucking Association. I have with me today David Bradley, who is vice-president and general manager of the association. He is president-designate. He will succeed me in the month of June. With us is John Sanderson, a vice-president of CP Trucks.

We are here today to talk to the submission we have made to this committee. I take it that copies of this submission have been circulated to members of the committee. We are not going to go through it page by page, but we are going to talk about the issues and their overall basis.

Right now, the trucking industry in Ontario is hurting, hurting very badly. A couple of years ago we undertook a study of the trucking industry and we found out a number of things, some of which are referred to in this brief. It showed how important the industry was to the province of Ontario. It revealed to us that there is a workforce in the trucking industry numbering some 230,000 and that generally it was an important cog in the Ontario wheel.

We do not have 230,000 employees in the trucking industry any more. We are losing jobs at a fairly large rate. We have not got the exact count for the past year, but we feel that the number is something over 5,000 jobs which have been lost. They have been lost basically in the transport or trucking sector and lost to competition with American carriers who have sizeable advantages over Canadian carriers in terms of costs.

The American carriers have lower equipment costs, lower interest costs, lower labour costs. They have better depreciation rate schedules. They have lower fuel costs. Right across the board, they have an advantage, and when we sum those figures, we find that the American trucking industry has a 15% to 20% cost advantage to Canadian carriers.

Of course, with the deregulation that came into the province two years ago and at the federal level three years ago—and we are not here to protest deregulation any more; we fought that battle and lost—one of the things that was clear is that those who put the deregulation package together did not really build the economic safety nets that were going to be required by a trucking industry as it came face to face with the increasing competition. Thus it is in the transport or trucking industry where at one time Ontario carriers were a majority, we are no longer the majority in terms of the trucks moving across the border. The majority has swung clearly to the advantage of the Americans, and that is growing day by day.

In the trucking industry in Ontario, the response to this has been for companies to try to improve their productivity and they worked very hard at that. But to overcome a 15 to 20% cost disadvantage is a serious challenge indeed. What we find today is more and more Canadian companies are becoming American companies. Companies are either moving south of the border or they are developing subsidiaries south of the border and operating the service from American points.

This is not one or two companies. We have a whole host of companies that have done this. We can think of Canada Transport in Belleville that is moving progressively south of the border. We can look at Frederick Transport down in Dundas. We can look at Bill Thompson in Thomas. CP Trucks have been putting more and more of their faith into CP America because they can operate from a lower cost base.

These are factors that we think are important not only to the trucking industry but to the provincial economy. The trucking industry has contributed in an important way to the economy, and now its chance to do that is being eroded by this competition. We are looking and we have been before the provincial government, both the previous government and the current government, to draw their attention to this phenomenon and point to things that we think they can do and they should do to assist the industry in offsetting this American cost advantage.

Things we have pointed to, as are revealed in this green book, we have asked for a temporary reduction in fuel tax of a cent a litre, we have asked for the removal of the sales tax on equipment and labour, at least for a period of time. We have asked at the federal level and we have asked the provincial government to assist us at the federal level in securing removal of the four-cent-a-litre excise tax on fuel and we have asked them for assistance in getting a depreciation rate schedule, capital cost allowances equivalent to Americans.

All of these things now are under active study. There are seven different studies going on at the federal level in the trucking industry, and there is one study being undertaken here at the provincial level. We expect that we are going to start seeing some of the results of those studies soon. The majority of the studies, though, will not be complete until the summer, and by the summer more companies will have gone. A company we just heard from the other day, which has been a major name in the province of Ontario, Laidlaw Carriers, has indicated that it is placing bets on developing its operation from the American side.

So all of this is going on and is to some extent irreversible, but there are still companies that are in the process of making up their minds. A lot of companies in the industry could go out of business today if they could but they find they cannot sell their equipment. Nobody wants to buy their equipment.

Combined with the deregulation phenomena and the increased competition phenomena we have the recession phenomena. We go through these from time to time and we expect that we will come out of this one, but when you combine the three of them together, you have an excess supply and a reduced demand. When you have excess supply and reduced demand for services, the prices go down, and if the prices go down, your profits go down.

The average trucking company in Ontario is losing money today. Most trucking companies are losing money and, as I say, a lot of them would like to go out of business if they could sell their equipment.

We have set forth in this brief some of the things that we would like this committee to focus on in terms of the things that government should do if it wants to maintain the trucking industry in the province of Ontario.

We have talked about the tax measures that I have already mentioned. We have also pointed to what we call compensation for loss of value of operating authorities. That is a situation brought about by the fact that a lot of companies that are in the business today have on their books authorities, licences, which they purchased by buying up other companies in days gone by to get the access to the routes that those authorities would convey to them. They might have paid $300,000, $400,000, $500,000 for a licence, and that had value. When you went to the bank, you could borrow money against the value of that asset. But with deregulation, those assets became worthless and the bankers said, "Hey, you don't have anything now to secure any loan that you are asking for."

We have suggested both to the federal government and the provincial government over the past two or three years that they do the same thing in Canada they did in the United States when they deregulated. When they deregulated, they compensated the carriers for the loss of value of their operating authorities. They allowed the carriers to write off their losses against income tax otherwise payable over a five-year period. We thought that seemed to be a reasonably good formula and we have recommended that that get consideration here.

We have brought that argument before the federal government in connection with the deregulation that they gave rise to, and you should understand—and I imagine there are some people who are new to the committee—the trucking industry is made up of carriers that are federally regulated. Those who operate across borders are federally regulated; those who operate solely within the province of Ontario are provincially regulated. You have the federal rules applying to one group of carriers and the provincial rules applying to another group of carriers.

There were carriers who were deregulated provincially and carriers who were deregulated federally, but in both cases they lost the value of their operating authorities through deregulation. We have looked at both levels of government to bring forward some compensation scheme. Thus far, we have not been able to secure that objective, although both the Treasury people and the Transportation people have shown some interest in the argument.

But a lot of carriers, the small carrier, the small family-owned company, has looked at those operating authority values as their pension, just as taxi drivers who operate in the city of Toronto look at their licences as their pension. When they come to the day that they can no longer operate their service and they sell their licence, it provides them their pension. It is the same thing in the trucking industry. That is gone.

We point in our brief to other things that we feel you should be aware of. We talk about the railway tax lobby. The railways are in bad shape, in as bad a shape as the trucking industry, and they have been trying to retrench, reduce their costs and improve their marketing capability. Part of their plan, though, is focused on trying to jack up taxes on the trucking industry. We think the arguments they brought forward do not prove the point. Even their own studies show they would have to triple the taxes on the trucking industry to even come close to bringing about a diversion of freight back to the railways.

When you look at the fact that something like 90% of the freight carried by the trucking industry is not divertible, if you increase the taxes on the trucking industry the only thing you are doing is increasing the cost to the shippers and manufacturers and the cost to consumers. In a North American free trade market, that would certainly be disadvantageous for Ontario.

We talked about highway infrastructure. Ontario at one time was a leader in roads and highway development and had a fine network of roads and highways. This was certainly true in the period 1960 through to 1975. People from all over the world would come here to see how we had created and sustained such a fine network of roads and highways. Back in the early 1970s, the amount of money put into highways and roads started declining and it stayed that way for about 15 years. It was only in 1988 that the previous government decided, "Hey, the congestion problems out in the roads are growing"—there were problems of maintenance, the infrastructure—and started to put some money back into it. We only hope the current government sees fit to give high priority to highway development because it is badly needed. One only has to travel on any of the major routes in the province to see that there is a need for additional capacity or a need for improvements.

Environment is a high priority with the new government, and we share the views of society in general that improvements have to be made in the environment. John Sanderson, who is to my right, has been leading a team within the trucking industry to map out a program where the trucking industry can fully contribute to the improvement of the environment. I am sure he will be glad to respond to questions on that, but it comes to the point where the question is: How do you fund all of these environmental programs?

Some people started talking about carbon fuel taxes. We have cautioned them in terms of determining the kind of programs that achieve their objectives. Just to increase taxes on fuels, for example, is not necessarily going to clean up the contribution the trucking industry made to air pollution. The program should be directed towards the fuel itself and to the equipment that is used to burn those fuels.

We also pointed out in our brief that we saw where the current government felt a need to provide $5 million of financial assistance to the Algoma Central Railway because they wanted to protect 400 jobs in the railway industry. We had to point out to the government that if you are going to start protecting transportation jobs, a trucking job is just as important as a railway job. We have lost, as I said at the outset, over 5,000 jobs in this past year, and we have been looking for government programs that might stem that tide. We recommend to government that when it comes forward with programs of assistance or subsidies to the transportation industry, it does not look at it just one mode at a time: Look at it across all of the modes to see how they interrelate and how they combine to serve Ontario.

These are the opening remarks I wanted to make. As I say, the important thing for the trucking industry is some kind of action now. Without action the trucking industry is going downhill very quickly. A lot of companies are going out of business. I was looking at a list the other day of the 20 biggest trucking companies in Ontario in 1979, and out of those 20 companies, 12 are gone. I project that by the year 2000, out of that list of 20, 17 will have gone; that is the rate of attrition of companies in a very, very competitive world.

The trucking industry has always been competitive. We do not back away from competition as long as we are playing on a level playing field. But the Americans, in the case of the transporter trucking market—and they are making inroads even into the intraprovincial services in Ontario—have these advantages that somehow have to be put right if the Canadian industry is going to survive.

Mr Hansen: I was in the trucking industry myself quite a few years ago, and I had the same problems with insurance and fuel costs and cost of equipment. It is something that is really affected, especially with the deregulation now in Ontario. I take it, and I have not been in that industry for a while, that you lost your so-called milk runs, is that not correct?

Mr Cope: We have lost a lot.

Mr Hansen: I am talking about the main, profitable runs. In some places in the north you still need trucking but they are mainly concentrated down in the southern part of Ontario; coming in from the states, fueling in the states without having to fuel here in Ontario, and going back across the border. This is what I can see is a big problem. In Quebec, if I am not mistaken, you show a fuel bill for how much fuel was purchased in Quebec to run in Quebec.

We are listening here. You have some ideas down here. I do not know whether they would help in the short term; it says each one is temporary. I do not know if you have some other ideas not in here. I have not been able to see the whole thing; maybe you can relate to us some of the other points.

Mr Cope: We have proposed to the Minister of Transportation that he give consideration to putting a moratorium on the issuance of licences. Deregulation has given everybody a chance to get licences to where they want to operate, within Ontario, or across from Ontario to another province or to the United States. That has been going on. There have been a lot of licences handed out in the last couple of years, probably more in the last two years than in the decade previous to that.

This increase in competition has really come so fast that very few companies have been able to digest it. As I say, the average trucking company today is losing money. Some of them are going out of business and others are just living as long as the bank keeps them in there. We have asked the minister to look at introducing a moratorium to freeze the licence situation for two years, let the economy catch up with the capacity that is now out in the marketplace. The capacity is huge and there is no shortage of competition. Any shipper in the province can get no end of quotes to provide the service he is capable of providing.

Mr B. Ward: I do not know if you can answer that. You may have the stats in front of you. Since the province went down the road of deregulation, how many trucking companies that were based in Ontario have disappeared? Do you have the ballpark figure?

Mr Cope: The best we can say is that it is dozing. Any of the major transporter carriers will have shifted or part of their operations to the states. If you look at bankruptcies, which are only part of the picture, for instance, in the first 11 months of last year bankruptcies were up 132% over all of 1989. We see that acceleration now that we are mired deep in a recession.

Mr B. Ward: You feel in the short term that if a moratorium is placed perhaps the trucking companies that are on the border may survive or at least give them one aspect of survivability?

Mr Bradley: It will provide some breathing space, but I think a lot more needs to be done. The reason we have characterized the tax measures we are talking about as temporary is because we see that if, after a certain period we are able to introduce other programs and make other adjustments as the market settles, then perhaps we can start to lift those off or do other things. The new Ontario government has embarked on, as Mr Cope has mentioned, major study of operating costs and the tax competitiveness of our industry. It is hoped that arising out of that we can start to seek some meaningful longer-term solutions. They may not all be tax measures. There may be some programs in terms of enhancing productivity or what not.

But the fact is, we cannot wait until next June or July when the studies are done, because at that point the patient will be dead.

Mr Kwinter: I want to follow up on that same thought. You tell me that of the 20 top companies 12 have gone, and you figure that by the year 2000, 17 of them are going to be gone. Is that all through attrition or are there some consolidations taking place?

Mr Cope: A lot of them are through mergers. Some companies merge because it is a meaningful fit between their root structures and it makes sense to do that. Some companies merge because they are on the slippery slope to bankruptcy, and to merge with another company that has some deeper capital reserves can maintain that relationship. The list I am talking about is made up a lot of companies that have merged. There is a great number of them. DNT took over Dominion Consolidated a few years ago; Dominion Consolidated was a big company, it was on that list. Reimer purchased Inter-City; Inter-City was on that list. The Motorways organization acquired Direct Transport, which was on that list; it has acquired Kingsway, which was on that list; it absorbed Consolidated Fast Freight, which was on that list. So a lot of that has been through mergers. Another one I would mention is that Hengerry absorbed Thibodeau-Finch. That is where these major companies are mainly exiting.

Mr Bradley: But it is not just the majors. Look at the family owned establishments. Just in the past year we have seen Hendrie Transportation in Brampton sold out; Cronkwright Transport in Simcoe sold out; Corneil Transport in eastern Ontario sold out to Canada Transport. We are seeing, I think, much the same situation we saw with the family farm. The family trucking firms are getting out of business or trying to get out of business. The sad part of it is that a lot of our members would like to get out. They are holding auctions on their equipment and nobody shows up to buy it, and they have no choice but to stay in business. They are watching their retirement just vanish before their eyes.

Mr Fletcher: Two quick points. The safety of the vehicles on the road is a major concern to a lot of people, especially driving along the 401 or any other busy highway; and also the amount of environmental impact. I understand have some things you are working on. We can work together to alleviate these problems.

Mr Cope: I think Mr Sanderson can respond to that.

Mr Sanderson: In the area of environment, this has in the last six months or so become a major interest of the industry in terms of perceptions about trucking and what it does to the environment. We have been working to adopt an environmental code of practice for the trucking industry that deals with the areas of energy conservation, with effective waste management, with environmental preservation in general, as well as safety, which is tied into our environmental program. We have been holding meetings, not just within the industry but with environmental groups in Ontario, in Toronto particularly, and are now beginning to look for meetings with the government to deal in the whole area of environmental practice.

In the area of safety, we have in the last couple of years worked with both federal and provincial governments to establish a very substantial safety system that deals with driver training, hours of service, equipment maintenance, general equipment practices. We believe that in general we have a much stronger basis for safety in the industry now than we have ever had before.

Increasingly, there is a serious question about whether all of us can continue to maintain those safety programs, whether we can in fact live within those standards we have all developed and ascribed to, because our financial situation is deteriorating very rapidly in the trucking industry. We are probably the largest carrier in the province at the moment, but our volumes are slipping, we are losing business to American-based carriers. Our profitability has slipped from a 1.5% loss in 1989 to a 3.5% loss in 1990, and that is a very substantial sum. We just cannot carry on on that basis.

The safety question is very vital, as is our ability to implement the environmental things we want to do. We have provided many ministries, particularly Transportation, with options that would improve our productivity and our profitability without direct tax relief or government money assisting the industry, and we are very hopeful that some of those will be implemented. Environmental changes are one of the major areas.

The Chair: I am going to be a little arbitrary here. I am sorry to have to cut off the questioning at this point. These are very good questions, but our delegations are starting to back up. It is beginning to look like Pearson International Airport. I would like to thank you for coming with your presentation and your handouts and say that your concerns will be noted and looked into. Perhaps if others have questions they could mail the questions to you or phone you and have their questions answered.

PHARMACEUTICAL MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The Chair: The next presentation is the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada, the Honourable Judy Erola, president.

Hon Mrs Erola: Good afternoon, and a special hello to some of the familiar faces on the committee. It is good to see you. We are pleased that you have offered this opportunity to present our views in this committee.

With me today is Gordon Postlewaite, who is our director of scientific research at the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association; Jacques Lapointe, who is the chief executive officer of Glaxo, located here in Ontario, and chairman of our Ontario committee; and John Pye, who is our director of public affairs. We will try to skim through our opening remarks very quickly in order that we have some time for questions.

The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association represents 66 of the research-based companies of varying sizes engaged in research, development, production, marketing and servicing of original, brand name, pharmaceutical products. Forty-one of these companies are based in Ontario, employing 10,500 highly skilled workers. We contribute an estimated $1 billion annually to the Ontario economy, according to Statistics Canada. A 1989 PMAC survey showed that 29 of these Ontario-based companies reported $1.5 billion in assets, almost $100 million incurred in income taxes against sales of $606 million in Ontario and $895 million in the rest of Canada, so I would say that Ontario is the most direct beneficiary in terms of the research-based pharmaceutical industry.

We are very proud of our contributions to Canadian health care. The dramatic declines in mortality and morbidity statistics in the past few decades are due, in part, to the availability of new and effective drug therapies brought on to the market by our industry. For example, new medicines have helped to reduce death from strokes by 40% and death from heart attacks by 25% in the last decade alone.

Data from the Department of National Health and Welfare on approvals of new chemical entities between 1985 and 1989 demonstrate that over 90% of all new medicines were developed on a global basis by members of PMAC, and we have an appendix which shows this.

Quite apart from the incalculable people benefit of these therapies, they have made a significant contribution to the bottom line of Canadian health care. Numerous studies have documented the relative advantage of drug therapies compared to surgical and chronic care alternatives which take up a substantially larger share of Ontario's health bill, as you are well aware.

Even though medicine is increasingly more able to meet the health care needs of the public, per capita annual increases in health care costs have not increased substantially. Canadian health care expenditures, as a percentage of gross national product, have increased by only 1.5% over the past 10 years. I think that is a very important statistic to bear in mind. However, we do realize that the public's increasing demand for medical service is placing an upward pressure on the health budgets of all provinces and of Ontario in particular.

We have noted the concerns of Dr Martin Barkin, Ontario Deputy Minister of Health, as recorded in the 1989-90 annual report, that it is estimated that health will take up more than half the province's budget by the turn of the century. He further commented that Ontario cannot continue the spending pattern that has emerged in the last 10 years in health care spending.

In this presentation we will focus principally on that portion of the budget which pertains to the Ontario drug benefit plan, which we will refer to by ODB from here on in. In fiscal year 1989-90, $647 million was expended on the ODB. This constitutes 4.6% of the $14 billion spent by the Ministry of Health. When pharmacists' dispensing fees are extracted from the ODB costs, the actual cost of the medicines goes down to $446 million. This is 3.2% of the Ministry of Health budget or 0.18% of the provincial gross domestic product, which we explain because a relatively small amount is really the bottom line, given the significant therapeutic benefits and cost-effectiveness of modern medicines.

It is, however, the case that the costs for the ODB program have increased by 64% between 1985-86 and 1989-90. According to the Ministry of Health data, the cost of actual drug products has increased 68%, while pharmacists' dispensing fees have increased 55% in the five-year period. But it is very important to note that the cost of drug products to the ODB program is not the manufacturers' selling price. For one thing, there is a 10% upcharge payable to pharmacists on top of the manufacturers' selling price. I think that we have to balance these out when we look at gross figures and when we begin to analyse those figures and where the actual money is spent.

It is also important for us to come to terms with the growth and the costs of actual drug products in this period. In the first place, there has been a 22% increase in the number of claims in the ODB program, reflecting the increased demand on the system. Price increases would make up some of the difference, approximately 46% growth over four years or almost 12% per year. Again, this includes a 10% upcharge.

This increase occurred, we should point out, when there was a 50% increase in the use of generic products in the ODB in this period. The substantial increase in the use of generics was substantially brought about by the passage of the Ontario Drug Benefit Act at the end of 1986, though it should be noted that the generic sector since 1969 was also benefiting from the absence of any effective intellectual property patent protection of brand name products.

The ODB program uses a method called best available price, or BAP, in an effort to provide purchasers with the lowest selling price, net of discounts and incentives, for a given pharmaceutical product. The product, listed as having BAP on the ODB formulary, is the product of choice not only for ODB prescriptions, but by the provisions of the provincial drug cost regulation act it is also the product which will invariably be used in the cash or non-ODB market, which creates quite a problem.

As it pertains to those products which have been assessed by the Therapeutic Quality Review Committee as interchangeable, the manufacturer with the BAP for such a product is assured market dominance regardless of the absolute value of the difference in price between competing products. Even if product B is only one cent more than product A, market ownership goes to product A.

We believe that the BAP method of setting prices has failed to provide the benefits of fair and rigorous competition between products. In our opinion, this has been a contributory factor in the significant increase in the cost of pharmaceutical products in the ODB program. The result has been for generic companies to be able to dominate the interchangeable drug marketplace by virtue of their low cost structures. It has furthermore resulted in generic drug companies being able to price their products closer to the and name price and still be listed as having the best available price.

The report of the Pharmaceutical Inquiry of Ontario, chaired by Fred Lowy, estimated that a generic version of a brand name product will "generally fall between 75% and 85% of that of the innovator's product." Given this, the price of a generic drug can theoretically eclipse the introductory price of a brand name within a few years.

The inquiry was categorical in saying that "since costs and marketing expenses of generic products are relatively low, and the market can be sizeable, the committee feels that recent initial generic prices have been unnecessarily high."

The inquiry also commented that more favourable differentiation of brand name and generic prices occurs when more than one generic copy is on the market and competition between the generics supposedly exists. However, a careful examination will reveal a tendency for different generic versions of a brand name product to virtually equalize over time. We have an appendix that shows that as well.

In order to create a more competitive environment, two key factors must be considered. The first is that a fair and competitive pricing system must replace the current BAP system, which only encourages rising prices. The most desirable system, in the opinion of this association, is one of actual acquisition cost, whereby the government and cash customers pay the actual cost of acquisition of the product by the pharmacist plus a reasonable inventory charge and the dispensing fee. This system provides transparency and accountability, two factors which we feel are essential to the responsible management of a government program. We feel that this transparency and accountability are lacking at the moment.

The second factor in creating a competitive environment is to eliminate effective mandatory substitution of generic products by ensuring that consumers are given the opportunity to choose between available products, and in the case of ODB recipients to have the right to pay the difference. Increased participation by health care consumers is a stated goal of the Ministry of Health and the element of choice, and informed choice, must be a key factor in achieving this goal.

We consider it encouraging that the Lowy inquiry, although stating its support for the BAP system, recommended that brand name products be available to ODB beneficiaries, even if they are priced above the best available price. We are not suggesting that the ODB should be paying anything but the lowest price—as taxpayers we support that—but we feel that consumers ought to have the freedom of choice and the right to pay the difference.

It should also be pointed out that the producers of brand name, patented products are bound by the regulations of the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board. This agency, enacted with the passage of Bill C-22 which restored partial patent protection for products, is responsible for ensuring that increases in the price of patented products are kept within the rate of inflation.

The second annual report of the PMPRB demonstrated that the prices for existing patented products, in other words those that were on the market when the board was created in 1987, "have increased,"—I am quoting directly from the board's report—"at an average annual rate of only 3.2%, considerably lower than the CPI." The introductory prices for patented products are also regulated by the PMPRB and are conforming to the standards of the board, according to the report. We would remind you that generic prices are not subject to the regulations of the PMPRB. Given the steadily declining price increases for patented medicines, we see as completely unjustified the recommendations of the Lowy inquiry pertaining to roll-backs and restrictions onwards to less than 50% of the CPI.

The introductory price of new medicines reflects the considerable time and money involved in bringing a new product to market. It has been calculated by Tufts University in Boston, based on a rigorous economic evaluation of almost 100 products, that the cost exceeds C$200 million over a 10- to 12-year period.

The services offered by pharmaceutical companies in the introduction and marketing of a new product are also not widely understood. Our industry provides a unique and indispensable role in providing health care professionals with detailed product information, post-marketing surveillance which provides useful information on adverse drug reactions, and support of continuing medical education activities. These activities are underwritten by brand name companies. Importantly, revenues from the sale of brand name products are used in the continuing search for tomorrow's pharmaceutical therapies.

Mr Postlewaite: Maybe I can switch the focus a bit here and look at some possible opportunities for future savings in Ontario's health care system and building on Ontario's strengths for research and development investment in the province.

First, addressing access to future medicines, it was stated earlier that the work of our industry has made substantial contributions to modern medicine. The future of pharmaceutical research is even brighter as advances in biotechnology open new vistas on our understanding of the causes of disease and our ability to develop therapies for them.

There are over 200 new medicines in development at this moment. This list includes 87 for cardiovascular diseases such as hypertension, angina and stroke, 65 medicines for various forms of cancer and 15 for Alzheimer's disease. More than 50% of the industry's R and D investment is focused on diseases that afflict the elderly.

The cost-effective impact of these new medicines on Ontario's health care bill will be sizeable. Alzheimer's disease is just one example. There are an estimated 42,500 cases of Alzheimer's in Ontario. The annual direct and indirect costs are $24,000 per patient for a total cost to the Ontario health care system of $510 million. That probably eclipses what was spent for the entire Ontario drug benefit plan in the last fiscal year.

We therefore do not accept the recommendations of the Lowy inquiry which would restrict access to new pharmaceutical therapies such as those in development. The suggestion has been made, recommendation 4.2 of the Lowy report, that the Ontario Drug Benefit Formulary should be frozen indefinitely. This is not the only recommendation or measure which has been made by the Ministry of Health or already instituted to limit access to new therapies and technologies in Ontario. It is our position that such policies cannot be defended as either good economics or good medicine.

Efforts are being made by the Ministry of Health to move to more community-oriented health care delivery systems. This can be an effective strategy to achieve more cost efficiencies vis-à-vis existing acute and chronic care facilities. It is perhaps not fully realized that the achievement of this strategy, however, and its goal of improved cost-efficiency will to a large degree depend on the availability of effective medicine which will allow patients to be adequately and quickly treated in these facilities and then enjoy a better quality of life in their own home environments. I think this cannot be overemphasized, the importance to our seniors of maintaining their independence in the home setting.

The producers of these effective medicines, today and tomorrow, are the makers of brand name products, the members of PMAC. The Lowy inquiry, among others, wrestled with the concept of assessing the cost-benefit of these new products. The problem is that at present no consensus exists on a standard formula to determine what is a favourable cost-benefit ratio or the criteria that should be used to measure it. However, PMAC does support the inquiry's call for more research into the question of pharmaco-economics and we would be fully prepared to participate in this process with you.

Pharmaceutical research and development: What we all agree on is that medicines as a whole are very cost beneficial in the health care system. By implication, pharmaceutical research, which will produce new and effective medicines, is of unquestioned value. It is a common misconception that little of this research is done in Canada and even less by the private sector of our industry. In point of fact, however, pharmaceutical research conducted by PMAC member companies is recording the fastest growth of any industry in the country. Eight of the top 50 individual R and D performers in Canada are pharmaceutical companies.

The Patented Medicines Prices Review Board, which also monitors R and D investment by our industry, noted that in 1989 total pharmaceutical research expenditures increased by 47.7% from those in 1988. Almost 47% of this total, almost $107 million, was spent in Ontario.

Investments in basic research were up 76.6% over 1988, dispelling another common myth that no basic research is done in Canada. R and D expenditures by companies to universities and hospitals were up 47.3% over 1988. I need not remind you that you that you have six faculties of medicine and affiliated teaching hospitals and a college of pharmacy in the province of Ontario.

PMAC members have already announced plans for over $1.4 billion in new long-term R and D as a direct result of the passage of Bill C-22, and added to current expenditures that will have an accumulative total of billion by 1996.

Let us look at building on Ontario health research. The value of pharmaceutical R and D to Ontario cannot be underestimated.

In a submission to the Ontario government by the deans of Ontario's five faculties of medicine in December 1989, they noted that the policies in Ontario affecting the pharmaceutical industry have the effect of creating a climate which "is perceived as unfriendly to innovative R and D and will result in Ontario continuing to lose significant growth opportunities in the health care industry," and that those losses are to other areas of the country. They urged the government of the day to "consider ways of creating a positive investment environment and improved relationship with an industry committed to R and D for the future growth of Ontario and Canada."

To make long-term investment decisions, however, the industry requires a predictable and a supportive investment environment. With legislation in Ontario which effectively mandates substitution of generic products, the perception is that this environment is not as supportive as in some other provinces in Canada, or most other countries for that matter.

The submission of the deans of medicine indicates that real opportunities exist for a strengthened R and D presence in Ontario. You have an excellent infrastructure for pharmaceutical companies account for about 21 cents of every health research dollar spent in Canada. This outweighs the contributions of provincial governments as a whole.

Let us just take a quick look at how Ontario compares with other provinces in their support for funding and medical R and D at their universities: $2.39 per capita compared with $11.69 in Alberta and $5.10 in Quebec. For a high technology based province such as Ontario, that is a very good record.

Also, the deans have addressed the problem of not having access to the federal transfer payments under Bill C-22 which totalled $36 million to Ontario and not one penny has been made available to the universities.

Because of rapid developments in pharmaceutical research, many of our members are forging closer links and joint ventures with those universities in order to exploit their respective strengths and resources. This is time given that the many universities and research faculties are in financial need due to the dropping off of public sector funding.

It was pointed out that $106.7 million of current expenditures have gone to Ontario; that is, 46.6% of the Canadian total. Twenty-three million dollars of that is extramural in Ontario universities and their affiliated research institutes direct from the industry, direct from PMAC members.

In the university-industry program, Ontario has 31 of the total 73 awards and grants offered for a total of $13 million, again, cost sharing between the federal government and our members in Ontario. Our health research foundation has 28 researchers in Ontario universities who are being funded, totalling over $300,000 per annum.

If Ontario is to remain competitive in the global marketplace, it must build a stronger research and development infrastructure. This is a basic principle that has been recognized by the current and past government of Ontario. What we need is a new pharmaceutical policy in this province.

The Lowy Report noted the potential for increased investment as well as the requirement on industry's part for a favourable climate for this investment. It called for a political decision to deal with the tradeoff in balancing the advantages of "keeping drug costs and prices low against the advantage of creating a climate in which drug manufacturers will wish to invest in research and manufacturing activities in Ontario."

As stated earlier, we are of the position that a policy which intervenes to discriminate in the marketplace in favour of the generic sector does not automatically keep drug prices low.

The report also comments that "policies that encourage the growth of one segment have tended to be detrimental to the other." I refer you to page 65 of the report. Certainly it is clear which segment of the pharmaceutical industry current policies in Ontario are encouraging.

The two major privately owned generic pharmaceutical companies in Canada rank number one and number two in terms of the number of prescriptions filled with their products and they rank number two and number three in terms of sales in 1988 in Ontario. Of ODB prescriptions, 45% are generic products.

The Dr Lowy committee also observed, "While the entire Canadian market grew by only 1% in 1988, the two leading generic firms grew by 6% and 4% respectively," far ahead of the industry average. It has been estimated that, as existing patents expire over the years ahead, the generic sector will be able to grow three times as fast as it has in the past in Canada.

But opportunities exist for the research-based pharmaceutical industry to expand not only its R and D presence in Ontario but also its manufacturing potential. Given the international or global structure of most of our member companies, there is considerable potential on the basis of regional and global product mandates to export volumes equal to 30 times the level of sales for that product in the Canadian market alone and Ontario, which serves as a viable base for that export business.

Before concluding, I would like to make reference to and to table a totally independent study PMAC has commissioned by the Inter-University Working Group on Prescription Drug Use, entitled Benefits and Costs of Prescription Drugs in Ontario. It is appendix C of our presentation. Submitted to the Lowy commission on November 1988 and chaired by Dr Walter Spitzer of McGill University, the submission was one of the most expert reports presented to the Lowy commission, and we regret very much that its recommendations were virtually ignored by the Lowy commission. We encourage you to consider them carefully. Mrs Erola, back to you.

Hon Mrs Erola: I think there really is a need to examine the pharmaceutical industry in this province from a number of perspectives. The cost benefits in new medicines need to be examined, and access to new medicine should not be restricted for purely short-term cost-containment measures. These medicines may in the long run prove as beneficial economically as they are therapeutically.

It is clear to us that the goals of improved economic performance in the province as well as achieving better health for Ontarians are not mutually exclusive. Their reconciliation, however, requires vision and the willingness of both stakeholders to work together, and we are especially anxious to work with all of the players here in Ontario, because we feel that the strength of Ontario in the field of research and development and manufacturing is critical to the growth of Ontario generally. This is where the bulk of the industry is, and as citizens of Ontario we, too, would like to see it grow and see it helping Ontario.

Mr B. Ward: Two quick questions, just for elaboration: When Bill C-22 was passed, what benefits did your association receive? Second, given that the introductory price of new medicine always seems to be higher than what the generic companies can produce, could you give us an elaboration of why that is and go into a little about the R and D, etc?

Hon Mrs Erola: Let's answer the first question. What benefits came to the pharmaceutical industry with the passage of C-22? In the immediate term, very few, because the legislation itself carried pipeline protection which assured a steady flow of generic products coming on to the market. We probably will not receive the full benefits of the bill for another five years, and even then the protection will be fairly limited in that it only provides seven to 10 years, as compared to the kind of patent protection which is enjoyed by all of the other developed countries such as the United States and the European Community and Japan, which is 17 years, and they are now looking at patent restoration. So in the short term very little.

Mr Postlewaite: Can I add that that protection is conditional upon prices not increasing faster than the consumer price index and the introductory prices not being deemed excessive by the board?

Hon Mrs Erola: Which brings me to the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board. It is what I call carrot-and-stick legislation, and that is the stick. The industry, and it is no secret, is not happy about the Patented Medicines Prices Review Board, because it has two big teeth. It can can deem a price to be excessive, upon which it can withdraw the patent protection and issue a compulsory licence on that product; the other tooth, or the other shoe, if you like, is as well on another product from the company. That product does not necessarily have to be a product on the market today; it could be a product that is coming down. They can decide. "Maybe this company is going to have a big blockbuster down the line and we will withdraw protection for that."

What did it provide the industry in the short term? Very little.

Mr Lapointe: I can probably give you an example of our company and make it very succinct. Since the introduction of Bill C-22, our company has lost the potential of more than $100 million in sales to generics, on products that have been genericized since then. We have increased our research spending by $25 million and have yet to see a product that is protected by Bill C-22 coming out of our pipeline. It is short-term pain for, hopefully, some long-term gain.

Hon Mrs Erola: Hopefully.

The second part of the question is: Why are the generics cheaper? That is the easy one to answer. That is because, of course, a copy is always cheaper, when you have no research and development costs, when you have no marketing costs and when you can, as they say, cherry-pick: You will find a copy only in a market where it is extremely profitable; you will not find a generic copy of a product with very limited therapeutic use.

Mr Lapointe: Probably 80% of our products do not make a substantial return, probably never do better than break even, if that. So 20% of our products carry most of the burden for the others. They are, of course, the ones that get cherry-picked, as Judy mentioned, those that develop a large market. When we have to balance our expenditures, each of our products cost $200 million, on average, to develop. For the equivalent cost for a generic to be put on the market, you can take a couple of zeros out and you will probably have an approximate development and introduction cost. So we have to recover those on both the successful and the non-successful products; the generics only large ones.

Mr Postlewaite: Once the market is developed, if you do not have a slow growth in volume, within the first six months a product becomes genericized the innovative product loses 30% of the market and within the first 12 months it has lost 50%. There is a very rapid commencement of return on very low investment for the generic copy once it is on the market.

Mr Pye: Notwithstanding that, as was commented on earlier, Dr Lowy's report says generic products tend to be priced within 75% to 85% of the innovators. I think that is a telling remark.

Hon Mrs Erola: He felt, given the limited costs of bringing the product to market, that their costs should be a lot lower than they are relative to the innovative product.

Mr Kwinter: First, I want to say how appreciative I am of the CPMA and its member companies and the contribution they have made to Ontario. This is an area I have been following for some time, and I have had many discussions with the people who are appearing before us. I have a concern that I have expressed to them, but I would certainly like to get it on the record.

I still in my mind have not quite come to terms with why this is not a particular solution, the solution I am going to propose. I recognize that member companies of the CPMA under Bill C-22 have an opportunity, either seven or 10 years, to recoup their R and D, their marketing, their clinical trials, all of those things, but that at a given period that protection runs out and the generics cherry-pick and they jump right on it.

What I do not understand is why a company like Glaxo, or anyone else, would not anticipate that in the first year it is going to lose 30% of that market and in the second year it is going to lose 50%, why it would not. "We are going to put on the market a competitive product to the generics. It's going to be a no-name, no-frills, private-label product to at least make sure that if they are going to compete with us, they're going to compete on an even playing field," which in fact will not even be true because you are the guys who invented the product. You should be in the best position, if they are going to come to be really competitive and not just edge up to just beat your product so they get the best price available.

I have not quite come to terms with why that can happen, and I would like to hear an explanation.

Mr Lapointe: I could probably start an answer on that one. First, patent protection does not run out after 17 years on all of the products that are currently marketed. There are only a few, as I mentioned, that are covered by the new rules.

In the case of our largest product, it was genericized after four years on the market, with no advance warning. It is very difficult to make plans to put together a new product overnight. What you have is a generic product that can come in two cents below the price of ours and it might take the market, because by regulation that is the way the system works in Ontario. Some of our companies have indeed eventually come up with a no-frills product but it has taken time. The distribution system is a very important part of our marketing capability. Once that distribution system, through the pharmacies, is well into the hands of a specific brand of generics, it becomes very difficult to penetrate it, because we are talking about pennies on the edge, aside really making the whole difference as to who gets the business, simply because of the best available price system.

Our problem is that best available price was put in place to try to encourage competition, and by the admission of those people who came up with this thing, it is not working. It is not creating competition; it has done just the opposite. It has created a regulated system where a small price difference on a prescription will determine which fills that prescription.

Hon Mrs Erola: For the record, two of our member companies have embarked on subsidiaries which do not produce the products. They have done it, as one of them stated very clearly to another committee not so long ago, not to compete on a price basis, because they said you will not recapture the market, but to protect the integrity of the product, because that particular product is genericized in Canada and their product is distributed worldwide.

It was their feeling that if they were going to market this product worldwide, they had to ensure that the same quality of product was going to be marketed here in Ontario and that any problem with the product would reflect on the originator's brand, because as it stands now whenever there is generally an adverse drug reaction traced to the originator's product. Therefore, the integrity of that product has to be maintained.

That was one of the reasons they went into the field. They knew they were not really going to recoup any of the investment in it. It was simply to protect the integrity of the product.

Mr Postlewaite: That is also a very risky approach to the marketplace, in this respect—I think the generic companies have already admitted it in a presentation to the general Senate hearing. They are the first to admit that once you start on this slide, you effectively commence a process of cannibalizing the market. That was their own problem. As soon as there was more than one generic on the market, you get into a price war and cannibalizes the market prematurely, before that market offers a fair opportunity to return on investment in it. So it is hazardous.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to pursue the argument you made related to the drug benefit plan, particularly asking if your proposal for the actual acquisition cost would mean there would be a geographical distortion in your pricing of products based, say, on nearness to—talking about the acquisition and buying out of pharmacies.

Hon Mrs Erola: I see what you mean. Yes, they do think those who have access to larger volume discounts would have a competitive edge.

Mrs Sullivan: Or geographically.

Hon Mrs Erola: Or geographically, yes. I cannot see that that would happen in any way. Jacques is the one who usually markets products. Do you see the disadvantages of that?

Mr Lapointe: Most of us have a single price policy throughout the country, and more than half of the industries ship directly to pharmacies as long as they have something like a $100 order, which is probably the size of three prescriptions, on average. So I cannot see it happening too many times. I am trying to think of circumstances where there would be that kind of distortion and I cannot think of any.

Mrs Sullivan: But on the volume discount question, there would be no difference for the chain operation that purchases in larger quantity than—

Mr Lapointe: As I said, most of the companies do not give volume discounts on prescription medicines. It is a no-price policy.

Hon Mrs Erola: And if that were to occur, that would reflect in the cost, at any rate.

Mr Lapointe: Maybe this is why you do not have volume discounts: As soon as you do that, your best available price goes down and you get penalized by the current system.

Hon Mrs Erola: If the volume discount is indeed used and used, which is why we feel that actual acquisition cost, where those volume discounts should be clearly reflected in an invoice, is the transparent and accountable way to deliver.

Mrs Sullivan: I have a second question relating to that. Have you done an analysis of what the projected impact of your proposal, the AAC versus the best available price, would be, say, in current year dollars?

Hon Mrs Erola: It has not been done in Ontario, but there was an analysis done of Nova Scotia and British Columbia which are in actual acquisition cost. British Columbia, which has the lowest drug cost program in Canada per capita is on actual acquisition cost.

Mr Postlewaite: The Nova Scotia study is an interesting one and might be useful to you, because it was done independently out of Carleton University. They started to measure the province a year before they moved to actual acquisition cost, from artificially listed formulary prices to reimbursement based on actual acquisition cost, and they compared the cost to the drug program in the two years. They came up with some startling findings on how cost-effective actual acquisition cost can be to the system.

Hon Mrs Erola: British Columbia follows that and so does Saskatchewan. There are variations of it, but actually the BAP as it exists in Ontario is really unique to Ontario and most restrictive.

Mr Postlewaite: I think the point Mrs Erola made earlier about actual acquisition cost is most important. It is transparent and accountable. In any of the other systems, there may be savings in there but they are elusive. You do not know where they go into the system; they just evaporate. They certainly do not go back into creating savings for the province's plan.

Hon Mrs Erola: I think I alluded in my introductory remarks to the fact that there was a cost of 68% they noted in terms of drug costs, but the fact is that these were not strictly drug costs in terms of cost to the manufacturer. The manufacturer was one, but then there is your 10% up-charge and then there is that rather grey area that falls between the cracks.

Mr Postlewaite: If you do not reimburse on actual acquisition cost, then you have to list a price at which you are going to reimburse, an artificial price. The tendency and the experience in Ontario—it is on the public record—is that when you have an artificially listed price, manufacturers, highly competitive, will sell below. The margin between what you are paying for it and what the pharmacist actually pays for it is called spread, price spreading. It is an inherent problem in the way the ODB is structured now. It certainly does not create cost savings for the government.

Hon Mrs Erola: Which is why we feel that when it is clear, when an invoice shows this is the actual acquisition cost, no matter what the discounts have been, that is what the taxpayer is actually paying for that product.

Mrs Sullivan: Basically, by regulation or legislation, a margin of profit to the pharmacist plus a dispensing fee.

Mr Postlewaite: They need an operating overhead and they need a professional fee, and that has to be added on top of the actual acquisition cost, but that could be negotiated with organized pharmacists and they can tell you what their costs are.

The provinces that do have it do spot audits, the way you make sure you are only paying what the pharmacy actually paid plus that markup in fee, and it is very effective.

Mr Phillips: Just a quick comment. By the way, the Ontario drug benefit plan is another $150 million, probably funded the Ministry of Community and Social Services, as you probably know.

Hon Mrs Erola: That is right.

Mr Phillips: I know there is a battle between Ontario and Quebec for your industry. Two things: Can you give us any insight on trends, where the industry is heading, to Quebec or Ontario? Second, is the amount of product and revenue that you now export growing as an industry, because I gather one of the hopes of the bill was to develop a big export industry?

Hon Mrs Erola: I will answer the first part, and I am afraid I am going to have to leave right after that, because I have a flight to catch.

The Chair: We do have another deputation in a couple of minutes, so we will be wrapping up.

Hon Mrs Erola: The Quebec government a couple of years ago took a look at those industries which it felt had the highest potential for growth and payback in the province. They said, "Which are the industries we want to target as growth industries?" and they targeted the pharmaceutical industry. All of their government policies, both from the Minister of Health and the Minister of External Trade level, have been geared to making sure that the province creates an environment that welcomes the industry and brings more dollars in terms of research and development into the industry as well. That was a conscious, very real act on behalf of the Quebec government. That has been very helpful and it is one of the reasons you are seeing a much larger growth in R and D dollars going into Quebec. They have created an infrastructure.

I would like to add to that just a couple of examples. In Quebec they have the Fonds de la recherche en santé du Québec, a federation that we call the mini-research council of Canada; it is a counterpart to the Medical Research Council of Canada. It in turn has made a whole series of connections with the teaching hospitals and the universities, creating a network that responds instantly to the needs of the pharmaceutical industry in terms of research and development.

We are at the fledgling stage with the universities here in Ontario, but the support that is given directly by the Quebec government is very real and tangible.

Mr Postlewaite: We consider Quebec to have about two thirds of the population of Ontario, but if you use the federal Patented Medicines Prices Review Board's second annual report for 1989, you will see a total of $106.7 million in Ontario, which is 46% of the Canadian total. Quebec has 43%, with only two thirds of the population, at $98.3 million. This is R and D dollars. If you look at laboratory research, bricks and mortar research, Quebec gets 67.8% of the share, compared with 23% in Ontario. Ontario gets 50% of the clinical research, which is largely extramural, done in the clinical setting, human testing. Quebec gets 30%. But there is a peril in that for Ontario, because clinical research is very portable and it can be started and stopped and picked up and moved much more easily with shifting political winds.

Hon Mrs Erola: Does that answer your question?

Mr Phillips: The only one is jobs, but if you have something you can send me that would be useful.

Hon Mrs Erola: We would be very happy to follow up.

Mr Phillips: In trends, I know where we are now. That was one of the things. The other was just Bill C-22, to develop export business, I would not mind knowing if that is working or not.

Hon Mrs Erola: I would like to make one brief comment on that. When you looked at the original legislation of 1969, that was designed to create a Canadian industry with exports. That was the thinking of the time: I know something of the history of the bill, having been very involved in it. The thrust of the 1969 legislation was to open the generic industry a foothold to come into Canada, because to develop an industry in Canada that would do that. What we have seen is the growth of a generic industry that has not gone into the innovative sector, although it has in some ways been successful to a small degree in exporting to Third World countries, again, but only in those countries where patent protection does not exist.

Mr Jamison: You mentioned that R and D, from the time you start to work on a product to the time it hits the market, being at about $200 million on average.

Mr Postlewaite: Over.

Mr Jamison: Obviously, that is an average price per product. What was the breakdown beyond that? For your own benefit, is that something you possibly could get to me, where the moneys are actually spent?

Mr Postlewaite: That is a global cost. New medicines today are developed by a company globally around the world, in its operations around the world. One in 10,000 discoveries in the research bench make it to the marketplace. That one success, that about $268 million Canadian covers all the losses along the way.

Mr Jamison: That is part of it, and that is fine. What we would like is a better breakdown of that figure.

Mr Lapointe: How much is basic, how much is clinical. On average, and we can provide you the numbers, the discovery part is somewhere between 25% and 33% of the total cost of bringing a product to market. The development—that is, to test it and prove its effectiveness and safety in human beings and prepare all the documentation for the regulatory authorities—is about two thirds to three quarters. That is in a well-run company.

Hon Mrs Erola: And growing, given the number of regulatory authorities in the system.

Mr Jamison: I would like that information so I can get a better handle on it, rather than just the figure itself.

The Chair: I can see you are ready to go. On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for your presentation.

MOTOR VEHICLE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next deputation is the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association, Norm Clark. Would you like to introduce your other guests?

Mr Holman: I am Jack Holman, Ford Motor Co of Canada. I am supervisor of customs and trade, and under that avenue comes commodity taxation.

Mr Adams: I am David Adams, from the Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association. I work with the taxation committee.

Mr Clark: We have a brief statement. I will not give a lot of background.

The Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association has 18 member companies, the Big Three and four truck makers and Volvo Canada Ltd. We are responsible for something in the order of 80,000 direct jobs in Canada, about 30,000 of which are in the parts area and the balance supervisory and white-collar jobs and assembly. So we cover two major sectors. The spinoffs, if you use the Statistics Canada input-output model, would probably bring us up to something like 550,000 jobs in the country. Beyond that, there are many levels of activity. I would like to get into the remarks very quickly and then save as much time as we can for questions.

Our remarks today are these: In terms of the Canadian industry generally and this comes as a result of meetings we have had with other sectors recently, there is agreement that during the upbeat economic times following the 1980-recession, governments imprudently refrained from taking the hard decisions to curb their spending to the degree necessary. Now, with recession once again visited upon us, the ability of governments to cushion its effect is lost without further increasing their deficits and debt. Tax revenues went up during the expansion, but so did tax rates in Ontario and indeed in Ottawa.

On industry's part, during the expansion years of the middle 1980s, Canadian firms enjoyed success in large measure due to a low Canadian dollar. The question was whether to forego immediate profits in order to restructure for the future or to take the chance that restructuring and the investments necessary could be carried out later. Some industries and companies delayed the inevitable; others such as ours and others also facing intense international competition made massive investments in facilities, technology, product development, raising productivity and quality, while also increasing production volumes.

A variety of factors have now converged upon us all, requiring that both governments and industries convince Canadians of the gravity of the deficits and debts problem. Governments could then reduce spending, Canada could increase national productivity, and industry could take better advantage of the Canada-US free trade agreement and better meet global competition at home and abroad.

In terms of federal and provincial sales taxes, we would like to remark that the goods and services tax will assist Canadian manufacturers and therefore the national economy by eliminating federal sales tax from production costs and from export prices for Canadian goods. It ends the sales tax advantage of imports over domestic Canadian goods.

Industry and the economy now needs to have those same advantages extended to the provincial sales tax regime. While we are pleased that the Ontario sales tax will not be levied on the GST, the MVMA urges Ontario to respond to the insistent need for integration of the retail sales tax with the goods and services tax. Benefits would include lower production costs, added to significantly by reduced administrative complexity and the costs that represents.

In terms of Ontario's competitive position—that is a phrase I am sure Mr Kwinter recognizes from past days—it is clear that for some time Ontario's competitive advantages as a capital investment host have been slipping away in comparison with project costs in other Canadian and US jurisdictions. Industry is attending to its costs, productivity, product design, quality, safety, environmental protection, skills development, training and customer service performance, but governments must attend to those of its activities and costs which do not add to the ability of industry to meet global competition.

We are pleased to acknowledge the Treasurer's statement in the Legislature on December 4 in which he committed to proceed to implement the R and D superallowance and the Ontario current cost adjustment and its enrichment to a 30% rate. We recommend that the R and D superallowance be also set at an enriched level to emphasize the need for R and D projects in Ontario.

Among the Ontario taxation measures which we believe are contrary to this precept of lowering costs are, first, the grouping of the gas-guzzler, the tire and the gasoline taxes. MVMA member companies have doubled the fuel efficiency of their products since the mid-1970s. Progress continues across a broad front of technologies to continue to improve motor vehicle capability. Tax penalties on vehicles will not hasten that process and will likely work against it. If the objective is to conserve fuel, we maintain that drivers must be persuaded to take advantage of the vehicles' fuel efficiency by operating them more energy-conservatively. If the tax system is to be used to convey that message, much more use of incentives is advocated, not the bludgeon of punitive tax rates.

If we are correct in stating that the market is already aware of the need and the objective of conserving fuel or reducing fuel consumption, we contend that no purpose is served by increasing the cost of vehicles via ad hoc taxation measures.

With regard to the employer health tax, increases in the cost of producing goods in Ontario through this type of tax measure also constrain the drive to be globally competitive. Because companies have no control over the effect of these types of levy, we urge that they be avoided by governments. Until the EHT is evaluated as to its economic competitiveness effects, the MVMA will continue to recommend that it be limited by applying it only up to a maximum salary or wage remuneration of $30,000 per employee per year. This would go a long way to remove the distorting influence of the employer health tax on the design and development of company employee benefit programs. We would also urge the government to hold the EHT at its initial rate.

On the corporate tax rate, we note that Quebec has employed a lower rate of corporation income tax to attract industry and to promote the expansion and productivity improvements of businesses already there. The MVMA recommends that course for Ontario as well to redress some of its lost competitiveness as a business environment. The MVMA also urges that consideration be given to reintroducing an inventory allowance to offset inflationary effects, removal of the half-year rule in claiming capital cost allowance, and the elimination of the unrealistic effects of the 120-day rule for investments to be eligible for reducing the base for Ontario capital tax.

There are probably many other things we might have included in a budget submission which we intend to put forward to the Treasurer, but we thought we would limit ourselves today to those items, and hope to respond to any questions that you have.

Mr Stockwell: I am curious; did you have an opportunity to read An Agenda for People?

Mr Clark: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: It appears that your recommendations are running very contrary to some of the recommendations and concepts that are being put forward by this government, particularly when it comes to the corporate tax rates, talking flat tax, talking a few programs that appear to be instituted. Tell me how this will affect your particular industry, and do you see it as another blow to your competitiveness?

Mr Clark: I think I would like Jack to talk to this too because he is more familiar with the taxation than I am personally, but we have not given it a great deal of investigation at all. We are more, I guess, incrementalists than looking for an analysis right away of a brand new concept and we have been wrestling so hard with trying to administer or getting ready to administer the new goods and services tax and so on that we have not really gotten into any evaluation of something like a flat tax or a minimum corporate tax or any of those projects. I think we generally feel that there should be, and there is, a reasonable mix of taxes. We think some should be on income, we think some should be on consumption, then it becomes a case of dealing with those basic forms. We have not been very innovative in our thinking. Jack, do you have anything?

Mr Holman: The impact of taxation hitting the province or an industry adversely comes when you are in a site search for a new facility and that becomes very competitive against facing states around Mexico or Europe. So that is where we have to be very careful in having a tough sell at times. At the present time, there are no new major facilities on line. There may be expanding present facilities and if you have a facility, bricks and mortar in place, you already have a leg up over a greenfield site; but where there is a greenfield site up for grabs, then if your tax regime is not competitive, you would have a tough sell, from a Canadian financial analyst's position in the industry, in selling your counterparts that this should be the location for facility.

Mr Stockwell: I guess then you are the specialist and the next question goes, I suppose, to the specialist. What about now? How are we shaping up, Ontario, in competitiveness with respect to taxation? I suppose debt enters into it, not really a lot but more from a tax point of view. Are we competitive? Are we going to attract growth, industry or expansion compared, let's say, with (a) the world and (b) even just our closest neighbours?

Mr Holman: Our competitive position has declined. We have not had a greenfield site to study, and when a new greenfield site comes up, that is when you get into your in-depth study. But I know our competitive position has declined, say, from the time we went out and won the Essex Manufacturing facilities which created about 2,500 jobs in Windsor and also attracted a few other businesses.

Mr Clark: Mr Stockwell, if I might, there are a couple of studies that might yield some information I could leave with the researchers. One is the study that Kwinter's group commissioned for the parts manufacturers, and maybe they have already given a copy out, but it was done earlier this year. It indicates some of the losses in competitive investment Ontario is facing. But it really comes down more to: an old plant in Canada has problems, an old plant in the US has problems. The costs of those plants, because they are old, because the workforce is older and the costs are higher for such an older workforce, it means that you can compare better an old plant with an old plant.

I think we suffer a little bit in relation to those two. The big problem comes when you are dealing with an old plant in the US versus a new plant in the US. The costs are totally different, and the same up here. So it gets very difficult to try to sort out exactly where you stand, especially if you only look at the taxation side. Everything folded in, the workforce, the training, the skills development, the education system, the health care system, all those things. This will help a little.

Then Michigan did its own study in July 1990, called Review of Michigan and Ontario Taxes; they took a real forma capital project and tried to sort out what the major taxes were at least in each jurisdiction for that same project and it came out mixed. The first couple of years one jurisdiction had an advantage, the middle years somebody else and then it reverted and indeed, the 10th year it is back to the other one. So again, it is very difficult. It is almost qualitative rather than a quantitative arrangement, but we will be glad to leave those with the staff.

Mr Stockwell: Good. Being in the car business, it always astounds me, when eventually you go and finish selling a car, the number of taxes you add on, from the conditioning, gas-guzzler tax, your tire tax and so on and so forth. By the time you end up actually writing the deal up, you see the customer's eyes pop. One last quick question is, has there ever been a study done with respect to after-sale taxes, or some are pre-sale taxes, that are built into with respect to selling a vehicle, say, in Ontario as opposed to New York or Manitoba, etc?

Mr Clark: I cannot recall anything offhand on that is.

Mr Holman: I cannot recall a study like that, no.

Mr Clark: Because of the federal sales tax having n so high—

Mr Stockwell: I know, the 13%.

Mr Clark: Yes, 13.5%, we figured that under the old manufacturers' sales tax, with its possible application at various levels of transaction in getting to a completed vehicle, even though the nominal rate was 13.5% on the sale from the manufacturer to the dealer, it is probably closer to 10% because of the taxes that are buried in it. That will go away over time now, thank goodness, although there are still some buried in older plant properties where you did not pay manufacturers' sales tax and it is still buried in the plant.

Mr Stockwell: Of course it was all compounded too, when you added on these other taxes.

Mr Clark: That is right.

Mr Phillips: I have a couple of observations and then a question. The employer health tax you have some problem with, but to me it is potentially one of the big competitive edges you have versus US plants, in the sense that you are paying maybe $1,000 a year per employee for health care and my perception is it may be $3,000 in the US. My first question would be, what is the competitive edge on that? Second, I know all the business community comes and wants us to reduce debt and deficits as long as it is not expected. For example, the current government, by eliminating the sales tax on top of the GST, is going to forgo $1,000-million worth of revenue and it is probably $250-million of revenue it would have gotten by taxes on top of the old manufacturers' tax. I would think the auto industry benefits a fair bit by that and I just make that observation to you.

But my big question is one that Mr Stockwell asked a while back and that is the one that is on all of our minds: just how competitive the Ontario industry is versus elsewhere. I have a kind of hope that an industry as sophisticated as yours, that must on a daily basis be comparing versus your US counterparts—what help you might provide us in terms of how we stack up, everything in. I am talking about labour costs and management costs and all those sorts of things. You may not have it with you today, but is there anything at—

Mr Clark: Yes, there is something coming up, Mr Phillips, that we hope will give us some of that data in our sector. This parts study did that kind of thing, trying to figure out what the cost difference drivers were between Canadian and US—

Mr Phillips: My impression of that is that that was an anecdotal thing as opposed to an analytical thing.

Mr Clark: It was a survey, there is no question about that, but there were some hard data in it as well. We hope that at the analysis the same consultant is carrying out for matched plants on each side of the border in three different member companies of ours will yield some of that information. I have not seen the data yet. It is still being sorted out. But that will come out within a few weeks, I would think.

Mr Phillips: That is a public document?

Mr Clark: It will be. But generally, I guess the best way to say it is, go back to the auto pact in 1965. That integrated the North American industry. It made possible all the objectives, one of which was to make sure the market forces worked. Another one was to make sure that you get the economies of scale. That was skewed purposely at the time in order to get assembly jobs, because what we wanted was jobs. We have gotten them. We have also, by the way, gotten tremendously modern, large branch plants of multinational corporations. That has stood us in good stead over the whole operation of the auto pact since 1965.

We think each company could come up with data which show that their plants in Canada are still at the very top of the ladder in terms of productivity, quality, whatever. One of the ways they do it, I understand—and Jack, correct me if I am wrong—is to relate warranty costs, for example, back to the plant that finally assembled the vehicle. So there is a great deal of information that goes into monthly reports which are put out plant by plant. That is the way each company individually designs its method of tracking where each plant in the system is in those things it wants to know about.

Mr Holman: Track it back to the parts supplier.

Mr Phillips: What would be an equivalent number to health premiums for a US plant?

Mr Holman: I think it would vary, because some of them are self-insured. Some of them have very good records in terms of workers' compensation and some of them have very poor ones. The poor one is going to get charged an awful amount more in terms of insurance. I do not have it. I do not know whether the US would have it. I think we will get it out of this study with the assembly plants involved, which will be at least a better indication than we have had up to date. Agreed: There is no question that on the surface at least, Canada's universal health care system is an advantage for Canada. It is slipping away. It is costing us more. It is raising the deficit. It is causing interest rates to be higher. Where do you go with all of this stuff?

Finally you come back down to, well, where does Ontario sit? We are sitting in a moving vehicle. It is going backwards. It has been going that way for a long, long time now. It is not going at a horrendous rate just yet. We still have advantages over the US. We do not have advantages over the Japanese and we do not have advantages over the Mexicans in terms of flat-out nominal costs. But we do have some qualitative advantages. Those are difficult to sell when there is a new project coming down the pipe, the decision for where it is going resting with someone else.

Mr Phillips: I for one would be interested in that study because I hear a lot of comments like you have given. When I say, "What are the facts?" it is tough to come up with.

Mr Clark: We will certainly table a copy of that study as soon as we can get our hands on it with the committee.

Mrs Sullivan: I have some figures relating to the competitive aspect of the tax and other input structure. One of the things that strikes me in fact is that although perhaps not in the particular sector, but across, generally, in manufacturing, Ontario is in a position, at most current studies—we are in late 1990—that shows us to be singularly competitive in terms of all of those government costs, whether they are corporate income tax—certainly highly comparable for manufacturers, employer health tax and UIC, WCB and so on. They are in fact quite comparable. On the employer health tax figures, the US chamber of commerce has estimated that their costs are 8% of their gross payroll, whereas of course for large manufacturers in Ontario they are under 2% and significantly lower here than even in Quebec, which is next door.

I think that it would be useful, as we are looking at competitive issues—we are looking at other things as well as the costs that are placed by government, whether through inputs or through corporate taxes, including the speed at which innovation is introduced into industries and so on. One of the things that kind of struck me about your presentation related to the suggestion that the research and development superallowance be set at an enriched level. I wonder if you could expand on that and say what rate you would like to see that will be beneficial for the industry.

Mr Clark: I am not sure what rate we would set on it, but as high as possible. I think the main intention there, certainly on my part, was to try to suggest that, although in all of the comparisons that have been done that I have seen, anyway, of research and development expenditure nationally or by industry or whatever and the tax rates that apply to those expenditures, Canada looks not only to be in great shape; we are competitive in terms of rates of taxation on R and D expenditures.

None of the studies that I have seen takes into account the programs of assistance outside the tax system which many, many countries have in place. They are extremely generous. They want R and D, they get R and D. But, by George, they buy it. We do not do that in Canada. Again, go back to the inception of the auto industry in Canada, which was over a high tariff wall. A couple of companies came in and brought parts in from the US and assembled them here. The cost of the vehicles was extravagantly high until the auto pact in 1964. Then we wind up with a skewing of policy towards getting jobs in assembly operations and indeed lowering costs both at the factory and for the retail customer. All of those things were done.

Now we are into: "Wouldn't it be nice to have R and D?" Yes, it would, I guess. But we have the advantages of R and D. We have the jobs coming from applied R and D. Do you go on a sector-by-sector basis and say, "Whatever R and D is, would a facility really help in whatever terms you want it to help that particular sector?" or do you go to a generic program, which is probably what would have to be done at the federal level and say, "Okay, we want just more R and D?"

We have worked this incrementalism thing I have talked about before. We have been successful to a fair large degree, working with other groups, to make sure that the definition of scientific R and D in the Income Tax Act upon which our data as to what amounts are expended on R and D in Canada is based, is generous enough to allow inside those items of expenditure which we figure are R and D. There is a great deal still left outside. We are working on that.

But to attract a chunk of automotive R and D to this country is going to be very difficult if it is going on some place else already. There is a lot of testing work that is done here: cold weather, alternative fuels. The mix of alternative fuels in Canada rather than in the United States probably offers an opportunity for us. So far the companies have done a lot of work in those areas, but it has been test programs, which probably do not fall within the income tax definition.

I would say that if we are really serious, there is going to have to be, to put it bluntly, a purchasing of a R and D capability for Canada.

Mrs Sullivan: Does MVMV support the corn producers' request for higher oxygen content—

Mr Clark: Oxygenated fuels? Again, the public is going to be the final arbiter in this thing, and we, along with the corn growers and the other groups, the Canadian Oxygenated Fuels Association, hope we can get enough information to them to have them make a decent decision. Right now, the costs are not in line, the range of the vehicle on those types of fuels is not in line, the storage of the fuel is much too bulky. Whether we can get it down, we do not know. The possibility exists for all kinds of things, but none of them is as convenient as the system we know right now, which is gasoline-based. If an edict comes, that is one thing. We do not think it is necessary. There is so much work being done by each of the companies to ensure that they know precisely what they have to do in order to go into some other fuel than gasoline or diesel fuel that that is not the problem. The problem is still economics and customer demand.

Mr Kwinter: Just a bit of information. Lee Iacocca has been quoted as saying that the cost of fringe—I cannot remember the exact number—is $200-plus in Ontario and $700 in Michigan per car. That is offset by a lot of other things, but that is what is happening.

Jack, I would like to ask you a couple of questions based on your comments about a greenfield operation. Ken Harrigan had told me relatively recently, certainly within the last year, that Ontario enjoyed about a $10-per-hour advantage in labour cost over its counterpart in the State of Missouri. Second, and I do not know what happened because I have been removed from it a little, but when the negotiations were going on about the van plant that was going to go into either St Louis or into Oakville, obviously, from the information I got from Ford, we were able to be competitive. Has that deteriorated?

Mr Holman: It has deteriorated somewhat. Again, that study was done at that time, and to say we would have to revisit a study complete—when we look at a study, there about dollars, the cost of the fringes, transportation for the market you are serving, interest rates, the operating the plant. It goes right down to the bottom. The comments say we have deteriorated significantly. I did not answer that question properly.

Mr Clark: One of the things that is very difficult for as well as for you, I am sure, from Mr Stockwell's comments and Mr Phillips's and everybody else, is trying to deal with the thing in a very studied and objective way, because you cannot get the data. We hope this study that I mentioned earlier will give us a little better handle on it, but it is incrementalism again. If you look at one aspect of it that turns out to be a disadvantage for Ontario, then you are unable to get somebody who has made his mind up on a discrete item, and it has nothing to do with the overall. This is the dilemma. I will give you two examples.

Federally, my understanding is that there is an internationally accepted, tested and reciprocally recognized list of chemicals used in industrial facilities. Canada has not, federally, not to recognize some of that testing that has gone on. I do not know what their reasons are. The problem is that if you have now the need for that chemical in Canada in your operations and it is not going to be approved automatically because it has been tested somewhere else, then to test it in Canada vis-à-vis the United States, I am told, costs 20 or 25 times as much.

It is the same thing with building permits. The tape you have to cut in order to get through to get the approval to do a sewage treatment plant, the electrical facilities, the transformers, the roads, the whole thing on an expansion to Ontario, are 20, 25 times as high as they are in the United States. All you need is one of those and we are in big trouble when somebody in the United States is making a decision on the placement of a facility.

Labour situations: One of our member companies tells me and it was a fascinating story and I wish I could take the time to repeat it, but in essence it was that during last year's negotiations the facilities were going to be over-leased and you either brought in new product to put in that facility or you lost that facility. In order for there to be a possibility of bringing that product in—and it is now, by the way—there had to be changes within the collective agreement to allow for changes in classification and seniority rights and a whole bunch of other things in order to make it fly. I do not know what the detail was. That was the problem. The union saw it had to go through with that agreement, and the agreement was struck on the basis with the knowledge of the people in Employment and Immigration Canada that it would come forward and assist with financing, etc., etc., in order to take this new product on. We have nearly lost it. Had we lost it, I think there were several thousand jobs in an already depressed area that were going to go. But we have retained them. We have not abandoned them, we just retained them, but the fight you had to go through in order to get there was monumental, multifaceted and, thank God, successful. But all you need is that one implication that, "Hey, there's a negative here that we don't have some place else," and it could be that we have lost a project.

Mr Hansen: The latest figure I heard was that the difference between the auto worker in Canada and the United States was approximately $6 to $8. I do not know whether I am too far off. I hear $10 mentioned.

Mr Clark: I think that is way too high right now, the $10—

Mr Hansen: We get into the Canadian dollar as it is right now; things have changed. I came from auto.

I see the point of the employer health tax. You put a figure of $30,000. I know this became a problem, that in the auto industry, when things are good, there is a lot of overtime involved. I can see your point. This is the place to bring it up and air these particular things.

The other thing—talking to some of the representatives from General Motors in one of the last meetings I had with them—was on the auto insurance. They did not have any figures, but if we do come in with the public auto insurance, which is supposed to be coming up this spring, this will reduce the operating costs. They feel that insurance costs were going up for the auto industry, because if a person was in an accident the auto manufacturing would pick it up rather than the private insurance.

These were some points I just wanted to clarify with you, that we are looking at some of these areas to reduce costs and I hope we can do something for you.

Mr Clark: We appreciate it very much. The situation, again, is that from an assembly point of view I do not think there is a big problem about where you assemble a vehicle. It is extremely critical to the country about where the devil you get the parts. That has always been the case. In our sector, there are 30,000 people involved in parts production as well as the 50,000 in assembly, but it is critical as to where you get your value added, which in our case is largely from the parts area. It is that parts area, too, which is extremely vulnerable. I do not want to speak for them; I know they have either been before you or will be coming but, believe me, they are the meat in the sandwich right now.

The Chair: There is an issue I do not need comment on. In my riding and others I am starting to experience that some people are moving their parts manufacturing because we are bringing in environmental controls and there are jurisdictions in the United States that are not, and this is going to become a problem. Do we continue to pollute our environment or lose the jobs to somebody who will continue? This is a very interesting question.

Mr Clark: Wait until Mexico comes along.

The Chair: My understanding is that the Rio Grande is just like a big open sewer.

Mr Clark: It is—and Europe. I was in Germany in the Ruhr Valley last September and, I tell you, you cannot breathe. It is unbelievable. Everything they do there is for the benefit of maintaining industry. That is great up to a point, but we think there is no particular conflict between controlling our plant sources of pollution as well as the vehicle sources and the economic viability or the value of our industry to the country. There is no problem in meeting those two goals.

The Chair: My understanding is that California is going to have some very stringent controls by the year 2007 and that these are going to have to be met if you are going to sell a car in California.

Mr Clark: That is right. They have a unique problem. It is really starting to get better. I understand that the days of notice where you should not go outside and so on and so forth for those who are susceptible are way down from where they were. The whole global warming, CO<sub>2</sub>, ozone, fossil-fuel-related situation is being given such a tremendous amount of attention right now that I venture to say that it will be overcome, and it will be that we will be into alternate fuels not too far down the pike, that people will find them quite acceptable as alternatives to what they are using now. We are going to have to market like we have never marketed before. The standards are going to have to be reasonable and over a time frame that allows us to make the adjustments.

So far, so good. But the important thing in my mind is that we can do it because government, industry and the public are all for it at the same time. So you do not need regulation. All you need is a consensus as to where we want to go and how quickly we can get there and we have made it.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for coming.

The committee adjourned at 1646.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 24 January 1991

The committee met at 1004 in room 228.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION

The Chair: I see a quorum. I would like to begin the committee hearings. I would like to welcome the Honourable Evelyn Gigantes, Minister of Health. I would like to you begin.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH

Hon Mrs Gigantes: It is a pleasure to be here. I would like to introduce to committee members who have met him, the deputy minister, Martin Barkin.

This is a new format for discussion of pre-budget matters, as I understand it. It is certainly a new format for me. I hope the committee will excuse signs of incompetence, irrelevance and so on. I intend to try to make a very brief introductory outline that will indicate to you the approach that our government is taking to questions affecting the health of Ontarians and then ask Dr Barkin to lay out one of the more explicit kinds of considerations that provide the policy framework for your consideration. Then we are prepared, of course, to answer whatever questions you may have explicitly around matters of the financing of our programs.

I would like to begin by indicating that the approach that I, as Minister of Health, have taken since being sworn into this position in October has been one to try to think of how we can best improve the health of Ontarians.

As you well understand, the development of policy and practice programs within the Ministry of Health has been largely associated with the public health insurance that we have been providing hospital insurance and physicians' services insurance, so the development of policy, apart from providing public health insurance for those two items, has been slow.

Nevertheless, over the last few years there has been a lot of work done and I would like to acknowledge before the committee the work done by both Conservative and Liberal governments before the formation of this government in attempting to develop a broad policy framework for the betterment of the health of the Ontario population. It's a slow process, but much progress has been made and I will speak to some of those items as we go this morning. I am sure you will want to ask questions about how that relates to our financial planning.

In very general terms, what we know that has come out of the work that has gone on in the discussion of public health policy and the health of Ontarians has been an acknowledgement that the delivery of health services is only one part of what has a large influence on the overall health of the Ontario population.

We have come to recognize, through the planning of health policy, that in fact social and economic factors are intimately, closely and irrevocably linked to the overall health of this population, as with other populations historically and geographically in our universe. We have not traditionally paid very much attention to that fact in the way we have worked towards trying to better the health of the Ontario population, or the Canadian population, though in fact it was Canadian sources which first began to identify that very important element in health planning.

What that means, of course, is a great many things. It means that somebody who is responsible for working towards the betterment of the health of Ontarians has to pay very close attention to the social and economic policies that are developed within the government serving that population. We have also learned that the environment—the work environment, the life environment, the environment, for example, in terms of the safety of highways—is a very important influence on the health of a population. We have learned that people's life habits have a very profound influence on their health and, consequently, the overall health of the population. Fourth, if we are to identify the major factors influencing the health of the population, we of course look to the delivery of health services.

You will want to talk to us about all those elements. I suspect you will want to spend most of your time on the fourth, but I wish, just in the beginning, to indicate to the committee that in terms of this government's approach to health planning for the Ontario population, we are trying to make those policy decisions and develop those programs which will include the important contribution of all four elements to the overall health of the population.

On top of that, I can say that this ministry which I am representing before you today on behalf of the government is one which is currently spending a very significant portion of the revenues available for government in Ontario. That is also true in other provinces. As Dr Barkin will mention, in comparative terms, Ontario is perhaps focusing overly on the delivery of health services when we think of the other elements which I have just enumerated which contribute so significantly to the overall health of the population.

With that brief outline, I would like to pass over to Dr Barkin to speak a little more precisely about the matters which you will probably want to discuss in more detail.

Dr Barkin: To the recollection of me and my staff, although this committee has been in operation for about three or so years, this is the first time the Ministry of Health has actually been before the committee.

In order to provide the committee with the maximum opportunity to ask questions and engage in dialogue, I pre-circulated remarks that I had prepared. I have no intention of delivering all of the remarks, but only to highlight them and not consume too much of the time of the committee, and perhaps focus on a few areas. I hope they are areas that are of interest to the committee, but if they are not, the committee can focus its attention on the areas of interest to it. I have with me some staff; if I cannot answer the question, I hope they will be able to provide you with the answers. If neither of us can at this moment, we will be sure to get the answer to you in a timely way.

The minister introduced a commentary about the determinants of health in our society, of which the health care system is the fourth determinant but one which for Canadians traditionally has been of very high value.

It is no great secret to anyone that as we have the two conflicting problems before us, our need and desire to maintain full accessibility to every appropriate health care service that we can to all of our citizens, the other side of that coin is to do so within an affordable and manageable framework, because we cannot sustain the health of our society without having those two in balance.

One of the difficulties traditionally that ministries of health have had in this country is that they have had as their roots an insurance background. We really never have been managers of a health system. We have been insurers and funders of health services generally left to others to organize and manage and deliver. So as we finally have had the fiscal pressures come into balance with the service pressures, we have now had to look at and reconfigure that paradigm and see to what degree it needs to be restructured, while we remain true to the principles of universality, accessibility and comprehensiveness of health care services.

Virtually every jurisdiction in Canada has put together some form of advisory body to the province, whether it is called a Premier's council or a royal commission or a named commission. Everyone is looking almost everywhere in the world to see where the appropriate organizational solutions to managing that balance between full health care services available to everyone within an affordable framework can be found.

Rather than go through everything that is the commentary that I have, therefore I am going to just concentrate on three areas.

One of the areas that comes up as a possible solution—and rather than project the slides up, perhaps I can circulate these to the members and two or three people in the gallery—is the notion of a free market system in health. We hear this quite frequently, “All things can be corrected by allowing market forces to prevail.”

In order to see how the free market system works in health care, we ought to look south of the border, since it is the home of the free market system in health care and probably the last jurisdiction in the world to rely on that. What we see is both the highest gross national product devoted to health as well as the highest per capita spending in the world of any country; 40% higher per person in fact than Canada, according to the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. One of the most remarkable comments I would make is that health care in the United States, in and of itself, is the fifth-largest economy in the world, larger than the economies of all of the other countries of the world but five.

Yet in the face of that kind of expenditure, it has at least 30 million uncovered citizens, 37 million partly covered. Its health indicators, overall, are falling. Its natal mortality, birth weight, maternal mortality, life expectancy from a variety of diseases is now falling, rising, as it is in almost every other western country now rates in the World Health Organization lexicon 19th in overall quality of life, and notwithstanding its expenditure, its own polls show that its consumers, providers together are the least content of those in any country where it has been polled.

I should point out that the United States has more fees for the vast gamut of its health services than any country as well, and that its health care costs are affecting its competitiveness, its ability to generate wealth as its major manufacturers attest, and has become so heavily regulated and intrusive that one observer told me that health care financing administration in the United States passes a new regulation every seven hours.

It is a remarkable change in the way health care has been delivered in that country since 1983, and in the recently passed Congressional Omnibus Budget and Reconciliation, 1990, an act which had frozen physician fees since 1983 under medicare, they were now recommending 10% rollbacks and they now were producing even further draconian measures in the management of health care expenditures there.

The one final thing I would say in terms of efficiency of the free market system as opposed to the government system is that in testimony before Congress it has been estimated that if the United States had the government insurance-type system that is now present in Canada the United States would be saving $50 billion a year, that is non-health-care dollars, in the paperwork involved to maintain its system. So if anyone still wants to recommend a free market system or portions of the free market system as a solution, they would have to deal with those obvious failures when that works.

If we switch over and have a look at the Canadian health system in the constellation of world events, we are exactly doing better than the rest of the world, although when we compare ourselves to the United States we are quite a bit better. We have in this country the highest per capita expenditure of any country with a national health system. We are now devoting $1 in $12 of the national economy to health care.

Notwithstanding that fact, that it is costly, it is also a great value. We captured a lot of the values of the Canadian health care system in the Canada Health Act, but an external observer, an editor of the New England Journal of Medicine, looking from the outside into Canada, said that he had found another value that Canadians feel but do not articulate and that is the concept of equality before the health care system. He equated that to the American concept of equality before the justice system. The view is that no one ought to be able to buy himself a better brand of justice simply because he has more money. We have transformed that kind of value into the health care system whereas they have not.

I do not pretend for one moment, and neither do the Americans, that the Americans have achieved their absolute ideal when it comes to justice, any more than we have.

evolved our absolute ideal when it comes to health, but it remains an ideal and a goal and we work towards it. We get closer to it all the time.

Within that value, our growth is exceeding inflation by more than two times, and it is encroaching on all kinds of other priorities that promote the health and wellbeing of Canadians—affordable housing, welfare, education and research.

Up to now we have, however, maintained a reasonable balance between other priorities that promote health and health care. We have been doing something right, because Canada remains and Ontario as part of Canada remains in the top five of nations in the world in our health indicators, we remain in the top five in the world as a nation in overall wellbeing.

Where do we see our biggest problems in health care? We certainly see problems in access to high-technology services. We certainly see problems in access to certain specialties in certain areas. We certainly see problems in access to beds. But the reasons given do not seem to stand up. We have trouble in access to beds, notwithstanding the fact that we have one third as many beds per capita open, bed and in service at this time, one third more than, say, the state of Minnesota, or Baden-Württemberg, Germany, depending on where you want to look. Our patients tend to stay in those beds one third longer than they do in almost any other jurisdiction even though we have a publicly funded home care system, which has a long way to go in itself, but is certainly better than what is available in jurisdictions that use their beds less.

We are told that the reason our health care system is going up in cost is because of our demography. That cannot be entirely true either. We have one of the youngest populations in the world. Countries with one third or half again many over-65s and over-75s as we have are not having much difficulty as we are and seem to be facing that kind of demography. In fact, the thing we have to worry about today is that when we reach their age mix—and we will in the next 15 years—if we continue to use the kinds of services and apply those the way we do now, we will need their expenditure by much more than the 25% or 30% that we do now.

We are told that the problem is the high cost of new technology, but I would have to tell you, as Deputy Minister of Health, I have not had any proposal for new technology put before me that did not also have with it a caveat that said if I put this new technology in place or if the Ministry approves it, we definitely will save a lot of money in the health care system. You would think that the more technology we put in, sooner or later the Ministry of Health would be a revenue producer for the government, rather than a consumer. I apologize for the facetiousness of my comment.

We are told that one of the reasons it does not work is that it is run by the government. The governments are running health care systems all over the world. In fact, one of our problems may be that our system is not run by the government; it is an insurance-based system as opposed to those systems in Europe and in England, where the government takes a much greater hands-on position on that—not intrinsically a Canadian value.

The real reason that we understand was the problem lies in our roots as an insurance agency rather than a health system manager. We are in fact, and have been until recently, an unmanaged system. Dr David Naylor, in appearing before the House of Commons committee on health and welfare, made that very clear in his testimony. The degree to which we have begun to start managing represents a very slow start and we have a great deal more to do in this area, but I could offer you a few examples and then a concluding comment and we could go to some direct questions and answers.

In the prepared comments that I was going to talk to, I could say that we really started a lot of our activities in the early 1980s, but in 1989 began to look at things in earnest. Some of the things that have happened since then were the passage of the Independent Health Facilities Act, 1989, which for the first time is a health services act that requires quality assurance and outcome review as a condition for continued licensure. We mandated utilization review in public hospitals and provided guidelines for those hospitals. In co-operation with the Premier's Council on Health Strategy, the Ontario health survey was launched in order to give us an indication of the health status of our population and to try to trigger expenditure to that as opposed to certain other factors.

We began the health insurance reregistration process in order to provide us with real information about what was going on. I am pleased to say that last Wednesday, we had for the first time a presentation from the Centre for Health Economics and Policy Analysis at McMaster demonstrating that even with the information that we can generate today, we can now begin to look at regional planning and reasonable allocation of available resources according to population needs, demography, gender mix and prevalence of disease, a facility we have never had up to now and one that is quite important.

Perhaps the single most important change, however, that has occurred in the last two years is a shift, I think, in the awareness of most of the major providers that working with the system to produce this evolution will be an important way to make it work. I am delighted at the responses we have certainly read, at least in the media and in some of my private conversations with, for example, the Ontario Medical Association and the Ontario Hospital Association, indicating that they now understand that to continue to have an affordable and manageable health system that is providing access to all of our citizens to the service that they need, we will have to work together within this framework of managing a health system as opposed simply to insuring it.

That concludes my opening comments, Mr Chair and members of the committee. There are some additional details in the handout. I would be pleased to assist the minister in answering any questions you might have.

Mr Phillips: I wanted to get on early because I missed a couple yesterday. Deputy or the minister, we are kind of looking ahead at the next fiscal year. Many of the things you talked about are kind of a longer-term direction. I just wondered if you could give us some help in terms of what we should be thinking about in terms of the health budget for next year, bearing in mind that I think two parts of the budget, if I am not mistaken, hospitals and doctors, represent close to 80% of the budget.

In the hospital sector, I know the nurses' contract expires at the end of March, on the first of our fiscal year. I believe the Premier has made some fairly significant commitments to the nurses. I think there are negotiated settlements with the rest of the staff in the 8% range. Again, if you look at the hospital budget, I think, in theory anyway, we are looking at some very substantial increases in what is the bulk of the hospital—probably 75% of hospital expenditures are staff wages.

The second one is, I think around 32% or 33% of the budget is fees for physicians. The last fee increase was, I think, 1988. I believe that there was a commitment to binding arbitration for the doctors. I guess their biggest area is the drug benefit plan. I think that is another $700 million of the budget, with the report. I wonder if you could give us some help in terms of what we as a legislative committee should be thinking in terms of increases in budgets for the health ministry.

The other thing is community-based care, which is something I think we all are very much supportive of. I think that most people believe you have got to invest in that. You cannot just say we are going to have it and not have the resources there. How much should we be looking at next year in terms of community-based resources within the Ministry of Health budget? If I remember correctly, people say that psychiatric patients were deinstitutionalized in the 1970s without necessarily the community's support.

So those are my three questions, really. The bulk of the health budget is hospitals and doctors' fees. For both of those, it seems to me, there are some significant commitments made to the wages or the fees in those areas. What should we be planning on? For community-based care, what kind of investment should we begin making next fiscal year so that we have that community facility in place?

Hon Mrs Gigantes: Mr Chair, those are the questions. I would love to know the answers. At this stage, as you will understand, we are in the process of looking at our accounts, trying to figure out what negotiations with the doctors, with nurses, are going to mean and also, trying to figure out what kinds of moneys will be available for expanding community-based care.

As the deputy minister described it, the situation we face is one where much of the demand financially is for programs which have been open-ended, provided through hospitals by physicians and in which we provide the insurance payments. That being the case and that making up the bulk or a very large portion of the expenditure of the ministry, one tends to think of what is left over for building up the kind of community-based services we would like to see, many of them pseudo-medical, not necessarily delivered by doctors and certainly delivered in ways that we would tend to think of as non-traditional, new ways, and supporting the kinds of goals for policy planning that are associated with the determinants of good health that I spoke of earlier.

That being the case, we know that we are going to have difficulty this coming year trying to shift the emphasis within the overall budget of the Ministry of Health to the traditional delivery system, which I will stress has in many cases not been good quality. I think that most people, for example, in Ontario would agree that we can provide better services to people who have chronic health problems than we do in the current delivery system, which does not provide a full range of services, does not provide services very frequently where people want them, which is at home or in residential settings rather than in highly institutional settings.

Turning the system to a new direction is a slow process, and it is a process in which one has to fuel the existing system financially so that it operates adequately to meet people's needs as best it can, while at the same time trying to develop new ways of meeting those needs. That is a difficult problem.

You have identified the exact nature of the problem, and we will simply do the best we can, given the need for money in the existing system and the new contracts which will be worked out with nurses, with doctors, and look for resources to help build those kinds of services and those kinds of service providers in the system so as to better meet the needs of the Ontario population. That does not really answer your question, but I do not think there is an easy answer to your question.

Mr Stockwell: That is the hard one.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: That is the hard one.

Mr Phillips: I am just saying this is 34% of the total budget. We are presumably trying to help the province to operate well and the recommendations, if they have some value, will be your best estimate of what is going to be required to achieve your objectives. I realize the Treasurer then has the responsibility of saying whether that is desirable or not.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I would like some help because I think you now know probably what, in ballpark, the hospitals may require and what the nurses may require. Those are the two large components of the budget. Can you just give us some indication of that?

Hon Mrs Gigantes: And the doctors. Maybe I would like to make some comment, Martin. I do not know how specific we can be, because these are, at this stage, things that we do not control, though we can hope to have some influence.

Dr Barkin: To the degree that I have any feedback from the Treasurer, I will try to answer as much of the question as I have at my disposal. We started out with a couple of principles. You asked a number of questions. I have sort of written them down. If I happen to have missed one, please remind me.

In that constellation of questions you asked about the difference between the non-institutional-based servthe institutional-based services and we have started in our own budgetary planning process with the basic principle that the rate of growth of non-institutional-based services—community services, home care—will always be greater than the rate of growth of the institutional-based services. So that was the first principle with which we approached it inside the ministry and we will still want to stick to that.

The second general principle we started with is that there is a rate at which any complex system can adjust to change and there is a rate, if one exceeds the stimulus to adjustment to change, where that adjustment becomes very difficult and sometimes will be disruptive. If we believe that there needs to be some change in the way services are delivered, then there needs to be, from a funding perspective—because at the moment that is the only lever we have until we are much better at a co-operative management paradigm—then funding cannot possibly respond to everything that everyone wants to maintain the status quo, since the status quo clearly has to change. Our most difficult decision will be to what degree funding, as an incentive, as we heard from the Premier's Council on Health Strategy last year, can be used to shift from institutional to non-institutional options and to deal with the complex pattern of delivery of services in a way that the system is capable of responding to.

That will take a lot of dialogue, but we are certainly aware of the pressures that you described, as you know from the Ontario Hospital Association's news release. They presented their figures to the Treasurer. I was present at that meeting and the Treasurer commented that, based on the way the hospitals were now operating and delivering services, he felt that they had given a fair analysis of it. The question that we did not answer and have not answered as yet is, to what degree and at what rate can hospitals continue the rate at which they are modifying their pattern of service delivery? And they are doing that. Lengths of stay in Ontario in the last couple of years are starting to come down. That is not to say that they are under some degree of pressure. In a lot of areas they are. That is part of a judgement that the government will have to make as we present it with the various dollar configurations that are before us and the kinds of pressures that each dollar configuration will put into the system and the capacity of the system to respond to that pressure and to maintain the appropriate array of accessible services.

Mr Phillips: I just want to make sure I understood that we should be looking at a greater percentage increase in dealing with health. That is the kind of indicator or benchmark. The only comment I make is that some of the capital spending is through arbitrated settlements which are in some respect out of their control, as I guess with the arbitration. The physicians' fees now might be somewhat out of the control of the ministry.

Dr Barkin: Right. All right. I will not comment; that is fine.

Mr Phillips: I have one comment.

The Chair: I really must move along. I have six more questioners. Mrs Sullivan is next please.

Mrs Sullivan: My questions are a direct follow-up to those asked by Mr Phillips. I want to really have you speak a bit more about that transition phase between heavy emphasis on institutionalization and so on. Moving on to deinstitutionalization and where the incentive funding, the stimulation for change that you talk about, has to change, whether in fact, over a short or interim period of time, you want to see a specific increase in your minister's budget for transition purposes.

I would also like to ask you how you see your ministry in terms of provincial management and the way we see the budget set up now, your ministry's rationalizing that kind of budget stream, say, with Community and Social Services on the long-term care program. Do you see perhaps a reduction in some of the Comsoc budget with a shift into a new mechanism? Where do you see increased emphasis there and do you see, once again, a short-term shot that is necessary or is this something that will happen within the context of a third of the provincial budget being dedicated to the Ministry of Health?

I would also be interested in hearing your views on the additions of co-payments into the health care system. I would also be interested on your views on the impact of a change in funding systems of, for instance, case load funding systems versus fee for service; once again, the impact on your bottom line.

The Chair: Well, that should take care of the rest of the morning.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: Perhaps I could speak to one element of the questions that the member has asked. I think it is a very important element and I think it links with other questions that you framed together, and that is the question of incentives and how much incentive one provides.

Indeed, within the institutional framework of our budget, we will be looking at devoting a larger portion of the funding to incentives. That is an aim in our budget planning. Martin, you might like to pick up on other things.

Dr Barkin: Yes. I hope I managed to capture all the questions and I will try to address them all to allow some further time for questions. The question had to do with the shift primarily from the institutional sector to the non-institutional sector. On the long-term care principles, part of their implementation will be facilitated by the fact that we now have a single assistant deputy minister who stands astride community health and community social services. We are now beginning to integrate the budgets of the two ministries for that particular purpose.

We can separate the stream for public accounts certainly and to remain accountable to the Legislature, but we now look at this as a pool of funds between the two ministries for optimal spending. Perhaps I can help by just reviewing the principles around which we based the long-term care reform because they are quite important.

The first principle is that in order for any long-term care system to function, the access to that care has to be managed. When we talk about managing a system, people have a kind of think that sometimes we are talking about over-managing a system or overregulating a system. In this case we are talking about management of access to the system so that people who need the service have a single place to go, can be appropriately assessed and then move to the service or constellation of services that they need.

In the long-term care access, that pivotal point was called a service access organization. It is a multidisciplinary based team that receives the patient and has some form of overseeing public governance to ensure that it remains accountable to the local community in which it resides. Once you have accepted a single point of access and the ability to place patients in the services they need, the way the services they need are managed also has to change.

The way it changes is to fund those services not on the basis—I am going to your second question—of a per diem rate or a flat rate, but on the basis of the level of service they provide. So whether the patient is in an extended-care facility or is in a home care program, level-of-care funding then becomes the second major ingredient to make that system work. There are a lot of other pieces around that.

In looking at the management of the system and the number of beds required to deliver that aspect of the system, we have never separated that from the total number of beds in the system because there is a continuum, from acute care to chronic care to extended care to home care, and different people at different times require one of those services. The position we are in now is that as management of access to the latter half of that system has failed to provide a managed access to the degree that we would like, the rest of the system upstream from it, starting with the acute care side, begins to dam up.

We will see anywhere from 15% to 18% in some areas of our acute beds occupied by patients who should start moving into more appropriate services that are downstream. The first response is, "We are short of acute beds, so build those acute beds." At a couple of hundred thousand dollars a bed a year to build and a couple of hundred thousand dollars a year to operate, it is a lot more sensible to build what the patient really needs as opposed to what he does not need that costs three times as much. So the whole cost equation shifts as well.

Mrs Sullivan: Just on that, do we have adequate acute care beds now, given a shift? In fact, do we have too many acute care beds now?

Dr Barkin: If the shift is achieved, we probably are overbedded on the acute care side, as the United States found itself some four or five years ago. As you may know, about 40% of the beds in the United States are now empty and unoccupied. They have gone from their 95% or 98% occupancy in 1982-83 to a 60% or 63% occupancy, because theirs is a for-profit marketplace. Of course, the difference between them and us is that their hospitals are facing bankruptcy. Many of them are going bankrupt. The level of private-sector hospital corporations going into receivership is rising.

I am not sure I covered all your questions. I did not get a chance to write them down.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to make some observations and then I want to present a question. Frank Miller was the Minister of Health in the 1970s. When I was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology he happened to report to me. In a conversation I had with him one time, I asked him, when he decided the health care costs were out of control and advocated closing some hospitals, what the budget was. He said it was $2.7 billion. At that time I thought it was out of control. He had to back down from closing the hospitals because of public pressure. So that was one factor in the equation. We have gone from $2.7 billion in the 1970s to $15 billion now.

In another situation, it is my understanding we have a population of just over nine million. We have over 10 million OHIP accounts, which indicates that somehow or other there is something screwy for that to happen. I understand the new health card is supposed to address that.

We have another situation where we have an open-ended health care demand system. The previous government tried to cap expenditures of hospitals, which we have meant that, let's say in November, if you run out of money and patients come to the emergency, you have to turn them away because you say have not got any more money. That is unacceptable, so there are overruns. Yet the decision was that we have to put these things under control.

Another anomaly is that we have a situation where we have stated yourself that we have the highest per capita expenditure in any of the national health care systems in the world, notwithstanding the fact that we have got the youngest population. Because of that, we should have the lowest expenditure, given the fact that as you age you have more demands on the health care system.

After making all those observations, it is obvious the system is not being managed. I am not saying that in a negative way. I am just saying that there is no control over it because it is not a control system; it is a demand system. If someone presents himself to the hospital, you do not determine whether you have to see him; you have to see him.

My question is that other jurisdictions are looking at putting in some controls, Quebec particularly, where they have announced they are looking at a user fee. Are you contemplating recommending to the government any kind of a user fee or any kind of constraint that will try to bring the system under control?

Dr Barkin: I presume that question is addressed to me.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: That is to you. I might make a comment after you answer.

Mr Stockwell: I might make it before you answer.

Dr Barkin: What we will present to the government is all of the evidence around the various management levels that have been tried in a lot of jurisdictions. We have done a lot of case study analysis of the impact of so-called user fees in the system. There are different forms of user fees. It is very hard to come to grips with it because it carries a lot of reactions. Let me deal first with user fee at the primary care level, with the notion that the system is managed by a user fee at the primary care level.

We have about three scientific, if you like, studies that we can go on that are fairly extensive, two in the United tes, one headed up by the Rand Corp. and the historical dy in the province of Saskatchewan from 1968-72, ere there was at that time a nominal user fee put in ce for primary care.

The impact of putting in a user fee for primary care is posed to cover two functions: One, it is a new source of ney in a system that cannot fund itself from other ways; o, the theoretical advantage of those who support it is t the user fee will deter people from inappropriately ng the system. That is not in fact why Quebec is putting its user fee. The media inappropriately reports it. I have d the Quebec report in its entirety and I now understand at they are after. This is not a user fee.

It turns out that neither is correct. The first thing that is t correct is a user fee as a significant way of raising ds for the system at the level of primary care. We have out 100 million OHIP transactions a year. About 20 mil- n or 25 million of those would have fallen into the egory Saskatchewan applied the user fee to. If you ough of a $3 fee or a $5 fee, that would be about enough keep the ministry running for two days. So as a signifi- nt source of funds, it really is not, and one ought not to nk of it in that way.

Is it a deterrent of inappropriate care? Quite the re- se. What in fact happens when there is a user fee is that you saw in Saskatchewan, the total number of services ich are consumed in the system do not change one iota. e rate of rise of physician visits in Saskatchewan from 68-72 continued without a hiccup to be exactly the same e rate of rise in every other jurisdiction that did not ve a user fee. What did happen was that the concentra- on of services moved to the middle-aged and middle ss and away from the young, the old and the poor, the ry population group you would want to reach.

In almost every jurisdiction where it has been studied d tried, a user fee is neither a significant way of raising nds for the system or a significant way of ensuring more elligent use of the system. When you really think about what is there in the act of paying $5 that makes you, the dinary citizen, a smarter self-diagnostician than you ould have been had you not paid the $5?

However, we move from user fees for primary care to -payments for other services in the health care system, cause we have, as you know, in the Canada Health Act scribed universality and accessibility in terms of essen- l health care services and have clearly defined those and stricted those, but there are other things in our society at contribute to one's health and wellbeing that would t be defined as an essential health care service. That is a sion governments make, as to what degree they will ovide those services and to what degree they will subsi- ze those services and patients will participate in them, d different governments have different views on that.

Finally, does anything help educate consumers? I think at is the gist of your question, and the answer is yes. ducation itself helps educate consumers. Knowledge by elf helps educate consumers. In the Ontario drug benefit an, a significant change was made about four or five ars ago. We said that the dispensing pharmacist needed to put right on the bottle not only the prescription, but what the cost of the drug was and what the dispensing fee was. Simply giving the consumer knowledge was itself a very significant factor in having patients ask questions and sometimes take some very specific action as a result of the questions they asked.

I cannot resist, Mr Kwinter, however, in dealing with your other comment on the 20 million OHIP registrants. I had that exchange in front of the public accounts committee too, since, as you will recall, the Provincial Auditor pointed that out.

There were two databases in the existing OHIP system at the time the 20 million came up. One was the active database recognizing the insured population; another one was an archival database that recognized any previous number the same individual might have had, or someone who had been deceased or left the province or got a new number. Because people move around, forget their number and get new numbers, we had nine million on the active database list, but so no one could lose his insuring history we kept the archive of any previous number that he might have had. That was the basis of there being 20 million or 25 million. Even in the new reregistered system we will reconcile the person's new number with any previous number or numbers he may have had in the past.

Mr Kwinter: If I can just follow up, the purpose of my question really is that I wanted to get an affirmation from the minister or the deputy that you were not contemplating a user fee. I am not advocating a user fee.

Dr Barkin: Oh, all right.

Mr Kwinter: Given this situation, given the fact that, as I say, other jurisdictions are looking at it, I just wanted to confirm that you were not.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: We are not considering a user fee.

Mr Kwinter: Okay, that is fine. Now what I want to know is that if you are not going that route, what is your strategy to deal with some of the concerns I have identified? That is shut out to you, and I agree with that, but okay, now what do you do?

Hon Mrs Gigantes: The concerns you are raising are concerns of overall management in a relatively complex system. That system is one which government has begun to analyse and try to direct in a way which does not shake up the delivery of service while redirection is being established. I do not think there is one overall answer to the question in specific areas. There are specific kinds of responses.

For example, when your colleague asked the question about whether there would be a greater allocation of money that would be used for incentives to hospitals, the answer is yes. When we get to other questions that relate, for example, to the proportion of services that are going to be provided in community-based service forums, then we are going to see those grow at a faster rate than the rate of growth of institutional services.

When we get to trying to provide a system which will adequately meet the needs of people with chronic health problems, the system known as the long-term care project, the deputy has described some of the ways in which we will try to influence the redirection of service delivery by purchasing and providing funding for the services that are adequate and appropriate for the individual, as opposed to placing an individual in an institution because there happens to be a bed in that institution and no other adequate provision of service as an alternative.

There are various responses in various parts of the system that we have to look at. The user fee concept, as the deputy described it to you, has generally been one which has been advanced for use in the primary health delivery system and in that system we are not contemplating using it.

Mrs Sullivan: Perhaps I can just follow that with a supplementary on co-payments.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mrs Sullivan. You are out of order, please.

Mrs Sullivan: I know, but I wanted a question.

The Chair: I would like to move along to Mr Stockwell now, please.

Mr Stockwell: I guess quite a few of my questions actually were asked by Mr Kwinter. I thought they were very good questions actually and well timed. The difficulty I am having is that I think we have a monster on our hands and it is just totally out of control. I think it takes dramatic action to bring it under control. I think probably most people would agree with that—except maybe some people in this room—in this province.

I look at the transfer payments over the last five or six years and they are eating up nearly 50% of the transfer payment budget, and it is growing. In fact, in some cases some people are suggesting that it is going to be almost 100% of your transfer payment budget by the end of the century, and it is scary. Can we afford the system as it sits today? I think everyone would agree that the answer seems to be no. It cannot fund itself.

The question now is on your new directions. I hear talk from you and the deputy minister about new directions and where we are heading. How long until we determine that they do not work too? I think that is the question that is on my mind and I think on a lot of constituents' minds in the province. You know, "Let's go through this process," and it seems like we have been going through a new process every year for the past five or six years, and there are a new idea, new directions and all these lovely words when none of them work.

It seems to get farther and farther out of control and here we have the new government coming forward, using a lot of the same words the old government used and saying, "Trust us." Fine. If we trust you, how long before we determine that this was in fact a colossal flop. We are going to have to drive a stake through the heart of this system, because obviously it is just totally out of control, and relook at the whole process. How long are you going to give your new directions, your new programs, your new processes and then decide whether they are a success or a failure?

through the heart of the health delivery system, for sure. I think that the measures that you and the people of Ontario will put to the success of what this government, as the previous government, is attempting to do in redirecting delivery of health care services will come slowly and incrementally.

I do not think we can expect dramatic change, and I think dramatic change in this system would not be an appropriate response. I do not think it would be meeting the first test of the system, which is to deliver service that will meet the health needs of Ontarians who need health services. We cannot tear up that system and start from scratch. In the meantime, people need help and they will continue to get help through our health care delivery system.

We will look for change and we will build for change and we will demand change and we will urge change and we will provide incentives for change and we will provide disincentives for the status quo in certain areas. We will use a combination of measures, to the best of our ability, to try to achieve those changes in direction which we have spoken of. Also, we will ask members of this Legislature and members of the public for their ideas about how we can improve what we are doing in searching for change.

It is quite fascinating to me in this new role to receive—I have not asked for a count—myriad letters and I know there are myriad phone calls too that come both to the ministry and to my office, lots of suggestions from people about how to improve the system. I think there is an active realization on the part of the public and certainly on the part of a lot of service providers that change is needed. A lot of the ideas that come to us in written or verbal form in fact reinforce some of the methods we are trying to use to effect change. But it is going to be slow change. I think fast change is not healthy.

Mr Stockwell: Just to follow up, I can buy into your slow change, I can buy into your incremental change and the fact that it is going to move slowly. I am not suggesting for a moment that that may not be the best route to go. What I would like to know is what your goals are. How are we going to measure your success? Frankly, we had better start measuring the success of this system before it thinks it has a life of its own already, but before the Legislature takes over our lives. How do we measure your success in two or three years? Tell me what your goals are. If you have not achieved them, we can come to this committee and say: "Gee, you didn't achieve your goals. What about your new ideas?"

Hon Mrs Gigantes: Overall, I think that is not a hard thing to do, because within five and 10 years in a given population you can certainly see what happens to the life expectancy of the overall population and the quality of life measured in terms of health measures for the overall population, and you can do that for significant groups in the population which have had inadequate support for achieving health. I think of groups, for example, like the native population in Ontario, which have unacceptable standards of life expectancy and quality of life. We will be able to measure that change. It does take time obviously, but those things are measurable. In other areas I would like to lead the deputy to speak about some of the measures that being set in place, but there again I think that members his Legislature and the public will in the future be able look at standards and measures and ask, "How well is delivery system doing?"

Mr Phillips: That is, first of all, life expectancy.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: I think it is a very important rally test.

Mr Stockwell: Mine were financial by nature. Mine are the questions regarding your financing, the costs.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: Money is one of the easiest things to count. You can count how much gets spent. Then I will have to balance the effectiveness of the spending and whether we are achieving better quality in the system for what we spend. Those two things should not be impossible for you.

Mr Sutherland: Just an observation: Maybe the problem is just that we are an unhealthy population to begin with, I do not know.

My other comment was in terms of developing a provincial management system for this. I have talked to many people in my constituency about health care and hospitals and things like that. There is always the concern that a provincial health system is not going to meet community needs. In some cases they may not be able to get all their services within their community. That is not so much a huge problem in my riding, where you are only an hour away from good health care no matter where you live. In one of the other ridings that may be a concern.

I am wondering if you could comment on that for those people out there who are very concerned about getting health care in their own community. If we are moving to a provincial management system, does that mean some people may have to go farther for certain kinds of health care, and does it mean that in some communities not all areas are going to be able to be provided?

Hon Mrs Gigantes: I would hope it would mean that people would not have to go as far for most health care services. I would hope that as we build up community-based services people would not have to go, for example, away from their homes in many cases and into institutions to get the kind of service they need.

Obviously, at the very technical and highly specialized level of service, the consolidation of service delivery is important. It is important, I think, in terms of quality as well as in financial terms. Management of the health system helps us to try and ensure that that is done on a reasonable and equitable basis. Again, the deputy might like to talk more about this, but there has been some improvement in the way people get access, for example, to coronary surgery, if required, in Ontario.

That is a result of hard work, both on the part of providers and on the part of people working in the Ministry of Health to try and make sure that happened. And it has opened. I think there is a better system now of delivery of that service, highly specialized service, than there was two or three years ago. You will probably find evidence in communities around Ontario that that is the case. That can happen in a number of other areas; there is still a lot of work to be done.

Mr G. Wilson: I guess my questions have largely been answered by the discussion to this point, although I did want to make one observation, especially in relation to Dr Barkin's response to the question of user fees. I am pleased to see we are learning from experience, as outlined by your points about why it does not work. I was reminded of the present dismaying situation in the Gulf, that there we do not seem to learn that war is not the way to settle problems. Of course, that also raises the question of how we are able to afford the huge costs that are associated with that, yet here we are very concerned about the cost of health care.

Of course, it is a valid concern. I guess my question arose, though, with the question of education. Dr Barkin also referred to that, education being an element of health care in the sense that we have to encourage more healthful living practices. I was wondering about the education of the larger population and what role the Ministry of Health is taking in that, both with regard to the population at large but also to the providers of health care in the system at all levels, not only doctors and nurses but right down to the orderlies in the hospitals, as well as the transition we are hoping to make into different kinds of health care. What is in place there and what is the response?

Dr Barkin: The minister has asked me to answer your question. There are certain things we are doing and certain things we ought to be doing more of, and we will certainly be exploring that as we evolve the priorities of the budget.

Let me first tell you some of the things we are doing. On the population side, we have had two goals, first, to educate people as much as possible to care for their own health and when their health fails to educate them to use the system and services available to them wisely. On the first half, educating people to care for their own health, we have had our healthy lifestyles program. You have seen the media stuff, you have seen some of the stuff that has gone around in the schools, the little playlets we have. We have also had some very specific disease target population education programs. I am sure all of you are familiar with our AIDS information programs, the AIDS hotline, the AIDS advertisements and that kind of thing.

In terms of educating the providers, this is of course something we have to do in partnership with the providers themselves. We have developed a very impressive array of programs and program ideas now with the various provider organizations, be they hospital or community, professional, physicians or health care workers, and we can go over that list.

But there is one you did not mention, which I would like to perhaps bring into this. We are a system, generally—and that separates us even from our European counterparts—that relies very heavily on citizen governance. Hospitals are governed by citizens; our public health boards have citizen governance. The participation of citizens themselves in the governance of health services is a direction which almost every Premier's Council and royal commission has recommended and encouraged, including the most recent recommendations from the Premier's Council on health.

Last year we embarked on a program of educating those citizens who are in public governance positions. It was one of the most well-received education programs. We educated these lay members who sit on the professional self-governing bodies and lay members who sit on boards of health. We have now been asked to try to expand that education process to deal with all citizens who are appointed to various boards that have a governance responsibility in the health care sector. We think that is probably a very significant area of public education that hitherto we have overlooked. That was an idea, by the way, which came from the board members themselves, so it is simply listening to them and responding to them.

Mr Jamison: There are a couple of questions I would like to explore with the minister, and they are rather pertinent as far as I am concerned, about the funding of health in this province, but I would like to make a comment that we are an unmanaged system and we can probably bring in a better way to manage the system. I really believe that.

The questions I am about to ask deal with the situation across the border, in the United States, and how hospitals there seem to be—we ran into stories a while back in the papers about hospitals actually advertising to Canadians to use their particular hospitals; our problem with drug and alcohol rehabilitation. That particular situation is the initial question I would like to address and have you give me a feel about where we can go, what our thoughts are on that and what kind of drain it is causing to our system.

The second part of the question deals directly with transfer payments from the federal government—it is my knowledge that transfer payments have been consistently cut by the federal government; it looks like that is an ongoing theme—and what effect that will have on our ability as a province to generate the revenues to actually replace those essential funds that allow us to better operate a health care system.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: First, I will speak very generally on the second question; that has to do with what kinds of sources of funding are available through our arrangements with the federal government. Those very questions now sit before the government and will have to be answered in an overall response to our agreement with the federal government and our working with other provinces to find long-term arrangements when existing arrangements run out.

We have been dropping in terms of the level of funding we receive for the health services we provide in this province. It is a serious problem and the government will be addressing that along with the question of funding for post-secondary education as one part of the established programs financing arrangements that are made with the federal government. Those will have to be renewed within a year, as I understand it, so we will be taking a position that will try and accommodate not just health funding but also post-secondary funding, and work to achieve some kind of overall position that the provinces will take.

As you are aware, as one of the three have-not provinces in the country, we have been subject to some special constraints in terms of the funding that is available from the federal government. We will have to work from that position, but it is a serious problem. Quebec has worked out special funding arrangements over the years with the federal government. It has taken tax points in lieu of flow of money. It may be that that is one of the ideas that we have pursued, but the Treasurer can speak better to this, so I will give him our full attention when he asks for advice. We need money in our system.

To get back to your first question, which is out-of-province treatment, it is a complex area. Out-of-province treatment has provided a safety valve for Canadian health care services in general and in Ontario quite specifically ever since we first had health insurance. It has been very useful in areas where we have not built up a level of specialist services in one area or another, to give us time to provide a base level of service in Ontario when that has been required. It has created crises in some areas of service, but those crises, I think, reflect the problems we have had providing service within Ontario.

I spoke earlier of coronary surgery. We now have the capability in Ontario to provide within an appropriate time length, at this time, for coronary patients in Ontario. That is a satisfactory position for us to be in. That is not true in the area of drug rehabilitation and alcohol rehabilitation programs, and it is not true in terms of head injury therapies.

We need to build those services and at the same time we need to develop the mechanisms that can help us stop the system which has been left in many instances to self-refer. For example, if I decide that I need rehabilitation therapy because I have a drug problem, I do not need a doctor to refer me currently for American service. We can put referral measures in place that will help control that sort of referral system.

We are working very hard in the Ministry of Health now to develop an overall proposal for out-of-province treatment, the control of costs and the assurance of quality for out-of-province treatment. We need to do a lot more work in the areas where we are missing service and we still need to have a better handle on the use of the system out of province, if I can call it the out-of-province system by Ontarians. I think it is safe to say we are building the knowledge on who is using those services and in what circumstances, and what methods of control we should be placing in that system to make sure: (1) that we are not having Ontarians refer themselves outside Ontario when that is not necessary; (2) assuring that when Ontarians seek service outside Ontario, it is good quality; and (3) when Ontarians get service outside Ontario, we are not paying too much for it. I think all those areas are problems currently, and we are developing policy which I hope will be before the government and ready for implementation before too long.

Mr Jamison: That answers my question. My problem with the initial question was that it has really concerned me that the opinion is that some private health establishments in the United States are considering our system.

newhat of a cash cow. It would be to their benefit to tap our system to the maximum degree.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: We have set up some rudimeny reviews of particular institutions and particular pat-is of use through the OHIP billing system in which we beginning to inquire in rather strenuous ways about tain provisions of service and the cost of those services.

The Chair: I would like to interject at this point. We running 20 minutes over and there are a number of er people who have questions. So I would need guide-e from this committee at this point as to whether we uld like to continue. We have two more presentations.
we give up part of our lunch hour in order to continue give fair hearing to everybody, or do we terminate the estions at this point for Health? I need guidance from committee.

Mr B. Ward: We move along.

The Chair: Is there a consensus to thank the Ministry Health for coming?

Mr Phillips: We are asked to recommend some bud-numbers. My initial question still has not been an-ered and I may not have it today, but I think the nmittee needs some idea, to meet the objectives of the nistry, how much money are we talking next year? Be-use otherwise we are absolutely flying blind and this is a rd of your budget here. I thought we would have some
a. Are we talking about $16 billion or $15.5 billion next ar?

The Chair: Perhaps we could ask them to send along ne budget projections in rough numbers for us so that can consider those.

Hon Mrs Gigantes: The answer at this moment is it we do not have a figure that we can give to you. We working on budget preparation ourselves.

The Chair: Whatever numbers you can provide the nmittee, I think, consensus-wise would be appreciated
d as soon as possible too.

ONTARIO PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next presentation is the Ontario Pub-Health Association. I would like to thank the presenters coming, Suzanne Jackson and Ronald Labonte, past esident. You can begin your presentation now, please.

Ms Jackson: The Ontario Public Health Association a 3,000-member organization of community and public alth professionals. Our principal goal is to provide lead-ship and a unifying voice for public health in Ontario.
e principal goal is in order to maximize the health of all tarians through the development of effective public alth, health promotion and disease prevention strategies.

We appreciate the opportunity to speak to you. The ucture of our argument is that we would like the govern-ent of Ontario to reorient its health policy from one of estments in health care to one of investments in health.
e have some suggestions for that. Within the health care ocations themselves, we believe that the emphasis should be shifted from physicians, drugs and hospitals to community-based models.

That is a difficult decision to make, to hold the line on health care spending and to increase it in the community side. So we are arguing that we should initiate community-level discussions to talk about the tradeoffs necessary between obtaining the best level of care for an individual patient and how much that compromises the level of health for the greatest number of people who live in Ontario.

Our first argument is that we should be spending less in health care and more in the creation of health. This is based on the concept that was presented by the previous speakers, the deputy and the Minister of Health, that public policy measures are much more fruitful for creating health.
One's personal health is much more dependent on environmental quality, supports for child development, income ad-equacy, employment opportunities, housing adequacy, physical safety and security and food availability.

If these things are the determinants of health and if we are going to create health in the province, those are the areas we need to be moving on. Unfortunately, we believe that the continued increases in the health care portion of the budget provincially have taken away the ability to make policy decisions and increases in the areas which we believe would be more productive in terms of increasing people's health.

We recommend that the government not increase spending in the hospital, physician and drug benefit services in 1991-92 and that over the medium term the government progressively decrease spending in these envelopes relative to spending on the determinants of health.

There are many health determinants you could spend your time on and debate spending your efforts on. We have concerns about environment. We have concerns about income, employment, food, all of those areas. In particular, we emphasize that increasing investments in social welfare reform is a specific and urgent example of our belief in the need to develop a comprehensive provincial health investment strategy, an investment in health as opposed to health care.

We noted in previous briefs to this committee that the cost estimates of full implementation of the Social Assistance Review Committee recommendations would have far greater long-term cost savings than similar expenditures within the hospital and physician service sector. So we believe it is of vital importance that this budget affirm the new government's commitment to full welfare reform.

We call upon the government to announce in its 1991-92 budget a timetable for full implementation of the SARC recommendations. We realize that they cannot all be implemented in one year, but we think that it should work out a staged process for implementation of those reforms as a major step towards creating health for the people of Ontario.

This is supported by work in other nations. Again, that was referred to in the deputy's paper, that those having the greatest after-tax income equality have the lowest infant mortality rates and the longest life expectancies. This is independent of the absolute level of income within the country. So we believe that government policies supporting income redistribution, such as welfare reform and more progressive income taxation, are vitally important public health policies.

That is our picture of the overall budget in terms of trying to shift and put more emphasis on policies which create health. Within the health care envelope itself, we would like to shift the emphasis from institution to community-based models. There are three ways in which a shift to community-based models can improve public health.

One is that community-based care may lead to reduced costs in the medium term. We emphasize that those will not be realized in the first few years and in fact you will have some doubling up of costs for a period of time. However, we believe that public health will be improved in Ontario to the extent that proportional savings in this province are directed towards greater funding of policy initiatives related to community care. We also believe that the natural networks of community and family support are more likely to be maintained through a community-based focus on health care and that that is very important.

Recent research has found that the relative risk of mortality and morbidity for persons who are socially isolated is two to four times greater than for adults who have good social networks and support. It is very important that these natural networks of Canadian family support be supported and that local community governments allow for greater responsiveness to local health needs and issues. We believe that is an important aspect of the community-based system.

We recommend that the government increase its fiscal support to community-based models of health care service delivery. We also, as a corollary of that or a particular example of that, would like to emphasize support for the natural care givers.

One example of this is that, when we were sponsoring a series of public consultations on the government's proposed long-term care reforms, the Ontario Public Health Association was informed repeatedly that the ability of the natural care givers to continue in their role is made very difficult by the loss of employment income. To the extent to which we can support natural family and friend caregiving networks, it is economically less costly than professionally provided care or institutionalization. We recommend that the government provide direct payments and/or tax credits for compensation of forgone employment income to family care givers.

We recognize that this kind of direction that we are suggesting is a difficult line to walk politically. We recognize that the government, through its continued support of the Premier's health council, is aware of the decreasing benefits of putting more money into health care spending. We are getting a decreasing margin of utility by doing that.

The problem comes down to people who live in the province of Ontario who are concerned about access to health care and the best health care services possible, so their interest is in the best possible care for the individual patient.

When we are looking at it from a public health perspective, we are also seeing it from the broader outlook which is that we should be looking for the most efficacious care that creates the greatest good and creates health for the greatest number of people in the province, and there is a fundamental contradiction there.

Again, the kind of tradeoffs that we are talking about match concerns that people feel who live in Ontario. People are increasingly concerned about the quality and sustainability of their physical environment, the fear of violence, the continued high cost of housing, especially in large urban centres, and other issues of social equity, fairness, and they are all dealing with the basic determinants of health. What Ontarians do not realize is that this is a parallel concern for access to the latest medical technology. Hospital and pharmaceutical procedures can compete with their desire for a safe environment and a more equitable society.

What we are saying is that continued growth in health care budget provides little or no marginal health return for the size of the investment, and in fact we would get a better bang for a buck if we invested more in policies that create health. We know this, you know this, we are not convinced that the majority of Ontario citizens know this. Until they do, politicians and government budgets will continue to reflect a policy of health care investment rather than a policy of health creation investment.

We recommend that the government create the necessary political support for a health investment strategy for the province of Ontario by initiating a series of community forums on the ethical limitations of health care spending such that direction is provided to politicians, health care professionals and other public decision-makers.

That is the principal thrust of our argument. We have an addendum in that it is a long-standing public health policy that tobacco use is one of the single leading preventable causes of morbidity and preventable mortality. We continue to support taxation policy recommendation.

I believe you have had or you will have a brief presentation by the Canadian Cancer Society, the oncology society, heart and stroke, the Ontario Lung Association, non-smokers' rights, a consortium of these groups who are making recommendations for tobacco tax policy. We support those recommendations.

As an additional point with respect to supporting those recommendations, we would urge you to ensure that total provincial tobacco taxation revenue matches or exceeds public expenditures related to tobacco products including disease treatment costs attributed to tobacco, safety protection costs, health education and promotion initiatives related to stopping smoking or tobacco use reduction, the cost of smoking cessation programs, the cost of research into medical treatments and the cost of foregone crop substitution and displaced tobacco worker job retraining programs. All those costs should be matched by the kind of revenue we are taking in in the tobacco area.

Mr Sutherland: I saw that you were in the audience when the Minister of Health and the Deputy Minister of Health were here. I was wondering if you would like to comment on any of the statements that they made about transition process into this community care. You have urged us to go very quickly. The minister and the deputy minister said there is a problem in going quickly. Do you see there is a problem with going more quickly than maybe what the minister and deputy minister have indicated?

Mr Labonte: First of all, we regret that we actually were not here for the full comments of the minister or the deputy, but we reviewed the deputy's written comments. Our argument is basically that we believe that until such time as expenditures in the institutional sector are frozen, any proportional increases in the community-based sector are necessarily going to be small. They have shifted over the last couple of years and we have been very strong in recommending the Ministry of Health in attempting to make this shift, but the sheer size of institutional budget means that it is a very small incremental gain.

We would argue that you need to close down institutional spending in order to build up that parallel system. That also would likely involve some tough negotiations with the federal government, because part of our problem is that the federal government gave us 50-cent dollars back in the 1950s to build the institutional side, not the community-based side. It is a matter of internal policy in the ministry, how they go about trying to make this change. Standing on the outside, we would continue to prod and push that this change needs to occur quite rapidly. I do not know if that answers your question.

Mr Sutherland: Just one supplemental. How do you ensure that you still retain your quality of care within a quick transition process? That seems to be a bit of the dilemma that the minister and the deputy minister were pointing out.

Mr Labonte: A difficulty that underlies even that is at right now we do not have full quality assurance within the kind of care that is provided and we have this declining margin of utility in terms of what we are spending. So we do not even know that what we are paying for is giving us the quality that we want. Any time one makes a transition from one particular system of delivery to another system of delivery, there is going to be an awkward period where, yes, there is going to be some discomfort in terms of full ready access.

That is why we underscored the necessity, because politically we recognize that politicians with their four- or five-year horizon are going to face the demands of their electorate. Their electorate often wants or equates their own personal health with their hospitals or with their doctors or access to these services. We know from research that we are not getting any return on that kind of service. Until the public begins to engage in that debate and begins to work with the government in making that transition, we are going to continue to have this imperative to put more money into the large capital expenditures on hospitals and other disease treatment.

Mr Christopherson: I apologize for missing part of your presentation. I had to arrange to get some cold medicine. I am rapidly deteriorating here with a cold a friendly colleague of mine passed along.

I appreciate hearing your presentation. Prior to coming here, I was chair of the regional health and social services committee and was very active in the healthy communities concept. I think that ties in very much to where you are going here. My question is just specifically on a budgetary matter. At the time I left regional council there was a great deal of enthusiasm in our community and in our council for the mandatory health program. The direction, the thrust, even the phase-in period seemed to be pretty exciting. Then the funding announcement came through. After the announcement, the reality: There was not enough money, at least in our region, to meet the three-year phase-in program that indeed had been approved by the Ministry of Health.

Is that situation still alive? Are there still concerns about that and are you comfortable that the three-year target mandate—it might have even been four, but I think it was three—can be met, and any other comments you might have about that program vis-à-vis the healthy communities concept and everything you are talking about here, meaning that as a vehicle or one of the vehicles?

Ms Jackson: In our association, a great deal of our membership is made up of people who work in the public health sector. We definitely support the mandatory core program directions. We are concerned about the lack of funding commitment that went with the policy statements that we favour. That is part of the argument that we are making towards supporting community-based care, also to support community-based health initiatives such as the public health and community health programs.

If you want to know whether they can be implemented in three years, I think the three-year timetable has posed a lot of problems for many health units in the province. At the same time as they agree, many of them are very supportive of the recommendations and are trying to do something about it. I do not know if that answers you. We are very committed to supporting those directions and in fact are working on ways to enhance people's understanding of the best news that has occurred in public health in years. We are in favour of it but we are concerned with the lack of funding support for it.

Mr Labonte: The other thing too is that we wanted to be unique in coming to this standing committee and not asking for anything for ourselves—

Mr Christopherson: We noticed that. We appreciate it.

Mr Labonte: —even though we recognize that we would like to have more funding in public health programs. The basic argument is that we would need to have funding in the determinants of health and that is compromised by institutional care spending and the rate of that spending, and we need to have within that envelope more shift over to smaller, community-based agencies.

Mr Christopherson: What is the first step? If you were given the chance to make one decision, a practical decision—I am not talking about changing the world in one step. If you were asked and had the opportunity, what would be the first step that you would see us making down this road?

Mr Labonte: We actually have five very simple steps, which are our recommendations. The first is to sort of freeze the expenditures in the hospital, physician and drug side and announce the full implementation of the Social Assistance Review Committee because of the equity question and its incredible impact in terms of long-term health, because of the child poverty issue.

The shift to community-based is a little more difficult to measure, but what you would look at within the ministry budget is that the community mental health, the community health and public health budgets would increase significantly relative to the hospital, physician or drug benefits. Something I would really like to emphasize to this committee is the need to engage in community-level debates over the ethics of the total scale of health care spending, because even if you do quality assurance programs and you make sure that what you are getting is in fact efficacious, effective and efficient, you still have not raised to the self-conscious or political level the debate about the tradeoffs: If you put our money here, where are we not putting it in terms of other things which may be more vital or important to health?

Mr Christopherson: The only problem, and please accept this in the vein it is meant to be offered, is I really did not see that as a step. To me, that is the major leap. I mean, you are asking for all of it to be done in one fell swoop, and as a new member of government, I do not know how realistic that is. My experience even at the regional level tells me that something like that would be very difficult to do in one move, which is why I asked the question. If you could see one concrete, doable, solid step forward that really would get us going in the right direction, what would it be? But I appreciate and respect your answer.

Mr Phillips: One of your fundamental recommendations, which I think is an interesting one, is to shift the focus. I think, as we talked earlier, many of the commitments that have been made by the government go the other way. I think there are some major commitments to the Ontario Nurses' Association. Most of ONA works in hospitals, and that is an understandable commitment, and binding arbitration to physicians.

I think the minister earlier sort of rejected one of the major recommendations from the Lowy report on drugs, so your recommendation to shift the focus to community-based may be a little late, at least over the short term, because the major components—hospitals, 75% are salaries for nurses and for staff, and I think both of those are fixed in place now, or close to it; the physicians with the binding arbitration, and the Lowy report major recommendations.

It may be very difficult for this government to act quickly on your first recommendation. I just make that observation because I think that will be a challenge for all of us. The fact of the matter is that there is incredible commitment already made to the institutional segment. But my question really is on the community-based. And I agree with you, and I think the minister said earlier they were going to shift and put more emphasis—specifically what kind of money are we talking about and can you give us some examples of the groups that we should be looking at substantially enhancing support for to help community-based care?

Ms Jackson: Some of the community groups would be community health agencies, support for some of the informal care giver networks that we mentioned specifically in the brief. In many communities the hospital is a community centre, so there are outreach programs, there are possibilities other than focusing simply on the community health centre as an alternative. But it is working with other community agencies, including support for public health units and the long-term care reform recommendations which involve looking at both the kind of care that is provided through the Ministry of Community and Social Services, as well as through the Ministry of Health. Those kinds of agencies, as well, are important to support.

Mr Labonte: There is a polyglot of community-based agencies.

Mr Phillips: A what?

Mr Labonte: A polyglot; like a huge, strange, flots and jetsam floating around there; a variety.

I think what is important to understand about community-based agencies and what makes them a bit different is because in some small areas a small hospital may in fact be a community-based agency and it may be the area of focus within that whole community where people sort of go for a variety of things besides just tertiary care. But most instances hospitals are very large. They are kind of the analysis of the factory model and so forth.

A community-based system of care could be a community health centre—that is probably about the best model that we have in Ontario right now—like the centres locaux de services communautaires in Quebec. It is to some extent public health units, community health agencies that exist across the province. But what is important is that first of all, a community-based agency has to be small enough that it does not become a huge bureaucracy that is inaccessible by the people in the community.

It has to have some direct, meaningful form of community governance so that community members actually can run and make some decisions and try to integrate not just the tertiary issues of care but also some of the health promotion, disease prevention and public policy issues in care. It is easier to define it by what it should look like rather than what it actually is, because we are in the transitional stage of trying to establish a network of community-based services to supplant our large institutional sector.

Mrs Sullivan: I wanted to pursue your point 1 on page 7 where you suggest that community-based care may lead to reduced costs in the medium term and then talk about longer term effects later on. The expert analyses that I have read have indicated that in fact over the longer term Ontario ought not to expect to see a reduced portion of the budget committed to health care. What we would see is a difference in the delivery vehicles, but not a significant difference in the budget proportion. I wondered how you have reached this conclusion. It is certainly not one that st government nor, I think, this government considers to an appropriate conclusion.

Mr Labonte: We acknowledge that when we say that estimates of eventual cost savings are speculative and subject to debate. The jury remains out on whether it is going to be simply a redistribution to other vehicles or whether there in fact will be a total savings within the envelope of complete health care expenditures. We acknowledge there is a lot of disagreement about that.

Certainly we say that in the medium term, as you are going to set up a new system, the old system is also going to continue and also is going to require some funding. So you are probably going to have a period of a bit of economic growth that will occur as you try to set up the parallel.

I do not think that anyone, at this point probably, knows whether a community-based service delivery system is going to be cheaper for the same type of services. It may be, it may not be. Some evidence says it will be, other people disagree. That is why we tag on that final recommendation, because it still begs that question of, How much do the citizens of Ontario want to spend on treating disease, with relative declines in the margin of utility for their own health in that expenditure, if it is going to compete with the other sectors—for example, the Environment Ministry or in economic development, for things like jobs, safe environment, adequate housing, safer quality food—when it begins to compete with those determinants? That is why we believe quite strongly that this discussion has to begin to take place; otherwise we are going to continue to have discussions about how to allocate for health care spending rather than allocating for health.

Mrs Sullivan: Certainly in my community the longer-term analysis has been done in terms of the economic effect and cost of an integrated community-based funding delivery system, including some institutional portions, but as well, a lot of community-based services. Our view locally is that it will cost more than our current system is costing, given what the goals are at the end of the line and where we are going. So I wanted to pursue that.

I think that in terms of budget planning we would continue to be looking at about a third to 40% of the provincial budget being committed to health care, no matter what the delivery system. That is sort of what we are looking at in this committee.

Could you just comment on changes in impact, say, on human resources and the cost of delivering community-based services, as you are looking to change? I am thinking about things like impact of travel, say, for nurses or costs that might not now be factored into the system that even in the transitional phase may have to be factored in. Do you have any analyses of those kinds of incremental costs?

Mr Labonte: No, we do not. In fact, what you are actually proposing is something that would be quite exciting to do for the current system, as well as for any proposed new system. I think what you are doing is saying, Let's begin to internalize to the extent possible what all the costs of maintaining the system are," because in your statement that the community-based care delivery versus the current system might cost more, one of the reasons—and this is where there has been some research. It looked at community health centres and said that they may not be cheaper than fee-for-service physicians, but community health centres offer all kinds of things that fee-for-service physicians do not offer. They are less easily quantifiable, but they have various kinds of support programs, various kinds of community entry points to sort of begin to look at policy or shifting some of the environmental issues within their neighbourhoods. So they offer more than just what a medical system, as it is defined, offers.

To some extent, unless we are very clear about what we are comparing, then we might end up with eventual cost estimates that are kind of like apples and oranges. So when we look at this notion of internalization, I think we would want to do that within the whole hospital-based system or institutional-based system, alongside the community-based system, and then see what in the community-based system is being offered that is not currently being offered by the institutional system so that we can make an honest comparison.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming and for your presentation.

While we are having the transition between this group and the next one, an issue of some importance has come up. We have been requested by the Canadian Bankers' Association that it would like to come and make a presentation to us. They are past the deadline, but they would like to make the presentation anyway.

A second issue that has been brought up by Mr Kwinter is that the rate of bankruptcies in Ontario has been going up very rapidly. The question to the committee is whether we could find time to have somebody come and speak to us about bankruptcies. We could also invite the Canadian Bankers' Association to come and speak to us about this issue. Is it the will of the committee that this invitation be extended?

Mr Christopherson: Who would be the expert to talk about bankruptcies?

Mr Kwinter: Let me give you a comment. The Chairman passed me a note and asked me whether the banks were pulling the plug too soon and what we can do about it.

Mr Christopherson: On bankruptcy?

Mr Kwinter: Yes. It would seem to me that if we could get the Canadian bankers to come in here and address what they do about this thing—what kind of tolerance do they have? Are they in a position, when times are tough, to maybe lessen their criteria or to do something?

Mr Christopherson: Maybe I misunderstood. I thought the Chair said there were the bankers and somebody to address bankruptcy.

Mr Kwinter: No. He was saying that the bankers have asked to come, and I do not think it has anything to do with bankruptcies. That is just a coincidence. They have just asked to come.

The other question is that this report that came from Canadian Press today says that bankruptcies in Ontario have grown by a whopping 81% over 1989, just a staggering number. It is something we should be dealing with. I do not really know who, other than a large accounting firm that has a very strong bankruptcy section, we could ask; someone like Ernst and Young or whoever. There are some firms that really specialize, unfortunately, in bankruptcies. It might be useful to have them come in and talk about what they see as the underlying cause, things of that kind, and see if we can address it.

Mr Christopherson: Exactly. Are you comfortable with mandating the Chair to work with the clerk and the staff to find one or two groups that could address that? Are you comfortable handling it in that fashion?

Mr Kwinter: Sure.

Mr Christopherson: If you are, I would prefer to move that we do allow the bankers to come in and that we mandate you, Mr Chair, to co-ordinate one or two groups to come in and address that bankruptcy issue. I think they are good suggestions on the part of Mr Kwinter.

The Chair: I take it there is consensus to move in that direction? Thank you.

The Acting Chair (Mr Sutherland): The Chair has just had to step out for a minute so he has just asked me to take his position, if there is no objection from anyone. Our next presenter is Mr Howes.

TERRY HOWES

Mr Howes: Perhaps we should put my little presentation over until after lunch. You have had a long morning; I mean, in fairness to me and to you. I have important things to say.

The Acting Chair (Mr Sutherland): No one is going to deny that you have important things to say. We have a presentation at 1:30. I am at the will of the committee on this one.

Mr Christopherson: On a point of order, Mr Chair: To hold Mr Howes over until this afternoon would not work at all, because all the slots are filled. However, are there—I know we have been having a real time problem—other possibilities for a slot for Mr Howes?

Clerk of the Committee: At this point, the last time slot is on the morning of 4 February to accommodate those who are on waiting list. We are into the third week of hearings.

Mr Christopherson: That would probably be your best bet.

Mr Howes: Listen, I promise I will not bore you. I have about a 15-minute presentation.

The Acting Chair: We can do it right now and we will allow time for questions as well.

Mr Howes: Good. I hope you have some, too. I feel more comfortable standing, so if you do not mind I will.

The Chair: You will have to sit down, because the mike will not pick you up.

Mr Howes: The Unclaimed Intangible Property Act was given royal assent 19 December 1989. All three readings were given in a 14-day period, something that as far as I have ever heard was unprecedented, yet 13 months later the act has not been proclaimed. I was the one who brought this situation to the attention of the former Chairman, the fact that there was all kinds of money that should probably belong to the people of Ontario that was being used by others, whose money it was not.

I was very interested in why this act was not in force. I found out that there has been intense lobbying going on in this Legislature, lobbying by the most powerful money people in this country, with a lot of clout. I made a freedom of information request and months later I got copies of their presentations.

It is a real blue ribbon group, I will tell you. You cannot get any more blue ribbon than this: the Canadian Bankers' Association, which is going to be appearing here in a couple of days, and I would like to hear what they have to say on this topic in particular; the investment dealers; the Insurance Bureau of Canada, that is the insurance companies' lobby group; the investment funds; Canada Trust; National Trust. The list goes on and on. Here they are. Believe me, it is not bedside reading. It took a lot of plowing through this.

One is of particular interest. This is the one from Royal Trust. Try to make any sense out of that.

The Chair: You are going to have to sit down, because we cannot get it on the record.

Mr Howes: Try to make any sense out of that. This piece de résistance is the last page. All it says is appendix 1 and not another word. Royal Trust is a member of the Bronfmans' Hees International Bancorp. Some would say they must have something to hide.

Anyway, there is one thing in common to all the presentations, to every one of them. They do not want the law. They do not want it to begin with but, second, they most assuredly do not want it to be retroactive.

The trust companies' trade association was the most vehement about this. They sent in no less than seven letters and submissions. I am going to quote short quotes from some of these submissions and I hope you will listen to me because some of them are pretty convoluted. They are bureaucrats, not people talk. I will translate it in a minute.

"It is the long-standing practice of the industry to bring many types of unclaimed property into income. The program should be no retroactive effect to the program."

Finally, after 10 months of lobbying and figuring out how they had it anyway, they bit the bullet and allowed as how they could put up with a five-year retroactive period. I am going to show you that the retroactivity and the kind of money involved is mind-boggling. Anyway, they finally allowed as how they could live with five years.

Canada Trust in its presentation said that unlike the banks, "there has not been previous legislation in Ontario governing the transfer of unclaimed properties." With the chartered banks, as we all know, if an account is dormant for 10 years, the money must go to the Bank of Canada. Not our trust companies. Our trust companies just keep it. Believe me, they make no try to find the people who money this is. I know what I am talking about, because it is my business.

National Trust is particularly interesting. They said, "It is a general practice for certain unclaimed balances to be turned into income." This is the punch line; it is really good. We feel strongly that the present system of administering unclaimed funds is sound and effective." I do not blame them for feeling that when you consider what is in it for them. No wonder that Hal Jackman guy is so rich. They even threatened us with a constitutional challenge to the act. It is all in these presentations, every word of it.

The insurance companies' trade association is very interesting too. They said that, "retroactivity of legislation of this nature, which is in effect a tax, is contrary to our parliamentary traditions." As we all know, only profits are taxed, so obviously our insurance friends regard this money as pure, clear profit. Their rationale is very interesting and very convoluted, so you have to listen carefully to it because it is quite funny.

"The general thrust of Bill 86 is to safeguard in perpetuity the rights of the owners of intangible property while at the same time allowing the use of intangible property for the benefit of the people of Ontario." That sounds great, like motherhood.

In reality, this is precisely what these fine folks do. "By investing these funds in various public and private instruments in the province of Ontario, the income earned on these funds helps to keep general insurance premiums at low levels." I think car drivers would question that part of it. "Thus, as it stands, the Ontario public benefits in two ways. First, the funds are used to finance the provincial economy and, second, help to bring about lower insurance premiums."

What they are saying really is that our insurance friends know better than the elected representatives of the people what to do with insurance policies which have not been claimed. We are talking about a lot of money.

London Life asked—what a nerve—"that you exempt our industry from the act's application." They did not say why; they just asked to be exempted.

All of these companies operate in Quebec, every one of them. In Quebec, for many years they have had a law called the Public Curatorship Act. The public curator is the equivalent of our public trustee. All moneys from life insurance policies that have not been claimed go to the public curator and have for years. Yet they ask us here in Ontario—we are so dumb—that they should be exempted from it.

Under Ontario's Insurance Act, it says—without boring you with the reading of the legal doubletalk—that an insurer may apply to the court for an order for payment into court. He may do it, not that he must do it. Believe me, they do not do it. The operative word is "may." They just keep the money.

To give you an idea of the kind of money we are talking about, this was an ad that was in the New York Times, April 1990. You need a magnifying glass to read that thing, but that is one company, the United States Life Insurance Co, in one state. Those are people who had not claimed their life insurance policies and all this money went to the state—one company, one state. We are talking megabucks. In New York state in 1986, which is the latest year for which I have figures, $5.7 million went from life insurance companies to the administrator of abandoned funds in that state.

The Insurance Bureau also finally admitted that it could live with five years of retroactivity, but I am going to try to make a point and convince you that that is nowhere near good enough.

The investment dealers' association is a little more candid. They say, "The practice has been to bring the balance in the unclaimed property account into income of the dealer." They have a lot of money from dividends that people do not claim. The stock is in the broker's name and they do not know whose money it is. There is a lot of it.

"The proceeds from unclaimed property may have been distributed long ago to the shareholders of the dealer." In other words, they just helped themselves to it. At least they are candid enough to say it.

Barclays Bank: Let me quote from their presentation, "Our objection is that when applied to travellers cheques the act results in an unjustified confiscation by the government of part of the sole consideration which is received by the issuer of travellers cheques for the services it provides." In other words, they count on people not cashing these travellers cheques and they just keep the money.

1210

Mind you, they do not point out that American Express has just made heaps of money. They live with the US law and in every state of the union, I should say 48 of the 50, the money for these uncashed travellers cheques goes directly to the abandoned property, but Barclays does not think it can afford to do that.

The racetracks of Ontario, now they are a great group, but at least they are really candid. They say they just help themselves to these uncashed cheques, and they out and out say it; not only that, but they give the figures. They are really good people. The Ontario Jockey Club right here in Toronto, for example, in 1989 scored $966,000. Would you believe it? How many of you throw away those tickets? I have done it loads of time. Well, it was $966,000 in 1989. No wonder the late E. P. Taylor liked to own racetracks. Anyway, ladies and gentlemen, I respectfully suggest to you that with their own words we have caught them with their hands very, very deep in the cookie jar.

Last November Premier Bob Rae said, "We're practical people who frankly can add." He was referring to his NDP colleagues and I sure hope they can, because I can convince anybody that we have at least $200 million that we can scoop for the good people of this province by applying this act retroactively as it presently reads. That is what it presently reads. We do not have to change a thing.

The abandoned money belongs to the government of Ontario; at least, the government of Ontario and the people of Ontario have a better claim on this than anybody else. This goes back in the common law to the Middle Ages, that abandoned property belonged to the Queen. I suggest we tell our friends here—look at them all—"Here's what we're going to do. You know perfectly well from your books over the years—and don't tell us you don't, because we know you do—buried in your the books it says how much money each year you have scooped from unclaimed property.” And you believe that every single one of them would know it. Let them keep the interest they have earned on this money over the years. Can you imagine what it would amount to? There were years when interest rates were at 20%; this money would have doubled, tripled, quadrupled and dear knows what. Let them keep it. Give the capital to this province to ease the burden of the taxpayers of this province.

That is my presentation, ladies and gentlemen. I respectfully give it to you. I know what I am talking about. I hope you have some questions.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Howes, I am familiar with the presentations you made some time ago to Mr Nixon before the bill was introduced and I wonder if could you give us some estimate of your experience, although you have been operating in the private sector, of the collection costs?

Mr Howes: Yes, I sure could.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay; I think that would be interesting.

Mr Howes: You will have to bear with me for a moment, Mrs Sullivan, because I have it here. It is approximately 6%. There is only one state that breaks it down.

Mr Sutherland: There is reference in your brief here. It says New York has 6%.

Mr Howes: I do not think it is New York.

Mr Sutherland: On the very last page.

Mr Howes: Yes, 6% and, after all, surely that sounds like a reasonable sum. What is involved, after all? We tell these custodians, “Come up with the money.” In the state of Pennsylvania they have quite a few collectors out beating the bushes, getting this money in, and they found that it works great, because it will come as no surprise that people are not too keen on shelling it out. Does that answer your question?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes, thank you.

Mr Howes: It is the only state I can speak of, but common sense says that it should not be very expensive. It is one big money spinner. It is the second-largest source of income for many, if not most of the states. We are talking about big, big money. Would somebody like an estimate as to what we would get in this province, because I can give it to you?

Mrs Sullivan: I suppose I was asking the question because I was just doing some calculations. You have talked about the jockey club, for instance. They plow, say, $1 million a year back into their revenues. They also receive funding from the province, so presumably provincial funding would have to be made up for the lack of the availability of that $1 million.

Mr Howes: It is a profit-making organization, Mrs Sullivan. I do not know why it should be.

Mrs Sullivan: That is interesting.

Mr Howes: E. P. Taylor, God rest his soul, was no public benefactor and he controlled it.

Mrs Sullivan: We could argue about that, but I am thinking about the context of an Ontario Jockey Club operation or the Ontario Racing Commission which receives funding and probably would have to get more funding; I do not know.

Mr Howes: Mrs Sullivan, with respect, I would suggest that perhaps we should speak more of where the real big money is, the trust companies that fought so hard not to have it retroactive, and the life insurance companies particular. We are talking about so much money. Would anybody like a very calculated guess as to how much we are talking about? Would it interest you?

Mr Sutherland: Actually, that was my question. You said $200 million retroactively.

Mr Howes: I am being really conservative.

Mr Sutherland: I want to know what your estimate would be on an annual basis, ignoring the retroactivity.

Mr Howes: At the very least $25 million, and probably double that on an annual basis. Let me tell you how I arrived at this figure. Delaware gets in $10 and change per person. New York gets $11 and change per person. The reason for that is that Delaware is the major state of incorporation of companies in the US, as is New York the major commercial centre.

Ontario is both those things, so we have every reason to think that our take should be approximately theirs, not to mention that this is a major resource province and there is much income from the likes of gold mines and so on. Believe me, it is my business. I know what I am talking about, ladies and gentlemen, I really do. Anyway, cut it in half. Supposing we can only do half as well as New York or Delaware. That is $5 per person times nine million is $45 million on a continuing basis. All kinds of money sliding through the cracks. I make my living out of it.

Mr Kwinter: I would just like to make a couple of comments. I have no problem with the act as it was passed—I am glad—and I have no problem with the concept. Where I do have a problem is that you have painted absolutely black and white and it does not work that way. Let me give you the reverse, to use your analogy and put it in the simplistic terms that you have placed.

Mr Howes: I did not understand it any other way, Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Let me just give you an example. At the present time you are talking about all of these unclaimed assets, that if we had only clamped down and got them all we would have this $25-million bonanza, whatever it is.

Mr Howes: Much more, hundreds of millions.

Mr Kwinter: Whatever, that is fine, whatever the amount is. On the other side, we have a situation in our economy where every major retailer, whether it be Shopers Drug Mart or Canadian Tire, factors in as a fact of life that they have shoplifting, and shoplifting ranges anywhere from 6% to 10% to 12% of their annual sales. Those costs are staggering. You could make exactly the same argument that, my God, if we could only have armed guards at every single store and put everybody under surveillance and do a strip search, we would save this enormous incredible amounts of money.

What I am saying is that what you are saying, in principle, I agree with, but I think there is another factor. Let's take your example of the jockey club. The jockey club is not hiding the fact it has this money. It is not saying, "This money is something we put in our pocket." It declares it in its statements and it says that for every dollar that is spent, there is X% that does not get claimed. It uses it as income, but it is also liable. In 20 years' time, if you come back and you have that ticket, it will pay it.

I am not justifying the fact it is using it, but what I do want to point out is the fact that you are implying that E. P. Taylor and his heirs have this sort of scheme going where they are pocketing this money. What is going to happen if that money does revert—and under the act, it would—to the crown? It will then say: "Traditionally and historically we have had X dollars available to us in our operations. We can't hide it. We declare it. We show it. If we don't have it, then we're going to have to compensate. We're going to have to increase all of our charges to make up that shortfall."

I can tell you—again it just happens we are talking about an area I am very familiar with—contrary to what you are saying, the racing industry in Ontario does not make a lot of money. The Ontario Jockey Club in particular is a non-profit organization and it really is. I am not crying for these guys, because I can tell you that if you are poor you are not in that business. It is the sport of kings. It is a rich man's hobby. But if anyone thinks they are getting into the racing business to make money, he will be sadly mistaken. The people that are in it are in it because it is something they enjoy doing and they—whatever turns you on.

The point I am making is that it is not just black and white. If you flip it from one side of the balance sheet to the other there will automatically be a compensation. Whatever industry it is, whether it is the insurance industry or whatever else will say: "Fine. We've had this money. We declare it. We show it. We use it as part of our operating expense."

Mr Howes: No, they do not declare it and they do not show it. Believe me, they do not.

Mr Kwinter: I think it is on their balance sheet. I cannot see how it cannot be.

Mr Howes: No sir, it is not.

Mr Kwinter: How could it not be? The banks all show it.

Mr Howes: That is because the banks have to send it to the Bank of Canada.

Mr Kwinter: I know, but I used to be the Minister of Financial Institutions. I can tell you—

Mr Howes: Mr Kwinter, that is my business.

Mr Kwinter: It may be your business, but I am telling you that when an insurance company has income and expenditures, it is audited. They are subject to inspection by the department of insurance, and if there is an amount in there it is shown. It is shown as unredeemed benefits, whatever. There is a figure in there.

I am not saying that they are not benefiting from the interest that accrues and all of that stuff, and you may not agree with it and I do not agree with it. That is why the act was passed. We are not arguing. I am just saying that you are portraying these people as somehow or other being involved in some subterfuge. All you are doing is you are arguing the principle that that money should not be theirs, and that act addresses that. Your next argument is why it was not proclaimed. That I cannot answer.

Mr Howes: I can. I can answer it. Do you want to ask me?

Mr B. Ward: I just have a quick question, Mr Howes. Tough economic times are facing the province. We are exploring all avenues of increasing revenue or opportunities for revenue and you are suggesting that this is one avenue that should be explored and examined, and the fact that there is a bill drafted makes it that much easier.

Mrs Sullivan: It is passed.

Mr B. Ward: It is passed? It was just never proclaimed. Why was it not proclaimed in your opinion?

Mr Howes: Exactly.

Mr B. Ward: It is on the books. I do not know. But that this is something that we should look at as a committee is what you are trying to say.

Mr Howes: That is what I am begging you to do, and not to go for this baloney about the retroactivity. I beg you, have no pity on them. They do not deserve it.

Maybe a case could be made for the racetracks, Mr Kwinter. Let them keep their million a year. But how about Hal Jackman and his National Trust? Should he be here rattling a tin cup? Or put it this way—I tell you, the essence of the problem is this: Can these people whose money it is not, handle it better than the elected representatives of the people of this province? That is what it boils down to. It is not their money. They should not have it. Can they handle it better? Can these insurance companies? Do you take pity on them?

The Chair: I would really rather not get into that philosophical debate here. Are there any other questions? Seeing none, I would like to thank you for bringing this issue to our attention and I am sure we will be debating this again a little later on.

Mr Howes: Listen, when they turn up, would you ask them? Ask them. It is all here.

Interjection.

Mr Howes: Isn't that a laugh? Do you want to see it? Here, this is a classic.

The Chair: For the entertainment value, if any would like to continue the discussion with Mr Howes, that is fine. I am going to adjourn this committee until 1:30 pm; we have moved things up a little. So thank you very much. We will see you.

The committee recessed at 1225.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1341 in room 228.

The Chair: Just prior to beginning the afternoon session, I would like to read the response from the governor of the Bank of Canada to our request that he come to meet with us and, failing his coming to meet with us, to send a designate to meet with us. I will circulate this and I will just read the part that I believe is pertinent:

"While the Bank of Canada has of necessity to limit the number and scope of public appearances by the governor and other officers, it nevertheless firmly subscribes to the view that its policies and actions should be widely available to public scrutiny and discussion. To that end, above and beyond his appearances before Commons and Senate committees, the governor gives public speeches on monetary policy and the economy on a regular basis. The bank also publishes regularly that part of the minutes of its board meetings having to do with economic and financial developments and monetary policy. I can add that the governor's annual report to the Minister of Finance also represents a key element of the public record and is usually discussed at public hearings of parliamentary committees once it has been tabled in Parliament.

"Accordingly, while it is not possible to meet your specific request, I would be most happy to send to you or to Mr Decker forthwith a full range of the material to which I have just referred, if you, as we, think it would be helpful. My telephone number..." and so on.

I will put on the record my own view of this. It is that while all this information is useful and I think we should request it, I do not believe it will answer the salient question that this committee must deal with, and that is the projections of the Bank of Canada for the coming year, and the questions I feel we could have asked, being what does he foresee the value of the Canadian dollar being, the interest rate and the growth of the economy by the end of the year?

Would any other members like to have their comments on the official record?

Mr B. Ward: Just for clarification, we are requesting the material that the Bank of Canada is willing to provide to us? Is that right?

The Chair: Yes, we are.

Mr Christopherson: Just briefly, it is just disappointing that when this committee and the government, quite frankly, and the Treasurer, have gone to such great pains to talk about public consultation, to go through a procedure that allows everyone to have a say—and we have heard that from the people who have come before us—an integral part of that is the federal policies of the national bank and they have not come forward to expand on those issues and allow us a chance to question them. I realize they are concerned about this being an inquisition, but that is kind of the political downside of an open, public process.

It just needs to be said that it is a great disappointment that the Prime Minister would support and allow that type of attitude and approach to a serious provincial initiative such as pre-budgetary consultation in the fashion that we have undertaken here. I do not think it would be inappropriate for a letter—procedurally, I do not know if I am in order or not; I would look to those who have been here much longer than I—from you or from an appropriate minister to express our disappointment to the Prime Minister that there is not even a delegate here. I can understand if the individual cannot attend, but that not even a delegation would be here, since we are hearing that federal interest rates and the federal dollar have such a significant impact on everything we are looking at. I would hope we could take something stronger in terms of action other than just putting on the record our official disappointment.

The Chair: I would entertain that in the form of a motion, if there is a seconder. Is there any discussion on that? Do we have consensus on that?

Mr Sutherland: Just as a point of clarification, is not the Bank of Canada governor under the Minister of Finance? So probably it should go directly to the Minister of Finance.

The Chair: Copies to both?

Mr Sutherland: Sure.

Mrs Sullivan: I think you have to be careful about looking silly in these things. The governor of the Bank of Canada is not subject to the whim of this committee. It is a national body. He reports to Parliament through the Minister of Finance. We want to see a policy direction rather than an opportunity for grandstanding, a policy direction that is a result of policy decisions coming out of the federal government. It may be appropriate to invite Mr Wilson to appear, because that clearly is where the policy is coming from. I think we have to be realistic about the role of the Bank of Canada and its ties and obligations to this committee such as ours, as well. You might want to invite Mr Wilson to appear.

The Chair: Do we have a consensus on inviting Mr Wilson to appear?

Mr Christopherson: I agree with just about everything the previous speaker said. I am just as concerned, maybe even a little more so, about how we might look publicly since I am a member of the government side of the House. Obviously, if anything looked political, it would be to invite the Finance minister. Again, the intention, at least on my part, was not to bring in someone from the bank to grandstand or put him on the spot, but I would really like to hear first hand his rationale, not just a policy paper. But we could also put the kind of questions that are being put to us, especially in the area of the high interest rates and the dollar.

I do not profess to be an expert on the federal economic system. However, my understanding is that Mr Wilson has continually taken a position, and the Prime Minister also, that they cannot and/or will not direct Mr Crow to do their bidding and that it is a relatively autonomous institution that makes its own decisions based on how it sees the economy and what screws need to be tightened and loosened and when. I still feel comfortable sending etter expressing our disappointment to the Prime Minister that Mr Crow would take this position and that no one, not even a representative from the bank, would be here. I would rather leave it at that and would not feel so comfortable with the recommendation of the previous speaker.

The Chair: Is there a consensus? If I understand it, the motion is I should write a letter expressing our disappointment that they would not come, and request all the information that is—

Mr B. Ward: May we have a clarification of Mrs Sullivan's suggestion of an amendment—or is it just a suggestion?—that we invite Michael Wilson?

Mrs Sullivan: We do not have consensus. I mean, we might have consensus, but you have a dissenter.

The Chair: I have one dissenter, or two dissenters.

Mr Kwinter: If you are going to write the letter and say that you are disappointed and “send out the information,” I see no problem with that, if that is all you are going to say.

The Chair: Okay, then I will undertake that, and I think we should begin our afternoon presentations.

HALT INCREASING TAXES

The Chair: We have Halt Increasing Taxes; Bill Adler, chairman, and Frank Cawkell. If you would begin your presentation, please.

Mr Cawkell: Thank you, Mr Chairman. We are the Richmond Hill Halt Increasing Taxes organization. We are located in the town of Richmond Hill, representing a number of ratepayers' associations for 1,300 homes at this time, but growing, within York region and the town of Richmond Hill.

The motion we bring before you today is really that we hope to see budget increases coming out of all levels of government no higher than the level of inflation and that could be a maximum or a ceiling on such increases.

What we are seeing today and the discomfort we see within the taxpaying groups we represent is really that we need to eliminate programs which are putting a burden on taxpayers. We recognize that we are in a recession, as we all do. We, like everyone in this room, are taxpayers, and we are willing to tighten our belts provided we are given leadership and help to do that by the governments.

We have seen over the last number of years what we feel has been communicated to us as a downloading by the federal government on the provincial, and the provincial on to the lower levels of government. That is a concern to us because the buck ends up stopping at the taxpayers. The way the lower levels of government are collecting those extra dollars is effectively through our own house taxes, which, being taxpayers, is really the place where we are most vulnerable. We do not have the options in paying house taxes that we do in paying federal and provincial taxes in terms of deductions and methods of payment.

What we feel we are seeing today are various levels of government effectively downloading, passing the buck, a lot of finger pointing. Ultimately the taxpayer is still paying the same type of tax dollar and taxes are still going up, they are not going down, so the burden is being shifted. It is being shifted right down to the home owner—not just to the general taxpayer but to the home owner—at the municipal level of governments.

What we would like to see and hope to see is a true reduction in total taxes at all levels of government, some of the things that we feel we have seen certainly in businesses today looking at opportunities to eliminate waste, to really not shuffle money when we make a savings—“Oh good, I've saved some money here, now I can spend it there”—but effectively to eliminate it. There is nothing wrong with coming in under budget at the end of a year, and a lot under budget if we can. We should be commended on that within government.

A presidential mindset in budgeting: We feel that if every one of us in this room, when we spend any money, but particularly, hopefully, within levels of government, spending money and budgeting money, each dollar should be looked at as if it came out of our personal pocket. We should be asking the question, “Would I spend this money if it was only mine and coming out of my personal budget?” We need that type of responsibility in government today.

Zero-base budgeting approach is a buzzword I am sure a lot of us are familiar with. We see it in business more and more today. The days of saying “What did I spend last year? Great, inflation's 5%; we'll add that on and I'll start there. I've got that much money to start,” those days should be over. What we spent last year is immaterial. We should be justifying what we are spending in our budgeting process from a zero base, now justifying and working out every dollar that we are spending. What we spent last year is immaterial. If the program cannot be justified in 1991, although it may have been in 1990, it should not be in the budget. Only with that type of approach can we effectively minimize the increases we are seeing in budgeting.

As we all know, and as we have listed here, these are recessionary times. We, as a group, have started and have been in existence for two years. We have been going to the municipal levels of government as a start, to our own town councillors, regional members of government, councillors, mayors within the York region, to the school boards, realizing that in the lower levels of government the school boards are a large chunk of the house taxpayers' tax dollar, going to them to get their commitment on a similar motion.

We need this type of responsibility from government. We need this leadership from government, and we hope it will be very refreshing that we will all stand up and be counted. Certainly the days of finger-pointing to other levels of government need to stop. We need to see people stand up and say, “I will take on this challenge.” We hope that your committee and the provincial government will do so.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, thanks for coming forward. I have a property tax coalition in my riding of Oxford. We talked about the issues. I engaged in a lot of discussion with people in my riding about these issues and how we pay for some of them. What you are saying is, no one likes to pay more taxes. That is granted. We all realize that fact. But there are a lot of realities. There are growing needs out there.

Within this province, and certainly within this country, we have said that there are basic values and things that we think are very important that should be provided. We had the Ministry of Health this morning and we talked about the health care system and other areas, public education. They take up the largest portion of the budget. I guess my sense is that, having these values about how these public systems should be, is it your impression that people want to have those values, want to have those things but may not be willing to pay the price for them? That is not meant to be on an individual basis, but in the sense of a public system and public taxation, which seems to be the acceptable way in the values of funding many of these systems.

Mr Cawkell: Yes. A lot of the public, we feel generally, always ask for more, and we always will; we always have for the last number of years. We feel, given the right understanding as to where that "more" is coming from, that now the public is effectively at a breaking point, where, "Yes, I would love to have another nurse in every hospital, but if that extra nurse is going to cost me X dollars more, I am to a point today in this environment where I can understand where maybe I will have to put that request on hold."

Mr Sutherland: I want to come to the education issue. We certainly know about the downloading on to the municipalities, and you talked about provincially mandated programs, and certainly education is the area where it has come. I want to give some credit to the past government. Some of those initiatives have been positive, because the scientific evidence of smaller classrooms, particularly at the lower grades, and things of that nature are very positive.

I am of the opinion that if we are not willing to make the commitment to education at all levels, skills development and retraining right now, then we are not going to have a healthy economy later on. You can hold the tax base, you can hold your taxes on the issue of education and you can try to stop that, but I think you are jeopardizing our future economic wellbeing if you do that too much.

I am just wondering if you would care to comment on that aspect, that in some ways, even if you cut out the waste, education funding overall probably has to be increasing because, while there have been some gains made, this province and this country are far behind the rest of the world in what they are spending on that specific area.

Mr Cawkell: From what I have seen, although I have no figures in front of me, I beg to differ that we are behind other countries in the world. There have been a number of people who have said that we actually, among the seven largest industrialized nations in the world, spend almost the most on education, yet our educational dropout rate in the high schools is one of the highest at 30%. I would argue that we have been throwing money at education for a number of years. Do I see a good bang for my buck? No, I do not.

Yes, we are in a dilemma and we are in a tough position. I do not feel that throwing money at a problem will solve it. I feel that highly motivated and innovative individuals will solve that problem. I feel that you can do a lot more, when properly motivated, with the same amount of money. Money is not the answer. We feel, as an organization, that perhaps in the past we have said money is the answer. I think where Canada is today has shown that maybe it is not, and I would say education is an example of that. Although the provincial government, true, has cut back its funding to education, education funding in total has still gone up over the last number of years. So we have not effectively cut back our money, I do not believe, over the last number of years.

Mr B. Ward: First of all, I would like to thank you for taking the time to come down to express your opinions on behalf of the Richmond Hill citizens.

There are two components I would like you to attempt to address or perhaps give us greater detail on. I think you are opposed to the concept, whether it is federal or provincial, primarily those two, where a program is implemented and is forced on a municipality and yet the proper funding does not flow with it. You would like to see a cessation of that type of policy as far as provincial or federal governments are concerned. Is that correct?

Mr Cawkell: That is correct.

Mr B. Ward: You have dealt with the municipality of Richmond Hill to a degree, I guess. You have made presentations. In the brief that we have, you have "Elimination of programs putting burden on taxpayers." Part of the difficulty of being a politician is that if you have to decide to make a cut, where do you cut? What programs do you cut out? Each program affects an individual or group of individuals. As a politician, you receive a lot of pressure from special interest groups. Do you have any suggestions that pertain to Richmond Hill that you see could be cut? Do you have any specific programs that could be cut? It is easy to talk about it, but do you have any suggestions as far as the provincial government is concerned?

Mr Cawkell: We do not at this time. Our intent here was not to put forward any detailed programs about what could be cut. Rather than going to governments or school boards, where there are trustees we have elected on our behalf to monitor the expenditures in the school board rather than come forward and try to analyse their board or analyse the government in detail, and come forward with specific suggestions at this time, we have chosen not to do that. We feel we are not the experts. I do not pretend to be an expert in provincial budgeting. I do not pretend to be an expert, and our group is not, in municipal government budgeting.

However, we feel we need to generate an awareness among the governments and the trustees and the school boards that it is time to cut back, it is time to watch the money we are spending and be accountable for that money. Our position with all levels of government we have been with is that we are not averse to looking into areas and commenting on programs that could be cut. Asking trustees in the school board is an example, where they have come to us and said just that, "What would you cut?"

he said, "Well, give us some figures and we'll go through them together with you and talk about it." But at this time we are not really in a position to say this program or that program should be cut.

Mr B. Ward: So at this time you do not really have any programs that are not serving any purpose in Richmond Hill?

Mr Cawkell: No.

Mr B. Ward: You have not done a great deal in your citizens' organization? You do not have the resources to go to it.

Mr Cawkell: That is correct. I guess we could say that all programs we have initiated serve some benefit, as you pointed out earlier. There will always be an interest group. In any program, someone is taking advantage of it and seeing a benefit from it; at least I hope they would be. Our main point is that when times are in a recession, we need to trim those programs back. It may not be elimination of any given program, it may be just trimming across the board. That is the type of thing we need to be looking at.

Mr Sadler: I would like to answer your questions, Mr Ward and Mr Sutherland. Having gone around to a lot of the home owners and the home owners' associations, we find that the programs are those the minority want. God bless them, they get up and shout and get in touch with the members of Parliament and the local municipalities. The majority sit back and do nothing but complain and hope that maybe Frank and I will carry the ball for them.

However, we found out in the last election that the majority actually did speak out. I think the results are known. We are saying to the elected officials at the boards and at the municipal level and here, bear in mind that there are programs that are not essential and that should be cut. As Frank has so well put it, we have elected you people and we want you to make that decision. If we can help you, then we are here to do so.

One of the things that worried us was a comment made by the ex-director of the school business and finance branch. This was after he was an elected official. He stated that the local property tax was the easiest and best way to finance education, because there were so few complaints from the public. That is the type of thing that worries the hell out of us.

Mr Stockwell: It is very difficult for people such as this HIT group to come in and offer definitive program cuts. It is very difficult to ask an association to come in and do that. That is why we were supposed to be elected. I have always thought that we are supposed to offer them, and if we cannot find them, then the public does not think we are doing a good job and they find people who can find them—or maybe they do not want to find them at all. Those are the things you find out when an election rolls around.

On the other side of the equation, you can say the people come in looking for money. We don't say to them, "Well, you tell us where we should tax to get the money to give you." Nobody ever asks that question. We just try and find the money somewhere. If we cannot find it, we cannot find it; if we can, we can. But no one puts them on the spot, saying: "Should we increase the price of beer or tobacco? You tell us where to get the money."

It is not really a fair question to ask associations. They are doing this in their spare time, this is literally a job they are doing for free—unlike ourselves, of course.

The other point I would like to make with respect to HIT, maybe not so much a question as a comment, is that your definition of a priority and government's definition of a priority are different. To people in the private sector who are in business, if something is a priority then it gets money and certain areas do not get money. That is how you define your priorities. The trouble with government is: "We have 28 priorities. Everybody gets more money." I think that is what the HIT program in Etobicoke is in fact suggesting, and the downloading is a long, debatable argument that will have more finger-pointing every time you enter into the discussion.

I would like to make a point with respect to where you make your cuts. I do not know if you even need to cut; maybe it is simply hold the line. A perfect example, though, is that the Minister of Labour today announced a program for new job training. Here is the Minister of Labour announcing new job training programs. What the heck do we have a Skills Development ministry for? We are spending $400 million on a Skills Development ministry and we have the Minister of Labour announcing new skills development programs. There is a bit of redundancy there, duplication.

There are some examples that could be taken by this HIT group and given to you, but I do not really think it is fair to say to every group that comes in here, if they are asking you to hold the line on taxes, "Where would you find the money?" I think we are supposed to be elected to do that.

Mr Kwinter: One of the most common comments I get, particularly out in the business community, is, "If you guys would only run the government the way we run our business, everything would be great." Most businessmen have about three obligations. One is to their bank manager, one is to their wife and one is to their shareholders. If it is a matter of not being able to afford to do it, you just cut it out and that is it. It does not matter what the repercussions are as long as those three particular groups are happy.

In government it is not that easy. We are accountable to over nine million shareholders, and everyone thinks their priority is as important or more important than everyone else's. The genius of government is how you mobilize the resources that are available, both natural resources and economic resources, all of the things that are there, to try to do the most good for the most people. That is very difficult. It is very difficult, considering that we are in a situation where the rules keep changing.

At one time we lived in a very comfortable little niche where what we did in Ontario affected what happened in Ontario, with very little outside pressure. We are now into a global economy. To give you an example: R and D. If you talk to anybody who is looking at our competitiveness, R and D is the critical factor and unless we invest more in R and D we are going to fall by the wayside, we are not going to be as competitive, our standard of living is going to deteriorate and we have to devote money to it.

At present, the United States is the highest spender on R and D in the world, at about 3% of gross domestic product. Japan is second at 2.8%. Canada is at 1.3%. In Ontario we are a little better, at 1.7%. You can imagine where Canada would be without the Ontario component, because 60% of all the R and D is done in Ontario.

We are woefully underspending and it is going to impact on us. Unless we get that spending level up, we are going to find that we are less and less competitive. Someone recently referred to Canada as a Third World country with illusions of grandeur. We are trying to maintain a standard of living that is comparable to the leading industrial and economic jurisdictions in the world and saying, "Let's do it, but let's not spend the money that is required to do it."

I agree that anybody can look at government and say, "That program is getting money and it is unwarranted, and we should put more money somewhere else," but I think it is a simplistic sort of solution to say there should not be any more spending because it is impacting on the taxpayer. Under our system, anything we do impacts on the taxpayer. The role of government, as I say, is to get the biggest bang for the buck and to be accountable to those taxpayers.

You are presenting a point of view and I appreciate it, but I can tell you there will be 10 other groups that will come in and present another point of view in saying, "I want more of this," and, "I want a share in this thing. There is an élite that gets the major benefits of all of the things that are happening and we are shut out," for whatever reason, whether it is cultural, racial or economic. They want a piece of the pie. That is the problem we have.

As I say, I am totally sympathetic with the basic concept of saying there should be value for money. But I really think it is a little simplistic to say: "Hold your expenditures down. Go back to zero-base budgeting. The increase should only be the rate of inflation." If you do that, you are really relegating us to a non-competitive situation, because there are intangibles. If you are going to attract investment, it is more than just monetary. It is quality of life, it is the environment, it is all of these things, and there is a cost. You have to decide how much you can pay and how you allocate the sharing of that payment. That, as I say, is the genius of government or the folly of government—whatever.

Mr Cawkell: If I may respond to that, I think one point you made is very valid. The playing field we are on is changing all the time. We cannot agree more. Therefore, the need every year is to re-evaluate where the money is best spent, the best bang for the buck, as you said. R and D is one area, there is no question. It should be an area of focus for the government. It may not have been and probably was not five years ago.

What we are hoping is that we do not see a need to go beyond inflation, as long as we are letting go of what were yesterday's focuses. Are we letting go of the things that 5, 10 years ago were important, be they increases in social programs, where we increase spending. Are we letting go of those and then changing our focus to make sure we are competitive? If we see R and D spending being that area, so be it, it takes a priority. Are we letting go of money we spent in the past? We understand it is not easy. Being a government is not something that is very easy. At the other end, though, we really have to be able to let go of some areas to satisfy the taxpayers the best we can. When we cannot or when it may be in question, hopefully we will educate those taxpayers.

I guess one of things that even a lot of members of our group two years ago did not understand was how the money went, drawing the connection to, "Well, we wanted this program; therefore, I can't have this," or "therefore my taxes go up." Sometimes that connection was not always being made. If someone is coming in for money for a program, it is very simplistic to say, "If you get that where would you get it from?" but at the other end, it may help to facilitate an educational process within the public.

Yes, we need a number of the things you indicated: social programs and what not, to draw investment, but at the other end, as you pointed out, potentially in Ontario and in Canada we are running on a standard of life that we cannot support, and we are supporting it with government money. If we are going to be competitive in the long run we have to refocus where we are putting that money.

As we said earlier, throwing money at everything is not the way to do it. The zero-base approach is simply: What is most important? What is the best bang for our buck? How are we going to be competitive? Cutting back on the other end and then educating the people so that they understand, instead of selling ourselves as a government and saying, "Look at all the great things we are doing"—please do not be afraid to say, "We have to cut back here and we are doing some bad things, but here is why."

Mr Sadler: The point on R and D is very valid. I am retired and I love Ontario and plan to live here for the rest of my life. I have grandchildren and I have daughters and sons in Ontario, so I want to see us become very competitive. But if we put the money there then we have to find that someplace where we spent it before is not necessary.

We met with our member of Parliament in York and the comment was: "There is waste in any system. One thing I know about politicians is that ultimately they get their sense of authority by spending money." That is really, I guess, what the message today is. We do not mean to say that all the gentlemen around here feel the same way, but it is a fact.

I worked for a company. I was very selfish. I wanted to get as much as I could until the president of the company said—as you said—"I have to answer to shareholders." They might have been a lot less than the government has to answer to, but nevertheless he admitted: "There is waste in our company and we have to get rid of it. I won't tell the shareholders that. I only tell them what I want to tell them but I want to make damned sure when you put your budget together that you take that waste out of the system so I can give you a better increase in your salary and those working on your behalf."

Mrs Sullivan: There has been ample and interesting testimony before this committee relating to recommended actions by the government in dealing with the downturn in the economy we are facing. The recommendations from the economists have been that there be stimulatory spending, both in capital areas and in social areas, including training of workers and such areas as Mr Kwinter has addressed so eloquently, research and development.

Given the acceptance of those recommendations by government, there are two places where money can come from to pay for that. One is through new taxes; the other is through new debt. I would be interested in hearing your views on increasing the provincial debt.

Mr Cawkell: We would not be in favour of increasing the provincial debt. As we all know around this room, it is one of the reasons we, as a country, are in trouble today. I could, however, turn back, as I have with Mr Kwinter, that spending money on R and D and spending money on job training is the way we want to go. We do not want to be spending money supporting companies that cannot carry their load, and we are doing that at the other end of the spectrum. Such are the programs that we need to let go of.

Again, we are not here to say let's not spend money. We are not saying that at all. We are saying we had a large budget last year and we are looking for a 4% to 5% increase this year, thank you very much. If we need to go above that, then we really need to go back and see where we spend the money.

We can add R and D to the budget and increase the spending there. I would be all in favour of that. But, at the other end our message is that something else will have to go. The public needs to understand and needs to agree, as Mr Kwinter did so eloquently point out, that without this spending and this focus on R and D, our children will not have an effective country to live in.

Mrs Sullivan: I just want to clarify this. You seem to be leading us to the position that your view is that social spending should be cut. Is that your view?

Mr Cawkell: No. We are not cutting any given program, but our view is that we need to evaluate all the programs we do spend on, whether it be social spending, R and D, whether it be support for companies—we do a lot of work in the government where we support companies that are in trouble and lend them money for programs. There are a lot of things. We have our fingers in a lot of pies. What we would like to see, as taxpayers, is that we effectively evaluate those pies and then go back and ask where our money is best spent.

Social programs may be at the top of the list. When all is said and done, our nine million shareholders may say, "We need our social programs." So be it. Maybe we do not get the R and D spending. But if we do not get the R and D spending, I would hope our government would explain to the taxpayers without such spending the type of state our country may be in in the long term, the repercussions; that we make that trade-off and educate the people, to go that way. Potentially, with that understanding, with that knowledge, the taxpayers may very well say, "Well, then, turn back the social programs a little bit and spend more money on R and D."

I do not have that answer, but that is the type of decision-making process that we hoped the government would take.

Mr Sadler: Mrs Sullivan, I think what we are really saying is that it is priorities. You are the elected officials. We assume and we feel confident that you are the right people to make the decision as to where the priorities are and where the money should be spent. Going into debt, I am against it, personally. I see it in our own area up there. People are out of jobs. They are going bankrupt. To go further into debt and put a higher mortgage on their home, is that the answer? You have got to face your problem. You have to recognize that sooner or later you have to pay back that dollar.

Some of you were just having the motion, when we first came in, about the Canadian dollar and the rate of interest which affects not only government, but affects us, people who have mortgages, people who borrowed funds. There are more and more individuals going bankrupt and losing their homes. That is our priority in Ontario. We do not want to see that. We have seen a small town, Blenheim, that had a very effective tax revolt and said: "No more. We don't want it any more." They were successful.

I do not think that people are actually against the GST if those funds were being used to reduce the debt. As it has been said in the paper, you know and we know that if the money gets into their hands, it is going to go to other things. That was not the idea of the GST, and I am afraid that is what is going to happen. Really the message is, "We are not in favour of debt," if that answers your questions, and the reasons behind it.

Mr Christopherson: I had a few questions, but the time is going on. Just a very brief comment, Mr Chair, and that is, with a great deal of respect, that I would suggest to the presenters—and I do thank you for your position—I think that role needs to be played, that continuous pressure needs to be put on government, regardless of the party in power, to be watching the tax dollar. That is basically what this is all about, relative to the budget.

But I would say clearly to the submitters that there was an opportunity very recently, in the general election, to adopt the philosophy that said bottom line first, that the bottom line takes precedence over everything else and that from the bottom line you then deduct where you need to. I believe that the public spoke very clearly and it rejected what is basically, to many of us, a simplistic approach that does not reflect the needs of a modern society such as ours. If you need to see that example in action, stay and listen to the next group that I have heard first hand and will hear again and will listen to very attentively, and listen to the kinds of pressures that are there. That is repeated many times over, and very legitimately, by many groups.

The other thing is—and this is the dichotomy—that most people find themselves at one point or another as being on both sides of the fence. All of us rightfully say taxes are too high. We as government should never lose sight of that feeling among the public. But by the same token, there are very few people who at some point do not say, "There should be a law about that," or, "There ought to be a protection," or if your child needs something, we do not say: "That should be provided. Why doesn't the government provide that? There is a real need for that." We do that so many times over and over that I think when you are sitting here and you see all that rushing at you, you begin to understand why the public says, "I reject the idea of bottom line first, but I am not going to let you forget that taxes and the impact they are having on my lifestyle is important." That is why your role is very important.

By way of a suggestion, and it is offered with the greatest amount of respect, I do think that if you want to be very effective—and I think you are very serious. Mr Stockwell makes the point that you are here on your own time. That says a lot about your commitment to this issue. The idea of coming forward with some specifics, although that may not be your role, is perhaps how you can be most effective, because again, I harken back, the idea of bottom line first was rejected by the public. Lord knows that has not been the position of the NDP, and we found ourselves in a majority position at the end of 6 September. So I think that the public has spoken there. What it wants from us now over the next four to five years is good government, to make those decisions that Mr Ward talked about, to do that balancing, that juggling. That is where we need both the carrot and the stick as a government so that we are going in the right direction and the public speaks loudly and effectively when we are going down the wrong road.

I do thank you very much for coming. I have enjoyed your presentation. I hope you continue. You have got an important role to play in the development of this budget and others to come.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for your presentation and your time.

ONTARIO HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is the the Ontario Hospital Association; Brian Birkness, chairman, and Gord Cunningham, president. Welcome.

Mr Birkness: Mr Chairman, thank you for allowing us the opportunity to make this presentation to you today. I would like to introduce myself. I am Brian Birkness. I am a trustee at Scarborough General Hospital and a volunteer, and the volunteer chairman of the volunteer board of the Ontario Hospital Association. With me is Gordon Cunningham, president of the Ontario Hospital Association.

On behalf of Ontario's 224 public hospitals, I would like to thank the committee for inviting the OHA to appear before it today. This is OHA's fifth term as a participant in this budget consultation hearing, and we find it a very useful process.

I would be pleased to explain in detail OHA's request for a 13.2% increase in operating funding for the next fiscal year, but I think that is well covered in our submission. We will certainly be prepared to answer questions on that. I feel it would be more appropriate and useful, in order to assist this committee in its work, if I indicated to you the crucial issues that face Ontario hospitals. Following that, I would be happy to answer questions.

Hospitals are almost solely dependent on government funding. Just over 80% of hospital operating funds come from the government. While municipalities get only 35% and school boards get 45% of their funds from the provincial government, they have the ability to draw on local taxes. We do not have anywhere else to turn to make our funding shortfalls.

The graph at the end of our brief shows that government funding levels have not kept pace with inflation's impact on Ontario's hospitals. Over the past 10 years, there has been a continuous year-to-year shortfall in our funding. The hospitals' share of the health care spending pie has dropped a full 7% over the past 10 years while other areas have increased their share, such as payments to physicians and the Ontario drug benefit program.

Hospitals have little control over most of their operating costs. In addition, they have large costs imposed on them over and above inflation. Many of the increases are due to government-imposed programs, such as pay equity, as yet unresolved for many hospital groups, the employer's health tax and arbitrated wage settlements. As each of you well knows, in 1965 the province of Ontario introduced the Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act, which requires compulsory arbitration of collective bargaining disputes by an independent third party and prohibits strikes and lockouts by hospital employees.

If I might direct your attention to page 8 of our brief, you can see at the bottom of that page the broad categories of typical hospital operating costs and the percentage accounted for by each of those costs. As you can quickly see, approximately 75% of hospital costs are related to salaries. When we speak about opening or closing hospital beds, what we are referring to are the staff salaries required to serve the patients who use that bed. Hospital budgets, because of this, are very sensitive to increased costs brought about by the result of collective bargaining. This is simply a fact. When you have close to 150,000 people working in the hospital sector, they are going to be very sensitive to adjustments in wages.

A graphic example of this is also noted on page 8 of the brief. For employees represented by the Ontario Nurses' Association, ONA, and the Ontario Public Service Employees Union, OPSEU, we have calculated that even a 1% increase in compensation levels above that currently prevailing in the hospital sector and as factored into our model would result in an additional cost of $29.25 million. I would like to repeat that. Every 1% increase will result in an additional cost of $29.25 million.

As well, changes in government legislation and regulations, which increase the cost of hospital operations, have a significant impact on hospital budgets which are already hard pressed by compensation packages and other inflationary factors.

On the subject of alternative care, it has often been suggested that the best way to reduce hospital costs in the long term is to move towards a home-based, non-institutional care program. Let me say once again for the record that w agree conceptually with this approach. It is, however, a notion that sometimes is too easily embraced as a cure-all remedy. To us it is something that is very complicated, involving both massive attitudinal changes among patients and their families, doctors, nurses, hospitals and local communities.

It must be realized by all involved there must be a planned, co-ordinated approach to the kind of reinstitutionalization and decentralization envisioned. As well, in the transition to any such new system, there cannot be allowed to develop any patient-service gap. Without a proper infrastructure in place we could well have 224 different plans, approaches and standards of health care in Ontario. This is where government's role as a co-ordinating and funding body is so crucial if we are to develop an effective and workable system of community care.

At this time, alternative care is not in place. No one knows what the demand is for community services. How much will they cost? How effective will they be? They may very well not reduce health-delivery costs but rather increase them. Hospitals are now playing a key role in the provision of some of these services, such as social services, health promotion, illness prevention, a program of hospitals in the home, women's health centres and other outreach programs. Community hospitals have been very much involved in developing outreach programs and programs of hospitals in the home.

At this time, the OHA is concerned by the lack of overall provincial planning. We suggest that, before the decision is made to commit hundreds of millions of dollars to an alternative system, the government consider the community hospital as key to the delivery of quality, cost-effective, community-based health-care services.

Finally, as I said, hospitals are central to the life of any community. You need only look or you need only think of the 17 or so hospitals that the members of this committee represent and you will realize just how vital they are to your local communities and to your ridings, not just as health providers but as employers and as educators. Local communities are heavily involved as users, suppliers and hospital volunteers. The hospital is central to most communities; I would go so far as to say to all communities. As you look at the needed institutions in your communities, you need your churches, you need your places of education and you need your hospitals.

I hope we have been able to give you some indication of the importance we attach to being a governmental funding priority and the fiscal problems which we face. Our employees expect to be paid as they deserve, government expects us not to incur deficits and the public expects a first-class accessible community hospital system in this province. We hope to satisfy all of these desires. I hope that with your help we can continue to meet those expectations. Thank you very much.

The Chair: I have Mr Phillips first. He is getting on the list because he does not like to be left off.

Mr Phillips: I missed out on a couple yesterday, so I thought I would get my hand up early. First, I congratulate you, Brian, and the volunteers at the Ontario Hospital Association. If you do not mind my telling a little personal story, I was chairman of Scarborough General Hospital and I felt that Scarborough General should play a larger role in the Ontario Hospital Association, so I suggested to Brian that maybe he should go down and just do a little bit. Now look where you are. You must spend half your time on this job, and I think all of us do appreciate the work the volunteers do on behalf of hospitals.

Mr Birkness: And I hold you responsible.

Mr Phillips: And he is a different political stripe, just so you know he is not a—I will not say what, but just different.

Mr Birkness: I changed it a month or so ago.

Mr Phillips: A small, little investor in a New Democratic Party. Things have changed.

Mr Christopherson: Another instant convert.

Mr Phillips: I will get to my question, but I do think it was a thoughtful brief, and your recommendation to us to think carefully about the implementation of community care is a good one, because I think most people embrace it very much, your suggestion of making sure we know where we are going.

My question really is around something that we all know is just going to happen within the next two months. It is very difficult to talk about it because it is collective bargaining. But the reality is that 40% of your budget, I think, is nurses' salaries. I am not being partisan here, but the Premier did go to the Ontario Nurses' Association convention well after the election, well after the finances were in place, and essentially made some very significant commitments to the nurses in terms of salaries. That, in my judgement, will drive your budget, and that is just reality and that is what is expected.

I guess I am just looking for some help from the OHA, and I realize it is difficult in a public forum to provide that, but I know that the pay equity settlement that was reached recently with Sick Kids is I guess $8,000 or $9,000 per nurse. I think there are 50,000 nurses in the hospitals, if I am not mistaken. Can you help us out at all in terms of what we should be, or are we just going to have to let it unfold? Because I just think it is inevitable that there are going to be some tough times over the next three months, understandably, in the negotiations between the hospital association, the government and the nurses. I do not know whether you can be any more helpful than you have been in your brief in terms of the sorts of moneys that we should be anticipating to put into the hospital budget.

Mr Birkness: Gerry, as you know, the brief very clearly sets out what the impact is going to be on salaries if we increase beyond the amount that has been provided for in our calculations, which you are all familiar with and which we have made no bones about, that we have allowed for an 8% increase in these calculations.

The Premier has said that nurses are entitled to reasonable increases. I guess in this economy the obvious question is, what is reasonable? I understand a lot of people are holding the line at—we talk about a zero base, and it might be reasonable not to have your salary cut, I do not know, and certainly I guess that is the issue that the negotiators are going to have to face. Hopefully it can be settled before it reaches arbitration. If it has to go to arbitration, I would believe that the arbitrators are also going to have to deal with that and should be aware of the consequences of these adjustments.

Mr Phillips: I just think, realistically, we should all recognize that either now or three months from now or something like that—because, as you have pointed out, 75% of your budgets are through negotiated settlements—

Mr Birkness: If I could add to that, Gerry, a concern I have is that, as you know, we at the individual hospitals operate on a global budget. Our requested budget is what we hope we would receive from the province, and if we receive that and if we find that the salary increases go beyond that provided and if those are not additionally funded to the hospitals, then once again we find ourselves behind in our funding and in our budgets. We will not be able to meet our budgets.

Mr Christopherson: It is a pleasure again to meet with and hear from you, gentlemen. The only question I want to ask, because I did have the opportunity to ask some questions and listen to some more in-depth discussions when we were with the Treasurer, is that on the last page of your presentation, the second paragraph in, it talks about alternative care, community services. Let me ask, first, are we specifically talking about home care there? By and large, is it what you are talking about; the ability of home care to replace institutional care? Is that the issue there?

Could I ask you then, because I hear conflicting information—on the one hand, there was a general thinking for an awfully long time, relatively unchallenged, that in-the-home care would clearly be cheaper than institutional care, period, full stop. I have now, over the last year or so, begun to hear some people suggesting that this is really not the case and that if you start taking a look at some of the specific services and talk about fair wages for those individuals and the appropriate kinds of comprehensive care that may be needed, we may indeed be talking about a cost that is equal to and may be, as you suggest, even greater. I am not trying to set up for any particular party position. I am sincerely asking you what your thinking is on that particular issue of cost.

Mr Birkness: I do not believe that at this point in time, anybody has actually gone through the calculations to determine what those real costs will be, but as you consider, you have answered your own question. In fact, when you consider all the factors that go into delivering home care service, you can see that as you bring professionals into the home, you have to move them from location to location and there is going to be a substantial cost in doing that. I suppose that is one of the reasons why doctors stopped making house calls. There certainly is a substantial factor. Until we really know what the real cost is, it is going to be very difficult to measure that.

At the same time as I say that, the hospitals have recognized that many patients are better off in their homes than they are being in an institution. Having caring concerned people around you is very important to an ill person. I think every one of us knows that if we have to be taken of when we are ill, it is always nice to have your spouse do that for you rather than being in an institution. People would rather be at home, but there will be a cost to do that and I am suggesting that if that is to be done, then the people who should be doing that are the community hospitals because they are well positioned to provide that outreach program and outreach service. A lot of that is already under way.

Mr Christopherson: To follow-up—let me make a note so I do not forget—I outlined some of the costs and that is one side of the argument. Of course, the other side very clearly is that you point to the dollar figure for a one-day stay in a hospital. What would be a rule-of-thumb figure for a stay in a hospital? Would it be $300 plus, $400 a day?

Mr Birkness: Or more.

Mr Christopherson: You have to talk of an awful lot of professional services and support mechanisms over the course of a month or over the course of a week for an individual before you would total the equivalent of $400 a day. That is an awful lot of money.

Mr Birkness: Depending upon the acuity of the patient, of course.

Mr Christopherson: Yes, and the level of care that is required. I only ask the question. Again to be consistent with the positions I was arguing earlier, it is not that the bottom line is going to drive this. The desire to have individuals stay in their homes and the ability to stay in their homes is a social goal of this province. I think most people have recognized that and I think that is a motherhood issue.

The question is, if it does save money, clearly, and that is by and large an accepted fact, then we should be rushing towards it much more quickly than we already are, which of course is the opposite of what you are suggesting. If it breaks even, much of that same argument still holds. If there is an increased cost, then there is maybe more weight to your argument that we should move perhaps a little more slowly, to ensure that it is as efficient a system as possible.

I suggest to you that both sides of the argument, including the ministry people, are going to have to start putting more dollars on this issue, because especially in a time of recession that will have a significant impact on how quickly things are brought on stream.

Let me ask you one question. With the hospital providing, would you not agree that this is kind of running contrary to conventional thinking right now? Even that the institution would provide the community care runs contrary to the thinking that you want to devolve more and more to community care, community planning, community co-ordination and less involvement by the institution rather than even a maintaining of its current profile.

There is a lot of thinking that the institutional aspect is part of the problem and that it is far too bureaucratized and is not sensitive enough to the community. I know you could argue that point and you would not agree with it, but would ask you, how would you suggest this government could respond to that position you are putting forward in light of the fact that it does run contrary to a lot of the current community thinking that goes hand in hand with this saying in the home providing support services concept?

Mr Birkness: I think the attitudinal changes we spoke about in our brief are being developed among medical staff, among nurses and they recognize the need to get a lot of the care out into the community, into the homes. As to the fact that the very people who should be providing those services are in the community hospitals, I think the structure has to be established to encourage the hospitals to develop the hospital and the home profile and to move that into the community, and possibly through a funding structure. That is the way that will be encouraged. You might want to add something to that, Gordon.

Mr Cunningham: This necessarily gets into two or three different subjects. First of all, the hospitals collectively and totally believe that we want as little institutionalization as possible. We want people in their own homes. The hospitals of Ontario in particular have shown leadership in Canada to have outpatient surgery in a great number of instances and have really concentrated on the fact that it is part of our duty to keep people in their own homes by keeping them mobile by knee replacements and knee operations and hip replacements and things that allow people to go home.

If we are talking about a fairly healthy individual who is mobile and may be able to work, but needs a therapy, it certainly is ideal if that person can go to the hospital daily or weekly or whenever he is needed for his therapy. I think it is absurd to believe that we should provide therapy in the home for those who are relatively mobile and perhaps being rehabilitated.

In the hospital, we must build a facility for the community, for outpatient surgery, for outpatient diagnostic things and for outpatient therapy, but one of the dilemmas we face is the aging of the population. We are getting more frail and we need multiple care. Certainly those who are getting elderly and frail we do not, as institutions, want housed in institutions. Ideally we want everybody to have the best life and if possible that should be in his own home. Then the question comes, how do we build that infrastructure to serve those people? Very often they need several therapies, not one.

We then come to the question, what is the most economic way? Mr Birkness is right that the literature does not yet show that it is any cheaper to do it in the community, so we have the question of economics and we have the question that the hospital is indeed a part of the community. For some reason we have slipped into the bad habit of talking about community services as though they were something different than hospital services. Hospitals are an integral basic part of every community where they exist. So it becomes a question of whether the hospital should be providing the multiple care for the frail who need it, or should we be setting up some other kind of infrastructure? That is the difficult part that you face in your funding and it is the difficult part we face in being part of the community.

Mr Sutherland: We had the Minister of Health and the Deputy Minister of Health this morning and they were talking about issues that we need a health management system and that this in itself has not really occurred. I want to focus in on a couple of areas. Perhaps you could give me your assessment of the situation.

I have three hospitals in my riding and no one in my riding is more than 25 miles away at the most from any of those three facilities. You mentioned the community aspect of it. All three of those hospitals have had expansions within the last five years. That is a great thing for a community. Everyone loves to be a part of that.

I am wondering, from your assessment, is it a question that those hospitals are providing—obviously they all have to provide similar basic services, but what about different services? For example, are there services one hospital could provide for the riding and another hospital could provide a different one, so people in the one community may have to drive to the other one to get that specific basic test, obviously not emergency-type service?

I have also talked to a few people who have been working in hospitals and they left me with a sense—this is meant as no disrespect to anyone who works on a hospital board, because I know it is not an easy challenge—that hospitals felt like they were in competition with their neighbouring hospitals in terms of they want to have their hospital doing the things and getting a larger share of the marketplace.

That type of philosophy or thinking towards health care is rather disturbing, to me anyway, in terms of we are all there and we all should have the same goal of, how do we service the people most effectively? Yet there seems to be a sense that: "I am in competition. If I can get the health council to approve that, that's great for us and our hospital." Would you care to comment?

Mr Birkness: I would be glad to. You are absolutely right. Rationalization of services within communities is very much uppermost in everyone's minds involved in hospital services. We in Scarborough, as you know Gerry—you were very much involved in the thrust of this, getting the Scarborough co-ordinating committee working to deal with rationalization of services.

Mr Phillips: That is right.

Mr Birkness: Some areas have done this very well. Hamilton has done an excellent job of creating a rationalization of services. Each community needs to have a co-ordinating committee of those hospitals. In your instance, the three hospitals that serve your community should be sitting down on a regular basis to discuss certainly any new services that are to be brought in, who should provide those services and how they would best be delivered.

Mr Sutherland: Can you give me a sense of how province-wide that is? Is that going on right now from your assessment?

Mr Birkness: To my best knowledge I believe there is a lot more of this going on. I do not know that we have any specific data, do we?

Mr Cunningham: I would respond to this by touching on one part of the subject. We are on record with the Ministry of Health, with the previous minister, and again speaking briefly to the new minister, with the bureaucracy as saying that we the association believe that we have not had adequate planning at the provincial level for an overall plan.

We applaud what the Premier's Council has said in the last two or three years, where it has come out with statements that we should be looking at less institutionalization, that we should be doing many things, that we should be setting health goals. What we have said to the Ministry of Health is that we believe the institutions are well managed, delivering good care, doing many good things, but that there is the lack of an overall provincial plan. We have had, at least from the bureaucracy, some agreement and some expectation that the association, with the ministry and the district health councils, collectively could do a better job of provincial planning, and we are ready to do our part.

Mr Birkness: On the question of competition among hospitals, we have been doing a lot of work at the OHA in providing information to trustees, education to trustees, to get them to understand that there is more to health care and hospital care than just their own hospitals, and a real need to understand what is happening in their community. As to this feeling of competition among hospitals, I think you will find less of that today than you might have found a few years ago. I know even in our own hospital board that seems to be disappearing and we are thinking of ourselves more as a community and working together.

Mr B. Ward: I think you touched on my question to some degree. We had a presentation from the Ontario Public Health Association which in essence recommended that our government freeze funding to the institutional type, which is hospitals, and that the greater concentration of dollars be put into the community-based health system or health care. The feeling I get is that may be a proper direction to head into, but that we are not really sure yet, and that until we are sure, let's continue to fund the hospital system so that we have the best institutions and health care available from that aspect, and begin the exploration of community-based health so that we can have a handle on what are the long-term costs, the long-term standards.

It is not a concept that you reject; it is just that you feel it is perhaps a little bit early for that type of funding where we freeze the hospital association and its allocation. You do not disagree with that concept; it is just that it is premature. Is that a fair statement?

Mr Birkness: Yes, it is a reasonably correct statement. What I am saying is that basically we agree that with the idea to move as much health care as possible into the community, into the homes, to get people into proper settings for the kind of care they need, the other side of that coin is that we are asking, what is the point of developing another group, another organization, and funding that to provide this service when your own community hospitals are in a position to develop that and to work together with the ministry to develop that kind of service?

We agree that it should be done. It is just the methodology which is the thing we challenge. We also are saying, "Let's not rush into it blindly. Let's be cautious and step carefully into this whole idea and make sure that what we are doing is providing a better, well-thought-out service and not just"—as the speaker before us suggested—"throwing money at something that may not give you anything more effective."

Mr B. Ward: It is the position of the OHA, the upper echelon, that hospitals should work together in a co-operative fashion so that there is no duplication of services, that we are getting the most efficient use of our tax dollars when it comes to the health care that is utilized through the hospital system. Are you fairly confident that philosophy has filtered down to the hospitals? To be honest, Brantford has two hospitals, Brant county has one, and the perception I had—I was on the Brantford General Hospital board for a year—was that those turf wars were still continuing to a degree. I am just wondering what avenues the OHA has taken to ensure that this concept of mutual co-operation is filtering down to the administrators and to the various boards that run the hospitals. Can you comment on that.

Mr Birkness: First of all, there has been a lot of education about the delivery of health care services. As I spoke about, we have developed five videos for trustees teaching them what their responsibilities are in terms of the delivery of services within the hospital and emphasizing these very things. There is no longer any room, if there ever was, for waste within hospitals. The predecessor government made that very clear to hospitals, that where there was any potential waste, any fat within the organization that was going to be removed. It was simply removed by reducing their funding, as you well know.

The hospitals have had to operate their businesses; hospitals are a business; I should emphasize that; they may be a not-for-profit business, but they are very much a business—as efficiently as they possibly can. Any waste that was in hospitals, any fat that was in their budgets, has been removed. Those things have disappeared. Hospitals are operating efficiently and they have to operate smarter, and the only way they can operate more efficiently and smarter is to co-operate with one another. So I think you will find there is a great deal more co-operation among hospitals; there is a better understanding on the part of trustees and there is a better understanding by hospital administrators of what needs to be done.

Mr Sterling: I was looking at page 4 of the appendix to your brief. You show 49,832 hospital beds in Ontario. How many of those are in chronic care institutions, or are they all acute care?

Mr Cunningham: Twelve thousand is the closest answer we have.

Mr Sterling: So if we take 12,000 off that, we end with about 37,000 or 38,000 acute care hospital beds.

ose 37,000 or 38,000, how many actually have chronic re patients in them?

Mr Birkness: Do we have any statistics?

Mr Cunningham: Of that 12,000, approximately 000 are in what we would call freestanding chronic care ospitals. Those are about 20 institutions in this province hich are long-term care, chronic hospitals. The other ap-roximately 6,000 would be in chronic care wings of acute re hospitals. It is pretty much an accepted fact in Canada d in most western jurisdictions that if we did an instant apshot at any one moment, if we looked at who is in hat bed, we sometimes find people in inappropriate beds. hat is, a frail person may have entered an acute care ospital for an acute episode and should be there; however, ecause there is no immediate availability of another ronic bed and they are unable to be looked after at home, ey are in the wrong place at the wrong time. They are not etting the rehabilitation or the best level of chronic care ecause they are in the inappropriate bed.

Quebec did a study only two years ago and said that oward of 20% of its patients were in the wrong bed at the rong time. They questioned us closely here in Ontario, hat was our figure. We did not have up-to-date figures, ut it is generally accepted wisdom that 10% to 15% of atients may be in the wrong and inappropriate beds. It is nfortunate.

I would say that hospitals have done their best to ad-ress that problem by having people who are specifically orking within the community to work at placement o-ordination to get people in the right beds. I think it is better oday than it was five years ago, but I would still have to ke an educated guess and say that upwards of 10% are robably in the wrong bed at any time.

Mr Sterling: The number of acute care beds seems to e a constant problem, particularly in terms of people anting to get elective surgery, etc. Can you provide me ith an educated guess of the number of acute care beds hat have been available for the public in Ontario for the ast five or 10 years? Do you have any statistics like that?

Mr Birkness: Just a clarification of the question. You re trying to determine how many beds have been closed ver the past five years?

Mr Sterling: I am having a hard time getting a handle n what the problem is in terms of acute care beds in ospitals.

Mr Birkness: Why people cannot get beds when they equire them?

Mr Sterling: That is right. The population is increas-ig. In the area I represent it is increasing rapidly, but the umber of acute care beds is not increasing rapidly.

Mr Cunningham: I can only give a partial answer. I an start by talking about this matter of bed closures. The ospitals, in my view, use good management and attempt niversally to use the dollars to the best advantage. This is uttressed by the voluntary boards and the modern admin-istration we have.

There are times when it is valuable to close beds. More rticularly, in our Canadian way of life it is quite true that in the summertime most of us want vacation if we can have it, and there are many people who do not want elec-tive surgery in the summer. If a hospital can truly find a time when it can close some of its operating rooms and close certain wings, it makes good sense; if medical staff want to take a vacation. That is good management. Cer-tainly the same thing happens at Christmastime. Over the festive season it is absolutely true that as many people want to be home as possible. It is good management in saving dollars and closing beds, so we do have normal, good management practice of closing beds at some times.

Where we start to get confused is this: Sometimes, because of economic reasons, we find that hospitals close a wing, say, at Christmas or in the summer, and because their budget is short they try to keep that wing closed as long as they can. We get a great deal of fluctuation. The Ontario Hospital Association is a voluntary association. We have made a determination that the beds fluctuate so much that it is a senseless game for us to keep track of how many are open or closed at any one moment. That is why we tend to waffle a little on our figures.

The Hospital Council of Metropolitan Toronto, by con-trast, has the large Metro population to care for, and it does have co-ordination of the beds within Metro and does keep track of how many beds are closing at any one moment. We get varying figures, but the Metro figures have shown that due to economic reasons sometimes it runs about 3,000 beds closed within Metro at any one time. Some of that is good, because it is responding to the seasonal fluc-tuation; some of it is bad because they have had to close for economic reasons, and that backs up the surgery.

I cannot give you a very fixed answer, but we do try to translate, we try to ask our members what the lack of funding does to them. To the best of our knowledge, last year, the year which ended 31 March 1990, 800 beds seemed to have been closed permanently and taken out of the system.

Mr Sterling: Again looking at your figures, you show the average inpatients is 43,600 patients a day. If I take that as a fraction of the number of beds you have in the prov-ince, including chronic care beds, you are pressing 90%. It seems to me that while we hear all these arguments for deinstitutionalization, clinics, etc., our hospitals have tre-mendous pressure on them for acute care patients. The last government in 1986, I believe, went out and made all kinds of promises about a whole bunch of new acute care beds that were going to be built in this province and then reneged on that promise, I believe on the basis that these clinics were going to draw away the need for acute care. I just do not see that happening, either in your figures for 1988-89 or in my experience. Should we build more acute care beds in this province right now?

Mr Cunningham: I am going to go back to what I said earlier, that I would be dishonest if I tried to answer that. I can say that our hospitals in this province are giving good value for dollar and they are giving good manage-ment, but I do believe we lack an overall provincial plan-ning system. Again, the association has said to the Ministry of Health and we will say to the public that we are willing to take part in a better planning system. That might help resolve that question. I think we lack provincial planning.

Mr Sterling: I do not care if you lack provincial planning. I represent an area that is served by the Queensway-Carleton Hospital. Some of my constituents, when they go there in emergencies, have to be put in the hall and all that kind of thing. Queensway-Carleton was promised 100 acute care beds by the last government. The argument against giving them those beds was that they were going to create clinics that would draw away from it, but that is not happening. The patient goes to the clinic; if it is a difficult case it gets shifted to the hospital anyway. Why bother with the damned clinic if all they are doing is creating another intermediate service, which is costly, and shoving it on to the hospital anyway?

Mr Birkness: Clearly, to make up for the loss of many of the acute care beds, a lot of out-surgery is being developed, and trying to move patients through the system by changing to this community care type of service. Obviously, when you can go to certain hospitals and find on a continuous basis, day after day, that people are being left in hallways because there are no beds to put them, where you find that people are on waiting lists and those waiting lists are getting longer for certain types of surgery, obviously there is a shortage of hospital beds; there may be a shortage of operating rooms and medical and nursing services for those particular needs.

We do feel there is no room to cut any more acute care beds. We already have the problem with those that have been cut, those which, as you say, were promised and never brought on stream. It cannot continue. That is the message I have been bringing to the minister, to the Treasurer, the message I bring to you today, that we may not have a problem tomorrow, but I can assure you that we will have a problem in the very short term, if it is not in the very near term, the next six months or year. If we continue to cut beds, with our aging population we know very well that we are going to have a real problem in hospitals, because in spite of moving services out into the community there is going to be a definite need for additional acute care beds in our hospitals.

Mrs Sullivan: By way of a preamble, this morning when the Minister of Health and deputy minister were in front of the committee one of the questions put to them related to increasing in the next couple of years the health budget to allow for transition costs from an institutionalized system into more community-based care. The deputy was perhaps very perspicacious in not responding directly, but he certainly left us with the impression that while there probably would not be that kind of interim funding request, what there would be within the budget request would be a larger portion directed to increases which would stimulate interest in change.

I look at my own community and see things which have occurred there. It is served by three hospitals: Oakville, Milton and Burlington. It is a growing area. We have just received allocations and almost have shovels in the ground for additions to two of those hospitals. Additionally, all three hospitals are very involved in the transit and will be involved in the delivery of services in a different community-based situation. In the next phase of development they will not be looking at new hospital space. They may be looking at satellite, day-surgery operations, along with other kinds of therapeutic care and counselling and whatever.

As I see that and as I look at your page 13 talking about additional costs which have not been quantified and this will affect, I assume, this year's budget. These are things you do not know about in terms of your analysis of what will be required this year in your operations. What I do not see is an indication of the pressures that will be on the hospitals in terms of participation in a community health care system. I do not know if it is different in Metro Toronto, but in a community like mine, where the hospitals are very much involved in being deliverers of a community-based health system, I think, for instance, of nurses who may have to travel into people's homes. Where are those travel fees? What other aspects? I just do not see it there. I know it is causing a pressure in my community and I am wondering why it is not there.

Mr Birkness: Our global budget here does not take into account the breakdown of each individual hospital. Each hospital, of course, would present its own budget. You are telling me what the overall needs are of hospitals. You have within that, under appendix B on page 9, under "New and Expanded Programs," $107.3 million, representing 1.65% of our needs. That amount will be allocated to the new projects and a new health care delivery service which you speak.

Mrs Sullivan: So it is in there. Do you want to speak at all about these unquantified costs that are likely to be coming up within the next budget year?

Mr Birkness: Are you talking about the impact of GST and workers' compensation and so on? What more can we say about that, Gordon?

Mr Cunningham: I think it is just to alert that sometimes there are other costs imposed upon hospitals and they will have to accept them if they come. We cannot pass on by taxing the local community, we cannot pass on by charging more. We are simply alerting the committee to the fact that sometimes we have extra costs imposed.

Mrs Sullivan: Some of those changes in work-related comp costs will certainly be in-year in the next fiscal year.

Mr Birkness: Yes. That is why we addressed the issue. We know these are going to impact on the global budget of hospitals so that hospitals are going to have fewer dollars to address the needs of patients, patient care.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming and make your presentation this afternoon.

INCOME MAINTENANCE FOR THE HANDICAPPED
CO-ORDINATING GROUP

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Income Maintenance for the Handicapped Co-ordinating Group. Christopher Watts, chair.

Mr Watts: My name is Kit Watts. I am the chair of the Home Maintenance for the Handicapped Co-ordinating Group. As some of you may know, we have presented to the standing committee before; this is our third year in a row.

Page 1 of our brief outlines our activities. We are a group of and for persons with disabilities, formed in 1978. Since then we have formulated strong positions on a variety of issues, most recently dealing particularly with the report of the Social Assistance Review Committee, Transitions, to try to maintain the momentum that was generated when that report was released. I would like to thank all of you for this opportunity to be here to address our concerns.

I would like now to introduce the other three people here today: Harry Beatty, legal counsel for our group; John Southern, who also was an original member of SARC, as some of you may recall; and Vera Malec, a member of our group and also the executive director of Views for the Visually Handicapped, which is a consumer group of parents of children who are blind or visually impaired.

We would like to finish within the half-hour time frame. We understand that a gentleman in the next group is a train to catch, so we would like to present as thoroughly and as quickly as we can.

Mr Beatty: I will address part 2 of our submission, which is the argument for continuing the social assistance reform begun by the Transitions process. Table 1 on page 2 of our brief indicates the growth over the past several years of the number of disabled persons on family benefits assistance, also known as Gains-D, guaranteed annual income system for the disabled. It shows that from 1982 to 1990 there has been a relatively steady growth of about 1% each year, and now there are slightly over 100,000 disabled individuals receiving family benefits as "permanently unemployable," to use the label in the legislation, which we do not like. Almost 50% have been identified as having primarily a psychiatric or developmental disability.

We are naturally concerned, given the escalating social assistance costs in Ontario, that there will be pressure on the government, which has shown a strong commitment to social assistance, to slow down or perhaps even stop social assistance reform. What we want to argue is that social assistance reform, besides being better for people, is a more soundly based economic policy.

On page 3, we start to list some of the main points.

The first is competitive employment. One solution, of course, to the growing numbers of people dependent on Gains-D, which provides a basic income of less than $10,000 a year in most cases, is competitive employment. It is really the time to make some commitment to the employment of disabled people in this province.

We know the government is moving ahead with employment equity. We hope it will be effective. We hope we will start to see some effective enforcement of human rights legislation. But other supports are necessary as well.

Vocational rehabilitation services for people with disabilities are very underfunded. There are tremendous waiting periods. It often takes periods of up to a year even to get an initial appointment for service. You can imagine how well a small employer who may be ready to offer a disabled person a job is going to react to the news that there will be no involvement from vocational rehabilitation for a year.

I just point out, in the last paragraph under heading 1, the financial importance of vocational rehabilitation. If we say that there is a public expenditure of about $10,000 a year on each person with a disability under Gains-D, counting both the benefit and extra health costs and perhaps supported housing, a $20,000 rehabilitation and training program would, in effect, pay for itself in two years if it meant the person could get a job and be competitively employed. That is an oversimplification, but it may put it in some perspective.

There are American studies anyway that show that dollars spent on effective rehabilitation are cost-effective in ratios of 5 to 1, 10 to 1 or even better. If you have a good rehabilitation program which gets especially the younger disabled person out in an integrated way into the workplace, that makes a lot more sense than paying for a lifetime of dependency. It makes a lot more sense for the individual as well.

Second, we want to address the overlap between Gains-D, which is social assistance and other disability compensation systems.

Table 3 on page 17 of our report shows that almost 15,000 Gains-D recipients also are getting benefits from other programs. One of the things that we want to look at of course is, are these other programs providing adequate benefits? Are they treating people fairly, or is the real reason that we have the escalating numbers of disabled people on social assistance, at least in part, that the other contributory and premium-based programs that they are paying into, that their employers are paying into, are not providing adequate compensation?

They start by noting that of the some 100,000 disabled persons getting Gains-D in Ontario, almost an eighth, 12,500, also have CPP disability pensions. These are people who have worked and contributed sufficiently to qualify for CPP disability. Yet you can see that they are getting an average payment from CPP of $501. That is all they are getting. You can add to that other people who have worked and contributed to CPP and, because of the technical and unfair eligibility rules, do not get anything and wind up on social assistance. This is the kind of thing that we hope the government will examine.

Another point about CPP disability is that there is no provision in their legislation for rehabilitation or any kind of earnings exemption. Their policy is still that if you get back to work, even on a temporary basis and maybe even if you go for training, they are going to take your CPP disability pension away. You can imagine the effect that has on CPP disability pensioners who may be considering a return to work. What if they try to go back to work and cannot do it after all? Their pension may be gone.

You may also notice almost 2,000 injured workers getting both workers' compensation at an average of $300 a month and being so poor that they qualify under both the income and asset tests for family benefits. It really would be instructive to review these cases.

Workers' compensation is often portrayed as a very rich system. There is no doubt that the initial level of benefits is much higher. Temporary benefits are much higher than a government general revenue, social assistance program like Gains-D offers. But once people had been in the system for several years, at least under the old system, people were not getting those high benefits; they were getting 10% and 15% pensions. I think any MPP would be familiar with that from his own office.

We really think that the relationships between these different programs should be looked at to see if some of these contributory plans, and I would include private long-term disability insurance as well, are in fact undercompensating people or in some cases denying them benefits altogether.

The next area is special-needs funding and John will address that.

Mr Southern: I would like to thank the committee for letting us appear before you once again. I know last year I joked about becoming an honorary member of the committee. Sometimes I think I should.

I just want to say that you must receive a lot of briefs and presentations. You could become blasé about them maybe, whatever, but reading Harry's brief today that he prepared for our group, it held my attention. I have been involved in social assistance issues for 11 or 12 years now and I still found it informative. I suggest that you read it from page 1 to the end. It really is good.

Talking about special needs and supplementary aids and whatever, there are often times when certain items that disabled people need are not available under family benefits or other plans and they have to go to the local municipalities to get this assistance, bandages or some certain kinds of equipment that are not covered by the assistive devices programs or other programs.

In these recessionary times, some of the municipalities are cutting back and some of them are so small they cannot afford to provide this assistance. As I found out when I was a part of the Social Assistance Review Committee, there are some municipalities that are very rich that do not want to provide this assistance as well, which shocked me to the core. Therefore, we recommend that supplementary aid be transferred to the province and that people should have a right to the things they need to lead a dignified life.

I guess one reason I got involved in social assistance issues is that when I first came to Canada, I saw the plight of disabled people in this country and how poor they were. There has been some improvement but not a lot. A lot of disabled people still remain living under the poverty line. I can speak somewhat from personal experience in this area.

I would really like to see the rates of social assistance raised. This government did raise the social assistance levels of people on Gains-D by 7% and also we really would like to thank the government for raising the shelter costs, but we believe another raise in the level of social assistance is necessary this year. They are certainly behind the eight ball, as Harry pointed out. The average person on social assistance is only receiving around $10,000. There are too many people living on that kind of income and it is high on impossible.

Also, I would really like to see an improvement to the assistive devices program. As a start, we would like to see the age limits in the assistive devices program taken out of it and have it apply to people of all ages. That was proposed in 1989 by the previous government and that has not been realized yet. Of course, after that is achieved, we would certainly like the 25% that people have to pay under the assistive devices program, for those who cannot afford it, there should be some way that can be covered. A lot of people spend so much time trying to acquire this funding, it is ridiculous.

Also, talking about the assistive devices program, the supports to employment program and all these other programs, it is all very well to have these kinds of programs and to encourage people to join the workforce again. The person who has just recently started to work with myself, PUSH would like to leave family benefits altogether and become independent, but the person has extreme costs. They need about $5,000 a year just to maintain the wheelchair.

Under the assistive devices program, for example, some pairs are not covered. Where else does this person have to go to get this kind of assistance? Disabled people have been sort of reliant on charities for too long. Most disabled people I talk to are not willing to go out and beg any more. "We've got our rights and we want a dignified way of living now."

Also, we would like to see obviously extra health costs covered, certainly for the working poor. They should have an opportunity to avail themselves of the health plan. Again, when people on family benefits want to leave the system and go into the workforce, some disabled people have extraordinarily high health costs and there is just no help for them. Sometimes it does prevent them from leaving the program, and in fact sometimes does prevent them from taking employment. I can think of at least five cases myself, people I know. I think this really needs to be looked at and studied a lot closer.

I will pass it over to whoever is next on the list.

[Failure of sound system]

Ms Malec: —most families cannot work their way through. There is no one generally who can advise them how to co-ordinate the effort. Many families are not given the opportunity to access the programs that are available to them, but they just do not know how to plug into the system properly.

Within that report, it suggests integration of the services of all ministries with programs for children. Some of that committee's goals were to make the wellbeing of children and the defence of their entitlements society's priority, create an equitable economic base for families and communities so that they can provide the entitlements for children, make government a leading partner in the creation of a public agenda for children and provide an integrated framework of services that ensure children's entitlements.

The Minister of Community and Social Services told the Ontario Legislature that these goals are supported by the new government. That is Mrs Akande. She was a member of that committee prior to being elected.

For the infant and preschool population, there is a serious need for immediate and ongoing intervention from early development programs. Again, there are some services. They are scattered. They are regional; accessible here, not accessible there. Again, no co-ordination, and this begins right from diagnosis. In many cases the diagnosed child is handed back to the family without any support. It is specifically true in the cases of sensory impairments—hearing and vision losses. It is true in most disabilities, but especially there.

What we are hearing from teachers in the school system is that particularly sensory-deprived children are coming into the school system at anywhere between the ages of four and six with no preschool intervention, totally unprepared for an education, and in most cases they will never catch up. So we are losing those children.

Within our brief we have talked about the funding increases for the special services at home program. I know that at the presentation after ours is the Provincial Coalition on Special Services at Home and I think they will probably give you all the information. I just would like to say enough that the funding increases definitely need to be made in this program. Some $10 million had been assigned to the program over the next three years—totally inadequate. It must be put in place within the 1991-92 fiscal year to have enough serious impact on that.

That is pretty well all I wanted to say in regard to the children's needs.

Mr Watts: Any questions?

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation very much. I look back on the election and I think the previous government felt it was moving forward on the agenda. I think many groups, like yours, did not feel we were moving fast enough. I think the new government was elected on a platform of accelerating the development. I guess the role that we play—what we will do, or what I will attempt to do—is to hold them accountable for doing it, because I think in both An Agenda for People and the throne speech there were commitments made to your group to continue the progress. I have a lot of empathy with the needs of our community and with the need to continue that agenda.

All I really wanted to say was I think in both the throne speech, as I read it, and An Agenda for People, there is a commitment to do the things that you say are in the brief. In opposition, I guess the role of all of us is to make sure that that in fact happens, to the best of our ability.

Mr Watts: We recently presented to Allan Roscovitch's Advisory Group on New Social Assistance legislation. That was the advisory group that was launched by the new minister, as you say. Mr Phillips, to accelerate the whole process of social assistance reform. In terms of the immediate needs, most particularly the rate of increases that are necessary, people on family benefits experienced as of 1 January a rate increase and also an enhancement of the shelter subsidy. We suggested to the advisory group at that time that we look at a further 5% in the 1991-92 fiscal year, that is, over and above the regular 1 January rate increases, a 5% rate increase and 5% shelter subsidy over and above that. I thought we would just inform you of that to be consistent with the other group.

Are there other questions about some of the recommendations we have made?

The Chair: Seeing none, I would like to thank you for your presentation and your brief.

PROVINCIAL COALITION ON SPECIAL SERVICES AT HOME

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Provincial Coalition on Special Services at Home.

Mr Cartan: My name is Doug Cartan. I am chairperson of the Ontario Association for Community Living's task force on special services at home. I am also a co-chairperson of the provincial coalition on this particular program funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

The coalition is made up of virtually all major disability organizations in the province. I want to introduce to you again today Christopher "Kit" Watts, from the Income Maintenance for the Handicapped Co-ordinating Group; and Bob Johnston, who is the chairperson for the Coalition for Family Support Services.

I want to chair this section for our group and, first, say to you that we are putting a microscope on one of the flagship programs in Comsoc's portfolio. In doing that, I want to stress the fact that the message we bring to you today is endorsed by virtually every major disability organization in the province. It is a very serious program.

I would like to turn it over to Kit Watts for some introductory remarks, and then to Bob Johnston.

Mr Watts: My task is to refer you to pages 1 and 2 of the brief, which basically gives the background of the SSAH, special services at home program. The program was initiated by MCSS in 1982-83 to respond to families whose children had a developmental disability and were under the age of 19. Families were able to apply to the ministry directly for an amount of money that would help them provide individually tailored services to meet their child's needs.

There are three main characteristics of this program which made it a very beneficial program for families in these circumstances and, I would like to add, perhaps may act in future years as a prototype for the government to more seriously consider a user control approach to funding.

First, there was flexibility. The families were able to access the program not based on specific criteria which may have excluded them; rather, the criteria were tailored to meet the individual family's needs, keeping in mind that individuals with disabilities living at home with their families have a wide variety of needs and therefore quite individualized requirements.

Also, the program provided portability, in that rather than the person having to live in a certain location to access the program, the program could follow him wherever he was in the province.

The families had choice and control over the services they were requesting and receiving and they also had the control or the option of controlling the funds provided to them directly.

SSAH is also supported by users because it enhances the security of the whole family. It allows the child or children in question to remain at home, avoids institutionalization and provides a normal access to their community.

But by 1988, there were about 6,000 children making use of special services at home, for a total of $14 million in support. There started to be problems associated with the inadequate funding of the program. As is the case with many programs we introduce, we just have no idea how the demand will increase. Sure enough, this is what happened. It became much more popular than anyone had anticipated, and as a result there has been a shortfall of funds over the past several years.

In September 1990, just prior to that, the previous minister, Charles Beer, announced an expansion of the program to include two other quite large target groups, children who have physical disabilities and adults who have developmental disability. To offset the increased costs that these many more thousands of potential users would need, he allocated an additional $10 million, as was mentioned by Vera Malec in the previous presentation, to be added on an annualized basis over the next three fiscal years. By fiscal 1992-93, there would therefore be approximately $24 million allocated to the program.

I would like to turn it over to Bob. He will explain further what our expectations are, based on the inadequacy of the present funding.

Mr Johnston: Thank you for allowing us to speak to you today. I would like, before I review the short portion I have, to emphasize that this is indeed a coalition of a variety of organizations, which are listed on the final two pages of your document. The emphasis I would like to make is that we are coming together for one of the first times as a true provincial coalition, representing different segments of the society which is called "disabled." That would be, in this case, developmental disabilities and physical disabilities. We have come together in the principle of supporting one another rather than attempting to grab what we can for our segment, so all through this whole process we have emphasized with the ministry people we have worked with, and we do so today emphasize, that we want this program to work for all of us and not for some of us.

As it says here, special services at home is a flagship program in the ministry's plan for family support and the effort to curtail institutionalization. Indeed, this program is in many ways a response to the philosophy of deinstitutionalization.

Prior to the announced expansion and extension effective September 1990, the program, as has been said, was seriously compromised as a result of the demand for funds outstripping the availability. The problems were evidenced by things such as: parents in some regions of this province experiencing direct cutbacks to their SSAH agreement; families being asked to cost-share in some areas. Also funding for some uses of the program, for example, parent relief, is being either cut off or restricted if there is a base funded agency in the community. Families who do not use all of their approved hours of support in one contract period are experiencing a reduction in approval during the next contract period, which may imply to you some usage in a period when it may not be necessary to the family through fear of losing it in the future when it is necessary. Waiting lists are being established in several areas of the province and new applications are not being considered. Equipment for children and transportation costs for workers funded under SSAH would no longer be funded.

In addition, the recently announced expansion and extension would allow access to the program by an additional 12,000 families in those two new groups we have mentioned over and above the 6,000 served prior to September 1990, while adding just $10 million in new annualized dollars to the current $14 million. The $10-million increase will not be fully realized until fiscal 1992-93. I do not think it takes much in the way of mathematical thought to realize that if we go from 6,000 to potential 18,000 people and we do not even double the money, something is going to break down. Pressures are being compounded as a result.

The current situation is that applicants for assistance from the newly eligible groups are being turned down, in particular the newly eligible groups, including, for example, adults with a developmental disability. In the case of families where the parents may be in their 60s or 70s and the child, who is indeed an adult, is in his or her 40s, applications are not being accepted in many cases for this newly eligible group or supposedly newly eligible group.

Workers funded under the SSAH program are the lowest-paid human service workers in this province, lagging 60% behind institutional workers. The emphasis may be on deinstitutionalization, but there is no recognition of that in the compensation for the workers in that area.

Family contracts are not approved for more than 12 months at a time, resulting in great insecurity for the families as they approach the end of their contract, just as each of us would be very concerned if election day were rolling around or if we were under a contract at work and did not know until the last few days or indeed until after the expiration date whether we were going to be renewed. It causes insecurity.

Recommendations:

1. Commit the entire $10 million that had previously been allocated to take effect by fiscal 1992-1993, and move it in 1991-92 to deal with the current program pressures.

2. Commit to SSAH as a primary home support option for families rather than as a program of last resort, as it seems to be implemented in this province now. It really is a program of last resort.

3. Commit an additional $30 million annualized, which would then total $54 million annualized, by fiscal 1993-94 to support the new and existing groups of eligible individuals and families.

Perhaps we should ask if there are some questions.

Mr Phillips: I just want to get it straight. You are in many groups. I guess each group might come with another one, but this is one that transcends all.

Mr Johnston: Across the board.

Mr Phillips: I do agree with the point you made earlier that that concept is important, of essentially the consumer or whatever you want to call them, the individuals, having control over their services as opposed to what often happens with government, which goes the other way. You make a good point, because many of our community-based services could think about that model for home care and things like that.

What do you feel the ultimate demand for the service will be? Is that approximately $50 million in today's dollars on an annualized basis where you think the total demand will be?

Mr Watts: Back in the spring, Richard Allen, who was then the opposition critic for the Ministry of Community and Social Services and, of course, is now the Minister of Colleges and Universities and Skills Development, at that time mentioned in a press conference organized on behalf of this program that, based on the existing figures, in 1990-91 dollars, if all the potential users of the program were to approach the ministry for funding the need would be in the area of $120 million to $130 million. The program was introduced almost 10 years ago, and of course was applauded at that time for its many forward-looking features, but we are lagging behind badly now. That is basically what the demands would be.

It would be very interesting, for example, to see what could happen if all of a sudden that money were freed up. That would help us a great deal with our social research, to see just who does come forward, and also compare that to the enormous number of dollars spent institutionalizing young people, developmentally handicapped adults and so on, who could viably be remaining at home with their families.

Mr Phillips: Give me the number; it would be helpful. I think you make a good point about the difference in cost if you were institutionalized. How much per individual, roughly, does this program cost per year?

Mr Cartan: Right now, with about 6,000 families accessing $14 million, you are in the $2,500 range. A group home bed in my community is $150 a day.

I also want to add to what Kit said. The Easter Seal Society has given us some pretty clear statistics about the number of physically handicapped children it can pinpoint right now. That is an additional 6,000 children it figures will have access. For the adults with developmental handicaps, there is no clear research done on that but looking at information from StatsCan and cross-referencing that with the health and activity limitation study, we have the most conservative estimate of another 6,000 families who have sons and daughters who are adults with developmental handicaps living at home. So this is a conservative estimate for this program.

Mr Phillips: About $2,500 per individual, is that right, per year?

Mr Cartan: Per family.

The Chair: Seeing no further questions, I would like to thank you for your presentation.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF STUDENTS

The Chair: The next presentation is the Ontario Federation of Students; Tim Jackson, chairperson, Greg Elmer, communications director.

Mr Jackson: Our apologies for not having the brief in advance. We received short notice of the notice to present and were away last week. La Fédération des étudiant(e)s de l'Ontario représente environ 240 000 étudiants et étudiantes dans la province.

I would like to go through the brief very quickly and just highlight and expand on some of the areas that are mentioned. About three years ago the federation unveiled a document called Cut to the Bone, which outlined underfunding problems that existed in the post-secondary system in Ontario. The report got a fair bit of attention but very little action from the government. The report talked about deteriorating laboratory equipment, increased classroom sizes, increases in the hiring of part-time instructors as opposed to full-time professors.

The federation has always believed in a high-quality, fully accessible post-secondary system. We reaffirm our commitment to work towards a strong, truly publicly funded education system, something which the government outlined in its throne speech when it talked about strong, publicly funded institutions.

Over the past few years the situation has gotten worse and worse. The previous government introduced programs such as the employer health tax and pay equity legislation, legislation which in and of itself may be very good, but provided no additional funding to universities and colleges to make up the increased expenditures. Universities and colleges in the province, their revenues are fully controlled by the government, both through operating grants and tuition fees. Therefore, there was no way for the institutions to increase the costs.

The previous government also had a habit of introducing what it would call accessibility funding. It would tell the universities and colleges that they could take in X number of new students. The universities and colleges would receive funding for those students in the first year. Unfortunately, the universities have to take those students through years two, three and four and subsequent funding for those years was not forthcoming. Therefore, we are in a situation right now where operating grants per student over the past 10 years have decreased significantly. In real terms the operating grants per student at universities in this province are almost $2,000 less than they were in 1978, which means the universities, as we said earlier, obviously have had to increase class sizes and increase the number of professors that are not on tenure, ie, part-time lecturers. In fact, it leads to a lower-quality education.

We do recognize that part of the blame for this rests with the federal government through its cuts in transfer payments, but we also believe that the province has to recognize that what Michael Wilson and Brian Mulroney are doing is very simply transferring the tax burden to the provinces. Transfer payments have gone down and will probably continue to go down and therefore the province is going to have to pick up its slack.

The way the provincial tax system works in this province, like most except for Quebec, is that the provincial rate is simply a factor of the federal rate. So, through Mr Wilson's tax reform, as the federal tax system got more and more regressive, de facto the Ontario tax system has become more and more regressive. We think that when the Fair Tax Commission starts to meet that is something that it is going to have to address to make the tax system in the province more equitable.

As an immediate commitment, the federation, along with the faculty, staff, alumni and administrations of universities, has asked the Treasurer to commit to contributing $125 million per year for two years. That would take Ontario to the midpoint in the country in terms of per-student funding. Ontario currently ranks nine out of 10 provinces in per-student funding. We believe that that midpoint by midterm is something this government should commit itself to, simply as a very short-term solution to try to stop the crisis that currently exists.

The Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, when it presents, will speak a great deal about the professors who are increasing in the province. We share its concerns and support its position that there needs to be an additional 1,500 tenure track positions created in the province.

We would also emphasize, though, that this is a perfect opportunity for the government to introduce some sort of employment equity program. At the same time as increasing those positions, we would support some sort of affirmative action to increase the number of women who teach in faculties such as science and engineering and increase the numbers of visible minorities and other underrepresented groups. So in fact, the government could attack two problems at the same time.

We could not come today and not talk about user fees for post-secondary education. Over the past 10 years there has been a significant shift in the burden that students have borne. What were traditionally funded services out of a university's operating grant, such as student space, have now been shifted to ancillary fees, where students are now having to pay for the construction of study space, of recreational space and are paying other fees that previously had been covered by operating grants.

The student assistance plan in the province is woefully inadequate. That has been acknowledged by government, staff, students, faculty and alumni. Everyone agrees that the system is inadequate. As provincial revenues have gone up, the amount of money that has gone into student assistance has not gone up by the same proportion. What we would like to see is some sort of commitment from the government to let us know whether it is willing to revamp the entire student aid system or simply willing to tinker with the system that currently exists.

If tinkering is the way that the government wishes to go, simple things such as the living allowance that students are expected to live on under the student assistance plan have failed to keep pace with inflation. The living allowance currently sits at $121 a week. We estimate that the actual cost to the student living away from home is closer to $200 a week. If the living allowance had at least kept pace with inflation, it would sit at $175 a week. So it has not even kept up with inflation.

Several years ago, we asked the then Minister of Colleges and Universities if she would be willing to try to live on the living allowance for one month during the summer and she said she would not. We quite frankly believe that is because she believed that you simply could not. No one would challenge anyone to live on $121 a week, especially in a place like downtown Toronto. That living allowance covers everything from transportation to meals, to rent, to electricity, to transportation.

Compensation must also be made for the 7% goods and services tax which now applies to textbooks.

Income-contingent repayment plans have been suggested by people recently as a method of paying back student loans. We do not question for one minute that an income-contingent repayment plan would be better than the current Canada student loans program.

The problem is that anyone who proposes the contingent repayment plan does so at the same time as proposing significant increases in tuition. For that reason, we reject the plan.

In dealing with the Canada student and the Ontario student loan program, we would suggest that the government should look seriously at running the loans itself. Currently the loans are run through chartered banks in the province. The loans are 100% guaranteed by the province and by the federal government with a Canada student loan. It is very easy money and simple money for the banks. There is absolutely no risk and we would suggest that it would be better administered through the provincial government.

Who pays the price for post-secondary education? The OFS has always advocated a system without user fees. However, we have also advocated the position that we must repay society.

For the policy manual, we stand opposed to increases in tuition fees for education and we call for the progressive abolition of fees. We do recognize the obligation of the individual to reimburse society for the benefits accorded by higher education, and it is our belief that the most equitable method of meeting such an obligation would be a reformed system of taxation which would be borne by the student only after graduation and hence not pose an economic barrier to prospective low- and middle-income students.

What we are saying is, eliminate the tuition fees, free them in the short term, eliminate them in the long term. However, the question always comes up, "Well, where should the money come from?" The money should come from us, as students, and the money should come from the after graduation through a progressive income tax system.

We also believe that corporations are a beneficiary of the post-secondary system. If undergraduate teaching were to cease tomorrow, research and development would still have to continue and the costs would be borne by either corporations or by the government, and therefore we feel that through the corporate tax system there should be revenues raised towards post-secondary education also.

In conclusion, I guess the government is going to have to make a decision and that is that we are at a crisis point right now where universities are going to simply have to reduce the number of students they take in to provide any sort of quality education. This government is going to have to decide, does it want an education system that few can get into because there is not enough money, which means the course not only that students do not get an education but that jobs are lost through faculty and staff, or is the government willing to commit proper funding and full funding of the post-secondary system, which we believe in the short run would in fact cost them less money?

We believe that government was elected with a mandate and that mandate was not to pick and choose between options that have been presented to it since the election; the government was elected with a mandate to provide strong, publicly funded institutions. If we go back to the football analogy that the member for Brantford used at a rally we had, the Conservatives had the ball and they fumbled it. The Liberals had the ball and they fumbled it. Now we have the ball and we are going to take it for a touchdown.

The initial indications of the operating grant increase that will come next week are that in fact the NDP will not be taking it for a touchdown but will probably be tackled behind the line of scrimmage, and therefore we believe that it is imperative when the budget comes out that the NDP make up not only the lost yardage but that it does in fact take it for the first down and then a touchdown, because it is not going to happen next week. I think, as committee members you are going to have to do something when the budget comes out.

Mr Sutherland: It is a pleasure to see you here. I want to ask you a very frank question. I have been receiving the paper from Western, both the administration paper and the student newspaper, and am quite alarmed at some of the things I have certainly been seeing. The decline is going down there quickly. I know that Western traditionally is a better-off university than many of the other ones, and colleges, in the province.

My question to you is, realizing that we are in an immediate crisis; if you had to choose between one or two things, either zero tuition or making sure there is more money in the system overall, which one would you choose right now?

Mr Jackson: I guess when I ran for this office, Kimble got to grill me and it still continues.

We have always said that zero tuition is a goal of ours. We do not believe it can be obtained in the short term. Our short-term solution would be an immediate freeze in tuition fees and then some sort of plan. We have indicated our commitment to work with the minister and with the other groups to come up with a long-term plan to eliminate tuition fees.

We believe that in the very short term this government can amend the Ontario income tax system to make it more progressive than it is now, again coming back to the fact that it has become de facto more regressive as the Tories in Ottawa have made theirs more regressive. With very little effect on the budget, you can freeze fees for this year and over the course of the next 12 months. We think we can come with a plan to eliminate fees and replace those revenues through both the personal and corporate income tax system.

Mr Sutherland: Could you just inform the committee as to what the percentage of university funding is now? Not percentage but the overall dollars of university funding now by tuition fees?

Mr Jackson: Tuition fees cover about $440 million.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. The expectation would be, then—freeze them; all right.

Mr Phillips: I am looking for the touchdown, as I said to the previous group. I guess I am sensitive to these things because we were doing what we thought was best. I look back over the past five years and certainly operating grants and the capital grants for colleges and universities went up well in excess of inflation. Now, you have another government and it promised a touchdown. I guess all you can expect from us as opposition is to kind of cheer you on as you expect to get a touchdown. You are right that next week, if the grants do come out, it will be the first test of where on the field the left end is.

Mr Jackson: The biggest problem we had with the previous government was that an announcement would come out, grants have gone up by 7% one year, 8% the next year, which sounds wonderful, except that the government has said—

Mr Phillips: Nine per cent last year.

Mr Jackson: Eight and the additional at budget time.

Mr Elmer: It was more like 2%. That is why Kimble brought up a very good point at Western. They cut back in their budget by 2% across the board.

Mr Jackson: The problem is, that is fine to increase them by, whether we take 8% or 9%, but when the government has also said, "We want you to take in X number of new students on a per-student basis," last year's grants, when you took off that enrolment bulge, the employer health tax and the pay equity the actual increase was 2.5%, which was less than the rate of inflation.

I think that is the past and what has happened has happened. What we would like is a commitment from the new government, if it is going to increase spaces, that it fully fund those spaces through all four years. We will be working with you to make sure that happens.

Mr Phillips: I know those guys.

Mr Jackson: I will be working with you to make sure they do it.

Mr Sutherland: I wanted to ask about another specific area of OSAP. I have had several calls lately from my constituents concerned about how OSAP is working for part-time, and more specifically, mature students. I was wondering if OFS has done any research on that or developed any policy on what specific reforms should be occurring on OSAP for mature students. I am sure, as the gentleman who is going to be speaking after you will probably address, many of them are low-income people.

Mr Jackson: We have done some very specific work on that and have met with ministry officials over the past few months. It is primarily a question of access to OSAP, that is the biggest thing, for part-time and mature students. We can continue to make suggestions that tinker with the current student assistance plan, but the general feeling by everyone, including I think the minister and the deputy minister—I guess the deputy minister until yesterday—is that the whole plan needs a revamp. We need a commitment from the government to undertake a comprehensive study of OSAP, with a commitment to revamp it at the end of it. We will continue to tinker away with it and we will be meeting with the director of OSAP to discuss the specific ideas we have for mature and part-time students. We would much rather revamp the whole system and start from scratch, but if it is the will of the government to keep tinkering with it, we will.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in the portion of your brief in particular which relates to faculty on campus. I note that you are supporting OCUPA's position on the creation of 1,500 new tenure track positions. A short time ago, I cannot remember whether it was in the 1986 or 1987 budget, there were additional moneys provided to the universities for faculty renewal. Indeed, they were welcomed by the universities. Perhaps everything could not be done at once, but there was an attempt made. Around that time as well, and perhaps a little bit before that, there was some consideration among the universities themselves that a more appropriate way of renewing faculty was indeed not the tenure route, that the tenure route was in fact discouraging faculty renewal, and that the new, eager, creative people were being cut out of the process through that route. I wonder how you have come to the conclusion that that is the best way to go in terms of faculty renewal, which is clearly a goal we all share. Why have you reached that conclusion?

Mr Jackson: I think the biggest problem with non-tenure track positions is access to the instructor. What is happening right now is that as universities are forced to cut back, they hire part-time lecturers. In faculties like accounting or similar programs, they hire actual practitioners from the local region. The problem with that is that students have very little access to those people outside classroom time. A part-time lecturer will come on the campus, give his or her lecture and then leave campus.

I suppose at the same time there is the problem that if you do not have tenure track positions and you do not have full-time faculty, what is happening with the research? The logical conclusion is that research is either not being done or is being done by corporations. The problem again, when we come into this whole notion of corporate research, is that it eliminates this whole notion of academic freedom, because the funds have come in from a company that wants research one way or another. Eventually there is going to be a void of research that does not meet the objectives of IBM and the corporations that can afford to pay for it.

So I guess it is twofold, but the more important specifically for us is the lack of access to the instructor when or she is not in a full-time tenure track position.

Mrs Sullivan: I think it is interesting that it is a matter of access. You feel that students need more time and there is not possibly space for them to be housed on campus and that the income they are making does not allow them to spend more time there.

Mr Jackson: And if I can add to that, it is compounded. As the classroom sizes get bigger, you have less direct contact in a classroom with an instructor and then you get less direct contact outside the classroom.

Mrs Sullivan: Do you see any other alternative to tenure to meet the same goals? These are budget issues, versus much budget issues.

Mr Jackson: I think whether it is tenure or not tenure our point simply has to be that there needs to be funding to allow the university to hire someone who can be on campus full-time, as his or her full-time employment. The question of tenure in terms of job security, which is generally a problem with tenure, is another question. As an immediate direct answer, we do not care if people are tenured or not as long as they are on campus constantly and that is their job. But when their job is elsewhere and they come on campus for three hours, that is where the problem is.

Mrs Sullivan: So then you are not fully in support of OCUPA's position?

Mr Jackson: Oh, yes, we are. We fully support that position, but if you are telling us we are either going to do nothing or we are going to get full-time lecturers, we will take the full-time lecturers.

Mr Elmer: Essentially, it is a question of quality of education as well. Tim mentioned one point, and that was access to professors, but it is not just that. People who have the experience are usually the people who get tenure. I do not necessarily agree with your presumption that these get-up-and-go type, aggressive people are not getting those jobs. I disagree with you on that point.

Mrs Sullivan: That was something that came out of the university community three or four years ago.

Mr Elmer: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: It led to the grants for faculty renewal and that is why I am pursuing it.

Mr Elmer: Just to reiterate my point, it is a quality of education issue, and that is why we do agree on a lot of points that faculty bring up, and obviously vice versa, as well as staff associations. And you are right, it is a budget issue.

Mr Kwinter: Just to pursue this whole topic of tenure, it is a subject that I am very familiar with. I waged a battle with OCUPA many years ago while I was the vice-president of the Ontario College of Art. OCUPA's major rationalization and defence of tenure is to give faculty members academic freedom to disagree with the administration, to disagree with society per se. We have a situation in Western where we have a professor expounding a particustory on genetic relationships to achievement and things that kind and tenure protects him.

I think there are other mechanisms for protecting people in today's society. At one time, tenure did serve that purpose. Right now—and when I say this, it is certainly not a universally held opinion—tenure really equates to job security. OCUFA is a union. They demand tenure because it gives their members job security. It gives them job security where most other people do not have job security. Again, this is a personally held view.

I do not want to generalize, because there are first-class professors who are tenured. There are also less-than-first-class professors who are tenured, but they have that protection, and it absolutely has an impact on the budget. You have this complement of professors at post-secondary institutions who are there. Again, with all due respect, it is like a civil servant. There is nothing more permanent than a part-time government employee. What happens is that it has an impact on the whole academic-financial relationship.

I would be curious to hear the arguments as to why tenure is that important when you can resolve a lot of your problems by having people whose sort of key to permanent employment is competence. If they are competent, they will be employed. If they are not competent, just like in any other field of endeavour, they will not be employed. Why should these people, given the impact it has on a very serious segment of our economy, the teaching of our youth and our adults and everything else, not be the best that are available?

Again, I want to be very clear that I am not painting with a universal brush. Most faculty members at universities are very competent and very able, but I think any objective observer would agree that there are lots who are not, and those who are not are preventing others who could be capable from getting into the institution because of the tenure track. I would like to hear some of your comments on that.

Mr Elmer: I think your point is valid, but I think you could also make the same point for the students that are in the system who do not deserve to be there or who do not work hard enough or what have you. There are also people who are not represented by associations or trade unions that you could make that same point for argument. In fact, I am surprised that you bring up this point because I do not think that is in fact the debate which is currently going on in the post-secondary education community and, by extension, I would say the public as well. I think the debate these days is around democracy and decision-making in university and college institutions.

To bring it back to your point, I think that the way in which we can have some input as students, as public, as citizens, as taxpayers, is to revamp the university and college system whereby more people have a say in things such as tenure and things such as registration priorities, SAP, appeals, all those different things which take place at the university and college level through the committees.

I would have to say that, coming back to the point I said before, we stand quite united with the faculty on this. This is an issue which is brought up again and again, and it is an issue that we discuss among ourselves in the university and college community. I think we have made a real effort in the past six months as faculty, staff, students and administrators to provide more of a common front. In the past we have tended to sit back and say, "Yes, I think that Mr Kwinter has some points," and we tend to attack each other on that. That is not the case any more. I can honestly say to you that is not the case, and I do not think it is the case that this is really an issue.

Mr Jackson: The biggest problem that we have had with tenure over the past few years has been this notion that we have argued that there have been some professors perhaps whose teaching abilities have not been measured the same as their research abilities.

No administrators under financial constraints are going to grant tenure to someone that they think is not going to give them some sort of resources. It just does not make sense, and I put confidence in the administrators of our universities that they would not do that. But because of underfunding, universities are having to look at some professors or potential professors based on their research value. How much can they bring in in research grants and what not? The teaching aspect of it is ignored.

We have absolutely no problems with the concept of tenure. Perhaps problems that exist today with tenure are, we believe, a symptom of underfunding, because if it was not for the underfunding problem, then we would be able to put a higher ranking on teaching when tenure decisions are being made. Why would a university administration—and I have sat on boards of governors of universities that have granted tenure—commit funds to someone who is not going to be a resource either from teaching or from bringing in research dollars? It does not make sense.

Mr Kwinter: If I can just comment, I think that in these times of constraint, I would agree with you. What I am saying is that the establishment is already in place. If there was an opportunity for renewal, if there was an opportunity to ask why we would have these people who were tenured 20 years ago, 25 years ago, who are not in a position to do any of the things that we use as our criteria today to tenure professors, why they are still in the system, the argument is: "Well, it is job security. These people have paid their dues and, as a result, they are entitled to it."

I am suggesting that is one of the problems. I am not in any way suggesting it is the major problem. The only reason I even entered into this discussion is that my colleague happened to bring it up, and I can tell you that—

The Chair: It is your fault.

Mr Kwinter: —I have lived, I have had some historical input into what has happened and much of what has gone on with the changes in the governance of universities.

The present president of the University of Waterloo, Doug Wright, was a one-man commission that looked into the administration of the Ontario College of Art and came up with the first unicameral system. It was absolutely the model that was then subsequently applied to universities across this province and across this country. As I say, I am not in any way saying that this is the major problem that is there, but it is a problem and it is an ongoing problem.

Mr Jackson: Yes, Doug Wright, who gave a workshop at a board of governors' meeting that I attended at the University of Waterloo where I sat on the board, talked about tenure and totally supported the notion of tenure. I would be very interested, if we asked him the same questions, in what his comment would be about that. Perhaps that is something we should do.

Mr Elmer: I think it is a valid comment. Now is the time for renewal. That is why we are bringing up these points. There is also the point of manager retirement that was upheld. You cannot take these things out of context. I think there are other factors which need to be looked at as well and that is one of them. But in terms of renewal, we are placing that, as I said to you before, in the context of the actual discussions which will be going on in the coming months and years over university governance, and we have a lot to say about that.

Mrs MacKinnon: I wish to commend you for your presentation. It is at times like this when I know my eloquence fails me. I never was very eloquent anyway, but forgive me if my question is very short and to the point. When one of my daughters was in university—I mentioned about the tuition fee and I hear you talking about zero tuition. That frightens me and I will tell you why. When I was discussing my daughter's tuition, there was a person in my home who said, "Her tuition won't even put the bricks around the door." I realize that this particular daughter I am speaking of, it was a few years ago, but I am wondering, if we have zero tuition, who is going to put the bricks around the door. Us, the government, is that what you are expecting?

Mr Jackson: No, I think us as graduates of the university and college system primarily, and that is what we have always said is our policy.

Mrs Sullivan: Through the taxes.

Mr Jackson: Through the tax system, through a progressive tax system, and without patting ourselves on the back, I think there is something to be said when I come here as someone who hopefully will graduate shortly from an accounting program and hopefully will make a decent income and say to you, "Tax me for the post-secondary education that I have had." Our goal is to eliminate the financial barriers to post-secondary education, make sure that no one is denied access on financial grounds and recoup that through both the personal and corporate income tax systems.

Mrs MacKinnon: Thanks very much. As I said, I wish I was as eloquent as you.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming. I do have one short question and it does revolve around the replacement of faculty. If we have 50% of the faculty gone by the year 2006, are we at this time training enough faculty to replace them from this country or are we going to be back into the 1960s dilemma of having to import professors from other jurisdictions?

Mr Elmer: Actually, that is the debate which is going on these days. I sat at a meeting a few months back where you had people from the education community say "This is ridiculous," pointing the finger at university administrators and saying: "You are not letting enough people into teacher education programs. In fact, you are cutting back on the number of people who are being trained to be teachers."

That is a big concern. I know that is a big concern of the Teacher Education Council. They discussed those meetings they held about a month ago. It is a concern of our members as well, because what is happening is that as they are cutting back on the enrolment of the people who are allowed into that program. You have to get the pluses, straight As basically, to get into those programs. At the time when the demand is, you are absolutely right, increasing and increasing.

Mr Jackson: But in terms of professors, it is over the past few years that the number of graduate students in the province has gone up significantly; the number of graduate student scholarships has remained frozen. As to the question of whether we can import them, the argument is the other way that is going on right now is, are we losing many to the United States because we cannot offer competitive salaries and, more important, can we offer competitive research facilities here in Canada?

Again, it is a symptom of the underfunding problem but I think the point we want to emphasize is that if government undertakes some sort of faculty renewal program, it is the perfect time to implement as well some sort of employment equity program to increase the number of female students in graduate programs in engineering, science, and thus eventually increase the female professorial in those faculties. Where are we going to get them from? That is a question that many would suggest right now.

The Chair: Thank you for coming.

ONTARIO COALITION AGAINST POVERTY

The Chair: Our next presentation is from the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty. This is John Clarke. If you would begin, please.

Mr Clarke: First of all, I would like to apologize for the fact that my co-presenter is not here. I am particularly chagrined that she is not here since I intended to do more than introduce her. None the less, making the best of things, I perhaps would like to run over some of the points that we intended to make and which we outlined briefly in the letter that we sent to your committee.

We did want to begin by making the point that our function as an antipoverty coalition is not in that sense the function as a sophisticated think tank that can bring financial projections before a government for it to consider. Our role is more one of talking to the need that exists in the community and outlining some measures that we think will make a difference, measures that we think are more important but measures that are desperately called for.

We met last week with the Premier and discussed some of these questions, so I think they need to be brought up and we would like to acknowledge that we are not insensitive to the fact that Ontario at the moment faces some very difficult times, that a recession is not just simply a hurt gedy but has a direct bearing on the government and on question of revenues.

We also would like to acknowledge that the government of Ontario faces a very difficult situation with regard federal initiatives that are, it would be a gross under-ment to say, less than helpful. We look at the impact Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance bill. We look at impact of the cap on the Canada assistance plan and we recognize that there is a real problem.

However, we are very, very serious about holding the government to promises that it made during the election campaign. We understand the problems, but frankly we think the problem of a government with fiscal problems is a relatively modest problem compared to the problems facing poor people in Ontario, the 100,000 people a month in this city alone who have to go to food banks.

We would make the comment that the argument that there is no room in the lifeboat is a lot more appealing to people who have seats than to the people who are expected to go down with the ship. Therefore, if we introduce into the debate around the initiatives that the government should take the irrationality of the desperate, we think that perhaps that is somewhat appropriate, that there is in our opinion, a need to be straining every resource in order to deal with the situation at the moment.

We would like to make the point when we address initiatives that are being taken around improving the welfare system, etc., that those are indeed important initiatives, but as far as we are concerned, the question of income adequacy is absolutely fundamental and is something that is going to have to be addressed if welfare reform is going to mean anything. In fact, welfare reform that is approached in such a way as to exclude movement on benefit structures, on the rates, threatens to be, in the final analysis, nothing more than a cosmetic diversion. The real issue is are people going to be paid enough to live on?

In our opinion, that means dismantling an edifice of legislative poverty that has been built up in this province over an extended period of time. That means we would oppose dealing with the minimum wage in a very, very cautious fashion and in a very timely fashion.

40 We are aware of the fact that during the campaign the plan for the raising of the minimum wage to 60% of the average industrial wage was advanced. We also acknowledge that that was not promised in one go. But we would urge the government to move rapidly in that direction to consider returning the minimum wage to its 1975 spending level, which would mean about $6.50, we would understand today, as an important first step, and to move rapidly with a clearly mapped out timetable to raise the minimum wage to the level that was promised. It is certainly not a princely wage; it is certainly something that will make an enormous difference to hundreds of thousands of people in this province.

Similarly, on the question of social assistance, we think there are two key areas that have to be looked at in terms of moving towards adequacy.

One is with regard to the general welfare assistance system. If a government is interested in moving in the direction of welfare reform, it must be acknowledged that as long as you have municipalities picking up 20% of the costs out of an inadequate municipal tax base and as long as you face the situation where, going with that, you have an inordinate number of local discretionary powers in the hands of those municipalities, you are not going to achieve a process of welfare reform. Indeed, you are going to have initiatives taken that are going to be horrendous.

We are aware of the fact that there is brewing a veritable municipal backlash. You have things like Kent county passing a resolution calling for the freezing of welfare rates throughout the life of the recession. You have Hastings county wanting to go over the list of everybody who is on welfare at its council meetings every month. You even have the municipality of Ottawa-Carleton looking seriously at social services cutbacks, social assistance spending cutbacks. That is a very, very serious development, because Ottawa-Carleton traditionally has been viewed as one of the more liberal municipalities with regard to the implementation of the general welfare assistance program.

We do make the point, and make the point forcefully, that particularly at this time of recession and pressure on the municipalities, there is a need to move rapidly to dismantle the two-tier welfare system, which is by no means something that exists in all provinces.

We would also make the point that the antipoverty movement on the question of benefit rights has campaigned actively in the past around a call for an increase in the minimum wage by 25%. That is something that was supported by the present government when it was in opposition. We would say that is a realistic figure, that is a figure that would make a significant difference, that would hold the line on the food banks, and is the kind of figure that we have to be talking about if we are talking about alleviating the suffering of people at this time, let alone reforming the welfare system.

I would, just before I turn things over to Heather, like to make the point that our organization does indeed, as some are probably aware, have a history of mobilizing on poverty issues, raising the concerns forcefully.

Perhaps I would like to direct my comments primarily to the members on the government side when I say that a great deal has been promised, a great deal is expected. The situation we are facing at the moment is indeed a very, very desperate one and I think Heather is going to speak to it in a moment.

We would very much like to be an organization that found ourselves backing changes that were being introduced, rallying to support those changes, taking on the critics who oppose those changes, but in this present situation we are facing something that is so desperate, something that is so severe that we have no choice but to continue to press around those very basic and important demands that we have in the past.

So perhaps, Heather, you would like to add some comments.

Ms Pringle: I just wanted to speak to you today about a situation I found myself in for a while. I was not always on assistance, but it is also a situation that any person can find herself in who loses a job through circumstances beyond her control. It is a very degrading situation, humiliating, a thing to be avoided. The reason is that people treat you with such disgust because you find yourself in this position.

There are things like food banks, which are Band-Aid situations. It is a very humiliating thing to go to a food bank. They want to know your name, your rank, your serial number. If you really and truly are on welfare or family benefits, you have to prove that. You have to tell them how many people are in your family. The thing that you get is very inadequate. Recently, and I think I understand some of it, you cannot go to more than one food bank per month, because now they have you computerized, which is really fun. If you run out of food and your children are hungry, you can only be serviced by one food bank. Then that goes back to the basics.

I have two sons. I do not get an adequate amount to live on for the month. I am sorry, but I really do not. I have to scratch and really use my wits to get through the month and then I have to possibly use a food bank, or there is another scam going around. I get my cheque and there are Money Marts and places to cash my cheque ahead of time. So if I do not want to go through the indignity of going to the food bank with humility, I can get my cheque cashed, but it would take about $30 to $50 off my cheque which already the government has given me.

I think some dignity, respect and a raise so that I can exist and have the same self-respect as any of you going to a grocery store, being able to budget without having to go to the food bank—I would like to see the food banks totally eradicated. The necessity is there for them right now. If you could see it clear to raise the assistance amount so that people can live—food goes up, telephones go up. I do not know, even Bell telephone thinks it is a privilege to have a phone when you are on assistance. With my children, I feel it is a necessity.

Things that you people take for granted are things I have to struggle to obtain and struggle to keep, because the minute I am known to be on mother's allowance or welfare or anything like that there are a lot of things that are in jeopardy for it. Things that you can get on credit I must have the cash for, and sometimes it takes me a long time to get that cash. Then I may not make it because something may come up through the month, like my children want to participate in something.

I also want to speak to the education system in this province at the moment, or what I have experienced. My children go to school and because of the address they come from they are automatically seen as needing special education. The only thing they really need is the same amount of respect and consideration that your children would get in your school system. They do not need to be stigmatized or segregated or separated in any way. In any other class besides the poor class, a child is taken on his own merit and he rises or falls depending on his ability. When you see a child come from a poor section or from an address that you know is, say, Metro housing or Regent Park, you do not expect him to achieve, so you do not give him the opportunity, and unless he struggles really hard, he never gets the opportunity. I think that is wrong.

When I was growing up in Toronto and going to school here, we had the "brighter children," the "average child" and the "slow learner." We all learned from each other because everybody has something to give to a cause, a community, whatever. I want you also to realize that the children are quick learners. The way their parents are treated, the way they are treated, is going to have a profound effect on their future, on our future as a country. I think if a child grows up feeling cheated because of the way he was treated through the education system or lack of dignity and respect he was given because of the situation that his parent or parents found themselves in, that will come back on you some day.

I would like to see every child get the same advantages, to the best of everybody's ability, because to me children are precious. I know your children are precious to you. They are something that is going to build this country and expand it. I want them to have the same opportunities which may not deal with the issue of, you are thinking now, "What has that got to do with raising my level of income?" It has a great deal to do with it, because when my child goes to school, I want him to look just as good as your child. I want him to hold his head up high. I do not want him to be called a welfare case. I want him to have self-respect. I want him to be treated the best as anybody can, as the next person.

In school, it starts when he starts to go to junior kindergarten. It is something I felt very strongly about. It was something I had to deal with with my older child. They sent him off to special education classes at the age of five. Then they come back and they reintegrate them, but they are always kept at a basic level. Another child can go to the average or the advanced. I do not think that is fair. I think if you are worried, maybe you feel that my child does not have the same advantages as your child, and it is true, he does not, but he certainly would like to have the same warm feeling going to bed at night, because he is not hungry; he would like to be able to have the same advantage of a warm coat, of things that are very basic things you do not even think about because you are able to provide them.

I would also like to talk to you about the working poor, the person who suffers, as well as the welfare recipient. The working poor man and his family struggle along. The working poor man starts to sometimes in his frustration think, "Why shouldn't I go on assistance?" He works, but he ends up in the same address as myself. His kids go to school; he works. He sees nothing for his toil. He is heavily taxed. He cannot get himself ahead. His frustration and his anger turn on, say, the person on assistance, because he does not understand why that person is getting this and he is getting nothing.

I had a conversation with a friend of mine. I said, "I am getting any more than you?" I am not. We sat down and we worked it out and he was getting far more than I am and still could not survive. He had double the amount of money come and could not survive, and he worked for it. I work for it too. I am what you call a domestic engineer. I think my job is worthy of what I receive. In fact, it is worth more than I receive.

I wanted to tell you about this. I wanted to tell you about the humiliation, which possibly you have never experienced, and I hope and I pray that you never do. But I want you to realize that with the recession there are going to be thousands and thousands of people in this country put in the same situation. But for the grace of God, you could say, there go I. It is not a life that you would want to choose.

I hope that in your consideration and your deliberation you will consider the fact that I am really begging for the people who can hardly make it. I do not know what else to say to you. It is an urgent situation; it is a dire situation; it is a desperate situation. Every day there are more and more people being placed in this position. I have been around through the Ontario career action program and different things that I belong to, I have been down here. I have heard your promises, and I really want to see what you are going to do about what you said you would do, because I believed in you. Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to thank you for the presentation. It was very moving, and I certainly understand your point. Again, I have a concern that some solutions are simplistic. I want to address the minimum wage in particular. There is no question that anybody earning minimum wage is certainly earning a very paltry income.

The problem that we have, and we have been hearing about throughout the hearings, is the problem of our competitiveness. Capital is fluid; it goes where it thinks it can get the best return. What happens is that when people are looking to invest, and we are a heavily investment-dependent jurisdiction, they look at all of these components. They look at our taxation, they look at all of the things that go into it, and minimum wage is one of them.

We have had a policy, which changed just last year, whereby we have always been in tandem with Quebec, because we felt that the minimum wage in the United States was far below ours but at least we should keep in tandem with Quebec. This year we have deviated from that. Quebec maintained its minimum wage at $5; we went to $5.40. I have no quarrel with that.

The problem is that if we were to go to the goal of 60% of the average industrial wage, if you did it immediately, you would be at $7.20, and even if you did it in five years' time, with inflation built in, you are looking at a pretty substantial number. But that is not all of the problem. The problem you have is that those people who are at the minimum-wage level—and as I say, my heart goes out to them, and I think they are entitled to more money—but there is a sort of a reaction effect. The other people, people who are now earning $8 an hour for relatively menial tasks, their mindset is that they are out earning X dollars above the minimum wage, and when they sort of evaluate their income and their job, they say: "My God, I won't work for that; that is minimum wage. I am worth more than minimum wage. I want—" whatever it is.

As I say, I know from personal experience because my family has a business and we hire a lot of unskilled people, and these are people who cannot even speak one word of English, but they know one thing when they walk in—$8 the starting fee. That is what they want.

When the minimum wage goes up, it would be great if the only thing that was affected were those people at the minimum wage, but what happens is, everybody other than the highly skilled workers who have got union contracts that pay them in the $20 range, whatever it is, but that other sector, which is very significant, will immediately react and say, "Well, if the minimum wage has gone to $6 or $6.50 or $7.50, then certainly the differential between that wage and our wages diminished dramatically and we of course want to go to $9, $10 or whatever it is." It has this escalating, ratcheting effect, which then impacts on our competitiveness. That is one of the problems.

It would seem to me that what we have to do is address the problem of the people who are at that low end of the wage scale, but in such a way that it does not automatically ratchet the whole thing up, where what it does is raise the actual number but in the long term does not change anything, because all you are doing is playing with numbers but you are not playing with what happens. It just sends everything up a notch higher and you have the same relationships. You have the people who are at the bottom still being deprived.

That is a concern I have and I do not know the answer. I am just saying that I have wrestled with this for a long time and I believe that just changing that number is not necessarily the solution. If you could do it in isolation that would be great, but it cannot be done in isolation and it is going to have an impact all the way up the line.

The other thing I want to talk about—again, I apologize because I have not been able to keep abreast of everything that has been going on in the Legislature for the last six years—is that it seemed to me that we had discussed this problem you have about cashing welfare cheques. It may have been in private member's hour or whatever. I thought we had addressed it in the sense that we had made it illegal for someone to charge a premium over and above what he normally charges for cashing any kind of cheque and that we were going to provide some sort of photo ID that would not be a credit card, per se, but would certainly be tied to the welfare cheque so that you could go into any financial institution. It would have your picture, your signature and a correlation code, so that the cheque would go in and you would have no hassle as long as you could show the card to show that you were in fact the recipient of—

Mrs Sullivan: At the bank?

Ms Pringle: A welfare cheque is one of the hardest cheques to cash. The bank does not want to take it unless it is the exact date. But sometimes I run out of food before the exact date, so I have two choices: I can go to the food bank which gives me nothing, okay, or I can get my cheque cashed. In doing so, the amount of days ahead that I have to cash that cheque is the amount of money they take off that cheque, and it is a percentage.

Mr Kwinter: Let me just tell you another problem, and this was certainly addressed at the federal level. People who filed their income tax were entitled to a refund and went out and discounted it before they got their refund back. In other words, they would go to an institution that specialized in that and they said, "Bring us your income tax return and we will give you the money that you are going to get back from the government." What they did not say is, "We will give it to you, but we will take a very healthy percentage of that for our efforts."

What had happened was that the federal government, I think, has stepped in to prevent that from happening, but there is also an educational problem and I do not know how you would do it. They found that there are people out there—it did not matter if it was two days away—who would still go out and discount those cheques because they want the money now and are not going to wait two days. That is a problem. It is a problem if you are really in dire straits. There is no question about that.

To my mind, these are issues that can be addressed on the one side, the actual logistics of how you get the cheque cashed, how you do that. How you alleviate the desperation that sort of puts you in a position where you cannot wait that one day or that two days; I do not know how you can address that with that vehicle. Those are just the things I currently hear.

Mr Clarke: Actually, just quickly on the question of the cashing of cheques, in fact I was part of a deputation that met with you a number of years ago and discussed the very point. There were a number of initiatives that needed to be taken, many of them federal, but one of the key ones that could be taken by the province is the question of the postdating of cheques.

The problem you have is that assistance cheques are mailed out. They are dated for the first of the month and yet they usually arrive on the 27th or the 28th of the month. People then find themselves in a situation where they have a cheque they cannot cash, so they go to Money Mart or whatever, which takes its cut. Some municipalities, including I believe Metropolitan Toronto, have decided to date the cheques for the time when they actually arrive and they can thereby be cashed. That has substantially reduced the number of people having to go to Money Mart. I believe that in Hamilton-Wentworth they discovered about a 50% drop in their business. But some of the changes have to be tackled at the federal level through the Bank Act as well.

On the question of the minimum wage, we could, I suppose, wax philosophical. We are really into a situation where I suppose that what it comes down to for us is a basic bottom-line position that people have to be entitled to a living wage. To peg the minimum wage at a sub-poverty level is to us unconscionable.

I think working people throughout history have come up against the competitiveness argument. It cuts both ways of course. You can say that the minimum wage should go down and then there would be more employment. It seems to us that Ontario, as a wealthy province, should be taking a lead on the question of the minimum wage and pushing it up.

Frankly, this discussion on it between you and me is somewhat academic. What we are into is a situation where we are dealing with a concrete election promise. The government in power did subscribe to the view that the minimum wage should be raised to that figure. So I think, frankly, are addressing our comments primarily to that side saying that we would like to see very rapid movement.

Mr Kwinter: Good luck.

Mr Phillips: You kind of said it, John, the last time you and I had this debate in front of my campaign headquarters. I put forward the best argument I could of we arrived at it. The rally was organized by the labour council and stuff. It was good publicity for the NDP, question of it, and the NDP won and we lost. You got your promise.

I went through with you, John, as you remember, they had concerns about the number of jobs that might be lost but we lost that argument. I went through on the social assistance side and said, "Listen, we've doubled the budget get from $3 billion to $6 billion over five years." The NDP has said that is not good enough. As you say, I think it is academic. You are addressing your comments to the right side and the best we lowly opposition can do is to hold them accountable for it and see just what happens.

It was an interesting debate on the front lawn, emotional and not particularly pleasant for me, because, as I say, there was lots of emotion involved in it. We were made to look like the bad guys. The best we can do for you, John, is to say, "They won, we lost and we will wait for them."

Mr Stockwell: Frankly, you are going to find a lot of promises they made that they are going to have to fill. They are not the only one here who has come forward who has reminded them they made promises. They have already broken some and there is going to be a string of them. I am quite sure. I am quite certain your promise is going to be another one. So it is going to be an interesting few years we have ahead of us.

I would like to see how they defend themselves tomorrow. It will be interesting hearing them tell you exactly what they plan to do, considering that they were very clear-cut and very understanding during the election as to what they could do. It has changed and that is what happens when there are elections and people get power.

Mr Phillips: Don't be cynical.

Mr Stockwell: I am cynical, aren't I?

The question I have is on the cycle we are in now with respect to the process and the amount of money and so on. How long has it been now since you have been caught in this cycle where you are spinning your wheels, basically, and you have lost your job?

Ms Pringle: Ten years. Ten years ago the situation was that my husband and I separated and I did not have the skills to go back to work, but I also feel that my children were my priority.

Mr Stockwell: I am not arguing that at all. I was just curious with respect to you having said you came into this problem because you lost your job through no fault of your own.

Ms Pringle: No. I said people find themselves in these situations through no fault of their own. I do nt to perpetuate the cycle. I want my son to grow up and k for a job and have some self-esteem and self-respect.

Mr Stockwell: I am not arguing that. That is not the stion. I do not mean it to be the question. I do not want to taken incorrectly. I thought you said that this happened ough no fault of your own because you lost your job.

Ms Pringle: My husband and my job; they both left.

Mr B. Ward: She said through no fault of her own, she did not say she lost her job through no fault of her n.

Mr Stockwell: I am sorry, I misinterpreted that. I see. now it has been 10 years that you have been caught in s, and I assume through your statement that at some e during the process you moved into some form of tro housing.

Ms Pringle: Yes, I did. I am very fortunate because I e in Metro housing and it is geared to income, but what cks me up is that it is also government-oriented, so as n as my minute increase comes, Metro housing grabs it.

Mr Stockwell: They grab 33% or whatever of that nute increase?

Ms Pringle: That is right, so if my cheque goes up, rent goes up.

Mr Stockwell: I understand that too. Today, though, we see it, you are fortunate to be in Metro housing.

Ms Pringle: I am. There are people out there who are ng to exist—

Mr Stockwell: Who are not in Metro housing.

Ms Pringle: —on these cheques who have to look for ular housing. They have my heartfelt sympathy, be- ase there is nothing out there.

Mr Stockwell: Right. Now considering the fact that u are in Metro housing, which is, again, geared to in- ne, I assume 33% or some type of figure like that of ur income is paid as rent and the rest is left for you to end however you can spend it.

Ms Pringle: It sounds so easy.

Mr Stockwell: I am not pretending for a moment to ke it sound easy. I am just trying to get the rules down d those are in fact the rules, so you would be a more tunate individual than the ones who do not get some m of assisted housing.

Ms Pringle: I am. However, I do not feel fortunate ause we live in a country that is rich in grain and rich in d.

Mr Stockwell: "Fortunate" is maybe the wrong word. ill withdraw "fortunate."

Ms Pringle: I do not understand why I am in this sition when I am in one of the richest countries in the rld.

Mr Stockwell: That may well be true and I can under- nd your feelings.

The other question is, what about a job search? At this nt in time you are staying at home to look after your ldren. Again, it is admirable, and I am not suggesting it should not be done that way, but my question stands, though. Is there any thought of maybe going out and look- ing for a job?

Ms Pringle: I have taken part-time jobs, part-time be- cause on assistance you are not allowed to make anything.

Mr Stockwell: No, I understand that, but I am thinking more of a full-time job that pays you more than assistance.

Ms Pringle: If you do, they take your benefits away immediately and they do not allow you to get on your feet.

Mr Stockwell: Again, I do not want to put words in your mouth, but I am trying to get the questions asked and clarified. I am thinking more of a full-time job that would pay you more than assistance.

Ms Pringle: I would love to find it, but I also need—

Mr Stockwell: And you have not found it in 10 years?

Ms Pringle: I have not found it. I find part-time jobs around Christmastime to help me get through Christmas.

Mr Stockwell: Okay. The last question is if, for in- stance, a job were offered at full-time money that paid you more than assistance, would you be interested in going back to work?

Ms Pringle: I certainly would.

Mr Stockwell: You would be interested in going back to work.

Ms Pringle: Yes, I would. Have you got a job?

Mr Stockwell: I do hire some people, but I do not have a job right now. I have just laid off a bunch of people.

The last question I have is, have you in fact looked for that full-time job?

Ms Pringle: Yes, sir, I have.

Mr Stockwell: And you cannot find a job in 10 years?

Ms Pringle: No.

Mr Clarke: Perhaps I could just make a point. We talk of a cycle, but I think in the 1980s recession to reces- sion, as it were, what we have seen is not so much a cycle as a descending spiral, in the sense that the recession we are now getting deeply into is fundamentally a different creature from the last one in the sense that throughout the period of the 1980s the welfare case loads did not come down significantly. Also, you had an enormous transfer of people over to the low-wage, primarily service, sector in terms of the employment that was out there.

As to the shape that poor people are in, they are al- ready suffering more and in much greater numbers than previously. The impact of the recession, therefore, is prov- ing to be that much greater. I think that is something that needs to be taken into account when emergency measures to deal with the situation are looked into.

Mr Stockwell: Again, we could wax philosophical, I suppose, about that stuff as well, all day, and probably it would not make a wit of difference because we do not happen to sit on that side of this committee.

The question, though, that I was driving at is, if there were available work, is it something that would happen? Really the answer is yes and that is good. Sorry; go ahead.

Ms Pringle: Could I finish? I am sorry; I realize that I did not really, truly answer your question properly. If I were to go to work I would need supervision for my children and I would need bus fare. What I am saying to you is that there is no support system from A to B. If you sat down with me, you would tell me to stay on welfare because by the time I get all these things looked into and approved, like day care—

Mr Stockwell: Would you qualify for subsidized day care?

Ms Pringle: No, I would not. I have two children, so I would maybe be subsidized for one, but have to pay for the other.

Mr Stockwell: No. I mean, if you qualify, you qualify.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Chairman, I am not sure that it is relevant to speak directly about the individual case of the person.

Mr Stockwell: I am sorry, Mr Chairman, I certainly did not want it, but the deputation was clearly an individual deputation and this issue was clearly brought forward. All I was curious about was this individual case. If we were not going to discuss this, that is fine, but you are going to have deputations about individual cases and I think we should have at least a little bit of leeway to discuss it.

The Chair: I think there has been a lot of leeway on this one already.

Mrs Sullivan: I think I reached my level of tolerance, I suppose, and that is why I raised it.

The Chair: I would like to move to Mr Hansen's questions now.

Mr Hansen: John and Heather, I am not here to criticize on your personal lives there like Mr Stockwell.

Mr Stockwell: On a point of order, Mr Chair: That was an unfair comment. It is out of order and it is totally unacceptable. I did not criticize their personal behaviour or personal play. I take great exception to that.

Mr Hansen: I take that back. I apologize.

The Chair: Can we move along?

Mr Hansen: In 1981-82 I was involved in a local church starting up a soup kitchen and I know the dignity that a lot of people lost at that particular time on the loss of jobs. I have experienced it first hand in that particular area. The one thing that did happen at that time, at that Christmas is that you are talking about having have to go in and give your name, where you live and what you collect on welfare. What we had was some people who were working at the local plants making $40,000 and $50,000 a year coming in and picking up toys, picking up food. It was some way to check that the people who were not entitled to it were not receiving it. So what happens? It comes down to the people who are supposed to be receiving it having to go through all these checks.

I am just trying to explain what I could see going on. I think what you are saying is that you have to go through all these checks in order to get there. It is because of the people who can afford it who are going in and collecting, and so that there is enough there for people who do need it. I think that is the reason there.

On the cashing the cheques, I know that has been a problem, and explaining what you said, that staying home is better than actually going out to work in some instances with the system the way it is. I think it is going to take the government a little while to figure out how to work in these plans coming up. We had the throne speech 20 November. We are just a couple of months in there, and as I have been told we are spinning our wheels right now, but I think it is going to take a little time. It is not going to happen tomorrow or next week. It is going to take a little while before everything comes into place.

With the economy the way it is, I realize that—not only yourself; it has been there for a few years—we are going to have a lot more people in the same situation and we are going to try to address it.

Mrs Sullivan: I have been very interested in following the recommendations over a period of time that have come out of the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty. I think that for the most part, no matter what government, there has been real attention paid to the words that we say and the meaning and experiences that come behind those words. I look at your recommendations today. I think the major one, the rate issue and the minimum wage issue have both been included in the Social Assistance Review Committee report. Initial steps have been taken to implement the SARC report and with luck and with good management, indeed those increased steps will be taken over the next period of time.

I was quite interested in your comments that you felt the province should take over 100% of the delivery of social assistance. Certainly that was the municipalities' position last year and, I guess, the previous year. I think that was also the position of the SARC report, although I was flipping through things to see what kinds of recommendations they had made in those areas. One of the things the SARC report pointed out is that no matter who the deliverer is, whether it is provincial or municipal, a major constraint is the cost of housing. Are you still seeing that? You did not raise it and I wanted you to have the opportunity to speak to it.

Mr Clarke: I think it is absolutely unquestionable that the cost of housing is a major question. We have supported initiatives that we see coming out of this government around rent control. We note the commitments made around areas of non-profit housing, etc, in An Agenda for People, the document submitted by the government when it campaigned for office.

Unquestionably, those things are true and we would indeed want to go on record as continuing to support them. We would want to continue to support initiatives around child care, another absolutely vital question. It is simply that we want to zero in on something that we see as being a very simple, straightforward question, the question of income adequacy, as being perhaps an area where in the most clear-cut and obvious fashion a government should quite frankly, we expect and hope something different from can act and act with dispatch. So if we are looking myopic, it is, I think, deliberate.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick question and comment. I think that what you are saying, John and Heather, is that poverty is eradicated from this province, if it ever was. But you and your organization are not going to go any further. You are going to keep our government on its toes so that we can progress from a socioeconomic standpoint for the betterment of working people who are at the poverty level. That is the basic message, that you would like to see some clear-cut action against poverty in this province.

Mr Clarke: Undeniably true.

The Chair: I have just a quick question for my own information. When a person collects welfare then goes on to work and receives money from a job, at what rate is the welfare reduced?

Ms Pringle: I can collect $150 over and above my monthly benefits cheques.

Mr Kwinter: Over what period of time?

Ms Pringle: Per month. Then over and above that, I must pay back the welfare. If I make $200, I have to give $200 back because they consider they have already paid me.

The Chair: So it is dollar for dollar?

Ms Pringle: It is dollar for dollar.

The Chair: What impact would there be if that regulation was removed?

Ms Pringle: I think that would be great, if there was a support system. If anybody took the opportunity to find a job or go back to school and get training or whatever and get into the job, as long as there was a support system in place until the person got on his feet. For instance, it takes three months for OHIP to go into place. I think three months after you have paid your last payment, it supports you until you get another job or you go on assistance or whatever, if there was a place there where it was supportive.

Imagine we were not in a recession, but people who are struggling to get back into the workforce find that using the welfare system, and it is a deadly trap, trying to struggle to leave it, they have everything cut from beneath them before they are able to pay for things like drugs, which are phenomenal in price, or a dentist.

Even on assistance, unless my teeth are rotting in my mouth, I cannot go to a dentist, you understand, unless I have had the teeth removed or a plate. My children can get fillings and things like that, but it is $45 to clean my teeth. My teeth rot in my mouth until I cannot take the pain any more and I go and get the dentist to remove them.

I wish you could appreciate that, because that happened to me only last year. The card says emergency benefits. My children can have their teeth cleaned—thank God for that—and everything looked after for them, but I must have my stiff upper lip and wait to the point that I must have that tooth removed. It is beneficial in a way. I kind of laugh when you say family benefits. But then it is also a very real punishment too. It depends on which part of the thing you see now.

The Chair: I thank you for coming. All I can say is that there will be a long, hard debate on this issue over the next while. Thank you for your presentation.

PERSONS UNITED FOR SELF-HELP IN ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presentation is Persons United for Self-Help in Ontario; Francine Arsenault, co-ordinator.

Ms McGregor: This brief is not just from Persons United for Self-Help in Ontario, which is PUSH Ontario, but also from Disabled People for Employment Equity.

Mr Southern: I want to say before we start that I am glad that the committee responded better to the last presentation than it did to the income maintenance committee's presentation. I was a bit disappointed in that. Not one question was asked of our committee. We worked damned hard on that presentation. I got the feeling that some of the committee members felt they had heard it all before. In fact, one of the observers who came in said that one committee member read the paper, and I will not say who, but I would appreciate it if you would give us your full co-operation this time.

Mr Sutherland: I will just tell you one of the reasons I did not have any questions was because you had it well documented in a written form.

Mr Southern: I do not think you have to justify yourself.

Mr Sutherland: No, I am just saying there was a sense that maybe some of the committee members were not as interested in that presentation or what have you.

Mr Southern: I think the last presentation was not that different from ours and people came up with enough for them. Disabled people are one of the biggest groups in Canada that are still living in poverty. Over 50% of disabled people in Canada earn less than $10,000 a year. I think that is criminal. We heard it said how rich this country is. Everybody seems to think that inflation and profit margins that employers are allowed to earn were caused by poor people. It was not and it is not. I get infuriated when I see how so-called politicians respond to some of these presentations. Sorry about that emotional outburst, but it does me good now and again.

Anyway, down to business. My colleagues are Richard Dector from PUSH Ontario, who is our project co-ordinator and helps keep PUSH afloat, and Carol McGregor, who, as the co-ordinator for Disabled People for Employment Equity for about a year, has done phenomenal work in the area of employment equity. I believe that this government's policy on employment equity, which we hope will come to fruition soon, was partially formulated by her hard work.

Anyway, what Carol is going to do is go through our paper. We are going to present a sort of joint DPEE/PUSH view on the various issues. I think Carol is going to read in point form, and I am going to comment on some of the stuff. Carol or Richard will also make their comments.

Ms McGregor: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. I wonder if you would have the members do John and me the courtesy of introducing themselves. We do not have the ability to see their signs.

The Chair: I will begin. I am Jim Wiseman, Chairman of the committee.

Mr Christopherson: I am Dave Christopherson from Hamilton Centre.

Mr Sutherland: Kimble Sutherland from Oxford.

Mr B. Ward: Brad Ward from Brantford.

Mrs Sullivan: Barbara Sullivan, Halton Centre.

Mr Phillips: Gerry Phillips from Scarborough-Agincourt.

Ms McGregor: We lost some in the process, I think.

Mr Southern: Teatime.

Ms McGregor: Yes.

Mr Southern: Okay, Carol, let's go now.

1730

Ms McGregor: PUSH Ontario seeks to provide a unified voice for more than 900,000 Ontarians with disabilities of all kinds. Disabled People for Employment Equity is a coalition of more than 30 consumer groups and service-providing agencies dedicated to ending the chronic unemployment and marginalization of people with disabilities. Together we ask the members of the committee to consider the following measures strongly.

Disabled people continue to live in unnecessary and unacceptable poverty in Ontario. We recommend the committee endorse the following steps towards changing this little-regarded reality.

Income maintenance, health and social services: We recommend that the government of Ontario extend the assistive devices program to include all equipment categories, including communication aids for the visually impaired.

Mr Southern: Keep going, because I spoke quite liberally on that before.

Ms McGregor: Disabled persons receiving government assistance who live with members of their family should not be penalized by being paid a lower "non-profit boarding rate." End this practice.

Mr Southern: I think it is worth pointing out, which I did not when we were making our brief before, that if you live with family, you get what is known as a boarder's rate, which is less than the rate if you live on your own. Obviously it is just crazy and stupid. Certainly when you hear of provinces talking about encouraging families and whatever, I do not think it does much for that.

Ms McGregor: At a minimum, implement indexation of social assistance rates to the consumer price index to ensure that rates reflect more accurately the true cost of living.

Mr Southern: That is self-explanatory.

Ms McGregor: In many families, a non-disabled spouse acts as both a care giver and a wage earner. A rate increase to lessen strain on these families should be considered, if only because of the enormous costs spared the health care and social service system by the unpaid efforts of such couples. Maintaining benefits at unlivable levels is not only immoral, it is bad economics.

Mr Dector: I would like to add something here. One of the issues that was considered at great length by the previous government and is no doubt going to be looked at again by this government is long-term-care reform. One of the elements of that reform is whether or not things like respite will be given to people who are in the position of taking care of, say, a spouse with Alzheimer's or something like that. People who are in that situation are saving the government enormous amounts of money that would be spent on institutional care for people, and that is part of what we are talking about here, measures that in the long run bring some cost but in the long run save a great deal of money.

Ms McGregor: Make accessibility a priority in the provision of affordable housing. PUSH welcomes the fact that the subsidy increases accorded under the FBA. However, the supply of affordable accessible accommodation is inadequate throughout the province. "Inadequate" is probably an inadequate word.

Mr Southern: Yes, it is a major problem for disabled people. Only a small number of persons with disabilities are as fortunate, or whatever word you want to use, to live in publicly supported housing. For example, I myself live in a co-op. I can just about afford to live in one of those.

Mr Phillips: You can go to my riding, John.

Mr Southern: I wish I could.

Ms McGregor: Improve the supports to employment program. We welcome the improvements already made in social assistance under STEP, but recipients must be allowed to keep a greater percentage of the income than they earn. Any comments?

Mr Southern: The STEP program could be a big advantage to a lot of people on social assistance but, in my opinion, it is certainly not a great help to disabled people. There are so many costs involved, as I pointed out earlier, with disabled people leaving social assistance. For example, just this month I left social assistance, and everyone would be saying, "Oh, that's good," but I am losing money. I am earning less money now than I was on the STEP program, but I am earning too much to be eligible for it.

Next month, as was pointed out the problem with the dental program, I have got to go to the dentist. I have no dental card left any more. It is going to cost me a lot, and I will really be out of pocket. I think that the benefits and the levels of the STEP program have certainly not been raised a lot more, but it is a step in the right direction, no pun intended.

Mr Dector: I would like to add something, and a practical example: An employer wanting to offer someone who uses an electric wheelchair a job—I gather everyone here is in favour of encouraging that sort of thing—in a position where, say, the wheelchair requires repairs on a regular basis. This is a very common situation. If the person is paid over a certain amount, he will lose all eligibility for FBA, say, $10 an hour for a single person on disability. If they are paid $8.50 an hour, they can retain their drug card and also continue to have the repairs paid for their wheelchair.

An employer is put in the position, and I am speaking from some experience, even with all the assistance available in the world from lawyers who have studied the social assistance system, of having to guess at what point he will be knee-body off and that person will be actually in a worse situation than if he did not work at all. In our membership, we are talking about people who have been looking for a job for 10 and sometimes 20 years. It is intolerable.

Mr Southern: I will ask Carol if she could skip some of the other social assistance areas. Many people have depended on it and perhaps we could get to some of the other priorities like transportation.

Ms McGregor: I am going to turn the transportation matter over to Richard and let him proceed.

Mr Dector: PUSH is active in a group called Trans-Action. It is a coalition of groups concerned with accessible transportation. This is PUSH's position on some of the issues.

We want the new provincial government to fully commit to a fully accessible public transportation system, just as the preceding government did, and we are very hopeful that it is going to come.

We need to see adequate funding to ensure the projects outlined in the Minister of Transportation's November 1989 plan will be fully accessible to all Ontarians. That includes a fully accessible GO Transit system. Via Rail has been cut back considerably, as everyone knows. Via Rail, as it is and was in certain respects, was the most accessible transportation system in Canada.

In that regard, GO has to be improved, otherwise people are stuck in a situation where there is decreasing accessibility on the airlines because of deregulation, the intercity bus services are not accessible and the trains are being cut back, and what you are essentially saying is, "If you can't get to work, you have to stay at home."

Mr Southern: I just wanted to make a point on transportation. I heard of somebody just recently who was offered a job and could not take the job because he could not get to work by any reliable transportation.

Mr Dector: Yes, it is crazy. I was talking in quite technical terms, people being offered a job and telling the employer that they can start four days after the starting date because they need some time to arrange their wheelchairs. That does put you at somewhat of an employment disadvantage when you cannot take a job even when you are offered one.

The other thing is that the bus situation is so bad that I have had members say that they are going to use the bus service to come to a meeting, but it means they have to crawl up the stairs. It is unbelievable.

We want to see that the Let's Move projects in Metro, such as Spadina light rail transit and Sheppard, are fully accessible. Everyone has talked about making Sheppard fully accessible. We want to see that a reality. We want to see, as the minister has indicated, to ensure that the recommendations in the TTC Choices for the Future report are paid for. We need increased support for parallel services.

Again, we are asking for more and more money for different things, but parallel services means things like the elimination of regional cutbacks. In that case, people are at risk of losing their jobs or health care or education, because they cannot get there. There is some long-term cost for short-term gain.

Mr Southern: It is ridiculous. In the Peel region, for example, they are going to cut back on the parallel transit system and disabled people are expected to say, "I understand that you can't afford it." Damn it, if people cut back and slashed the TTC system by 50%, you would have heard a little bit more than, "Oh, well, they understand its cost," I tell you.

Mr Dector: Imagine if you had to book four days in advance to go in the subway, which is the current thing for the Wheel-Trans.

To establish and improve accessible public transport in rural areas: One of the lower cost alternatives here is community bus services. That is something that has been talked about. There is one pilot project in Metro. These are smaller buses on flexible schedules. They are buses that virtually anyone can use. They are either low-floor or they have ramps, you can go on with a stroller, you can go on if you are a senior citizen who uses a walker, and they are wheelchair accessible in some cases.

We are fully in support of those and we would like to see funding for that. We also would like to see funding for proper training of transit staff so they are aware of how to deal with people with certain types of disabilities, because there is some getting used to people. That is it for transportation.

Ms McGregor: I would really like to really reinforce the transportation. I am one of these who happen to live in Peel. I ride the GO train every day and I cannot get home at night; I often have late-night meetings because people who are in this employment equity area are working in the day. I am trying to get home at 10 or 11 o'clock at night, and I am always having to take taxis from Clarkson up to Meadowvale, which is at Winston Churchill Boulevard and Highway 401, because we do not have commuter transit service up there yet. Not that it is accessible, but at least I have the dog and we can get up and down. But it is not the safest place to try to get around at night.

Our students up there are in great peril. I am going to talk about education because I have had quite a few phone calls from disabled students. Their education is in jeopardy, their future employment is in jeopardy, basically because of the transportation. They are also faced with costs substantially higher than those facing able-bodied students in the education area.

OSAP was introduced. It replaced vocational rehabilitation services funding of tuition. Students must apply for OSAP funding for tuition. They are also required, at the same time, to save out of their $600-a-month pensions $1,200 a year—a lot of people with disabilities are finding this very, very stringent—in order to match the donations by kind. There is no difference made between disabled students or able-bodied to go to university or college. You are treated the same. We want to be treated the same, but recognizing the fact that a person with a disability has a much higher cost of living. Our medical costs are higher, our transportation costs are higher, medications and just general living. It is much more expensive for us to even access.

By jeopardizing our services at university and college, we are creating great barriers to employment. As a person who is advocating for employment equity, I view this very seriously. I have students phoning and saying: "I think I'm going to have a nervous breakdown. I can't get my books. I'm not getting my educational materials on tape on time. The professors won't give me extensions." The accommodations are not there. The funding is going to the colleges and the universities, but our students are not getting the accommodations they need. They are just saying, "Will you keep fighting for us?" Yes, we will keep fighting, because equity in education has to be a prelude to employment equity.

We do feel, though, that the transportation cost in particular should perhaps be seen as an accommodation under the funding that is supplied to the colleges and universities for special-needs students. In the federal public service, the Human Resources Secretariat right now is treating transportation as an accommodation, and I do not see why our students could not have the same courtesy extended.

Employment equity: Obviously, for disabled people we feel this is a very crucial matter. Nationally, more than 171,000 persons with disabilities capable and available for work are unemployed. The cost of maintaining this number of people is more than $2.2 billion per year. If these 171,000—this is based on the 1986 census; we will not know what the new census is until 1991-92—were employed at an average salary of $20,000 per year, which is not very much, their contribution to the economy would be more than $3.4 billion per year. Therefore, putting this enormous population of people who are more than willing to work into the active workforce would lift $2.2 billion from government costs and add $3.4 billion to the pre-exemption tax pool.

Ontario would be the single largest beneficiary of this tremendous boost to the economy. Therefore, Disabled People for Employment Equity and Persons United for Self-Help in Ontario recommend immediate introduction of mandatory employment equity legislation covering both the private and the public sectors. This was a commitment promised to us by the Liberal government at the NDP-Liberal coalition, and we are still waiting for this legislation.

Mr Southern: Every time I made a presentation in the past to this committee, one of the people on the committee at the time was Bob Mackenzie, and he always used to ask me about quotas and employment equity or whatever you want to call it. He always used to say how much he supported our call for it. Now he is the Minister of Labour, so let's see it.

Ms McGregor: We believe there should be more mainstream training and educational opportunities for persons with disabilities in the workplace and at community colleges and universities. We want to de-emphasize segregated training programs. Training remains the single most important issue for disabled people.

Persons with disabilities, just by the very nature of their disabilities, sometimes miss a great deal of time at school. They are not offered the same employment opportunities in the summer as their able-bodied counterparts.

Society has not seemed quite willing yet to hire a disabled student in a fast food place, for example. They come to job force unequipped with the skills that are necessary. We must provide that training that we feel is necessary. We have a generation out here that we have lost. We cannot afford to lose another generation of people who are disabled.

A special fund, we believe, should be set up to enable the provincial Human Resources Secretariat to identify systemic barriers to employment within the public service. The civil service accommodation fund that is administered by the provincial Human Resources Secretariat must be continued on a permanent basis to permit people with disabilities equal access to employment in the Ontario public service. The personal staff of the ministers' and Ministers' offices should also be covered by this program.

During the recent hiring, disabled people were discouraged. We managed to get two people in. Both those people required accommodation. Both those people had extreme difficulty getting accommodation. We feel that something must be addressed. We have good people, well qualified, out here for you, quite able to work. We require accommodation, we require equipment and perhaps some other needs. I think this affects their job performance when they cannot access this equipment, so I strongly urge you to consider this.

The provincial government must establish an additional accommodation fund for employers to whom accommodation would represent undue hardship as defined by the Human Rights Commission.

The province must provide extended health benefits, 100% maintenance cost for assistive devices and other equipment for persons with disabilities going from home to the workplace. This is a very cost-related thing.

I will let Richard close.

Mr Dector: This is going to sound terribly like a plea for funding ourselves, which it partly is. To enable disabled people to speak on their own behalf, significant sustained funding must be provided to advocacy and self-help groups. I am not just speaking of PUSH, I am speaking of People First, which represents people with developmental disabilities, Ontario Association of Deaf, the Disabled Women's Network, which barely has any staff, and of course our organizations.

A lot of people with disabilities who have been unemployed for a long time get involved in these groups as activists because they are concerned about a particular issue. They become volunteers, they represent us at particular issues and they often get their first job through us and then move on. Some of them are even working in the government now. The point is that it is a route for people. Not only are we trying to fulfil an advocacy function, but it is a route to employment and off FBA for a lot of people. A large number of our staff have come directly off FBA.

Ms McGregor: I must point out to you that funding for advocacy groups is not easy to come through four ministries. Because we are very political, a lot of foundations do not wish to be identified with some of the issues. When you take banks and put human rights complaints against them, and when you take the Minister of Employment migration to court, foundations do not want to be seen doing side by side with you. The work we do is important. The issues we raise are important. They would not be if we were not here doing this. This is the type of work that disabled people are doing, so we urge you to consider it.

Mr Southern: I have a little story just before we close together. At the last presentation to the committee I read an issue that was in the newspaper, and when I got to the meeting, an NDP researcher said, "Wow, we thought it was great in the NDP caucus office. We saw you on TV. It was fantastic." The issue was that MPPs from our own get a living allowance for an apartment in town, whatever it is, $1,000 a month or something like that. That is not a living allowance for an apartment. The average of somebody on family benefits is $720. The story is the same and that analogy can still be used. I do not know if everybody in the NDP caucus office will be jump-around still, but anyway, there you go.

Mr Dector: One other thing I would like to point out is that the kind of funding that is often given to groups like this is project funding. Everyone is happy if we are working on certain types of issues and not so happy if we are working on others.

In fairness, no matter who the government is, I think there should be some core funding to groups like this so that the agenda can be set by the membership. We have a democratic structure; most of the groups do. Let the membership set what we are going to work on. Last year, the biggest concern directly from the grass roots was transportation. This year, transportation is a big concern but people are really concerned about getting jobs. Maybe they are more optimistic or something, but there does seem to be a push for that. I would like to see more freedom given to the groups to try to work on what people identify to us. Thank you for your attention.

Mr Phillips: First, I think your groups have advanced the cause in the last 10 years enormously. You do provide a benefit to the community. Just as one politician who has been lobbied by you, you are probably aware you have made a big impact; not as much as you would like but you have made an impact.

I have three questions. One is in the area of transportation. Assuming that there are finite dollars, what is your top priority, do you think, province-wide? We tend to get stuck on that topic, those of us from Metro Toronto, and look at Metro Toronto, but I have this intuition that there are some communities where there is not even an adequate parallel service. That is my first question, if we can look at it province-wide.

The second thing is on the accommodation fund. I realize it is carefully worded in your document to say "where there is undue hardship." My own concern, when I was involved in it and had some responsibility, was that that has been carefully managed or employers, when the fund is used, can say, "Well, I can't hire someone because I can't get the support." I always had questions about the fund in the private sector, because it felt it may be a limitation. I would like your comment on that. I realize it is carefully worded. I can see the accommodation fund in the public sector because we are the employer, but in the private sector, as I say, I worry that it becomes a limitation.

The third one is on the STEP program. Is the issue there that the STEP program is in concept the right thing, but for persons with disabilities it is not properly structured to take into account the real costs that are associated with employment, and therefore one should be looking at the details of the STEP program as it applies to persons with disabilities?

Mr Southern: The first one on transportation: I do not like to be pulled into a "let's prioritize this list" thing. At first glance, you might say, "There's no transportation in Rainy River," but we need to deal with both rural and city issues. If you make, for example, the system in Toronto more accessible, the TTC, it can save you a lot of money which could be better spent in other areas. I think the answer is that you have to do both. That would be a proper way to spend the funds. I do not think you can just say, "Let's establish transportation in an area where there is none," and just leave the public transportation in the major cities inaccessible. Both have to happen, and I think if you do both you will save yourself some dollars.

Mr Dector: I agree with John. It is very difficult to prioritize, even if we had some of the people here who have been working on transportation issues. One point to make, though, is that, again, as in buildings and in other situations of accommodation, if the idea of accommodation is in the beginning of the planning process, the costs are minimal. We are talking—the studies in the States—1% to 2% additional cost to buildings.

Sheppard is a clear case where it should be accessible from the start. One of the mistakes made, I think, is the presumption that escalators are cheaper than elevators, which is not always true and is quite often not true. If you look at the design of the subway system, if we had elevators a lot more people would be able to use it. The increase in costs of continually providing parallel services—and we support increased funding to parallel services—partly is that the mainstream system is not accessible. It is achievable. There are low-floor streetcars. There are buses in use in England and in other places on which you can take a wheelchair that are in use on conventional routes. There are ways to do these things without massive increases in costs if there is a real commitment to accessibility. That is what we are hoping for from the government.

Ms McGregor: Disabled people are having their transportation cut back. In Toronto Mr Tonks came out and announced that disabled people had to get used to less. They are already getting less.

Mr Southern: They just have to get used to it.

Ms McGregor: They have to get more used to getting less, or something like this. We have members who could not even get to minister's receptions.

Mr Dector: We had a member who could not come today.

Mr Southern: That is right.

Ms McGregor: The co-chair of our organization was unable to make three different receptions in the fall under the new government. We simply cannot get her there. We got her to the community action awards, but we could not get her home. That is wonderful. How are we going to get her home when she is almost a quadriplegic?

Transportation is a very big thing. I am going to talk about the accommodation fund a little with you. The community has been looking at the costs of accommodation, trying to really look at how business is going to react to that cost. We do not feel it should just be given carte blanche to companies who certainly can afford to pay that cost. We believe that when there is a separate independent commission, that commission will examine whether that employer is committed to employment equity, whether the representation rates of a community are there, and perhaps even some tax incentives.

Everyone has this great big myth that it is going to cost an arm and a leg to hire a disabled person. In many cases, it may not. Most of the buildings have become more accessible. It may be a matter of just lifting up a desk and putting it on a couple of blocks for a wheelchair person. But we are getting discriminated against based on disability, and we are getting very concerned, the way employment is going. We have employers saying, now that they have hired a few guys in a chair: "That's great. We'll take the guys in the wheelchairs, the paraplegics, because they look good. But don't give me the blind guys, don't give me the deaf people, because we've got to get interpreters. Certainly not the cerebral palsied, because look how they look. They can't talk properly, even though their brain works."

We are facing this discrimination. We wanted something that perhaps might encourage the employers and business to hire persons with disabilities. The accommodation fund is something we are working on. We certainly have not come up with all the details. We have enough time fighting with business, never mind trying to work with them right now. We are not the best of friends.

In the long term, we feel confident that probably with the federal review there may be some changes in the federal act, and hopefully in the province we are going to get the provincial legislation. It is going to have a bearing on the economy. It is up to members of the government, as well as the community, to examine ways to make this accommodation issue a little bit less frightening to everyone and certainly more accessible for the community to have access to. We will not back down on certain fighting for their jobs. John, do you want to answer on the STEP?

Mr Southern: Yes. Somebody asked of another presentation what you were allowed to retain under welfare. On family benefits under the STEP program you can retain $160, the full dollar amount. Then after that it is 20% of every dollar earned up to a certain level, and then you are cut off, all depending on your circumstances and costs and whatever. The cutoff level changes. That is one reason why obviously it is difficult for disabled people. The levels should be higher because their costs are higher.

One recommendation that was in the income maintenance group brief which would certainly improve STEP program for disabled people—single mothers under the STEP program are allowed to put the costs of day care against their earnings and it would help if disabled people were allowed to put some of the extra costs. I know, for example, a lot of people who use crutches to get around. They have a lot of wear and tear on clothing and stuff like that. If they could put some of those costs against their earnings, it would really give the STEP program some meaning for disabled people.

Mr Dector: Yes, I would like to second that. In the example that I was giving, the issue there I think is whether or not the program could be modified in such a way that you could keep your benefits for equipment that you need to function while you are working. That was the point at which this person's wage could go up, or whether it would make the transition to work.

Maybe one last thing: If you are looking for money to pay for all this, a couple of things—

Mr Phillips: This is a first.

Mr Dector: One is, we are fully against any user charges on the drug card, but part of the enormous costs of the drug card is the fact that there is massive overprescription of tranquilizers to people with disabilities. This is a real complaint from our members. If there is a way to look at that, and there are going to be some studies released that soon, that is a real issue. Part of that is cosmetic. Someone who has cerebral palsy, who without a heavy tranquilizer dose will be perfectly functional but will drool a bit, is encouraged to take as many tranquilizers as it takes to stop the drooling, but it renders them somewhat disabled all the time. It is a cosmetic issue and there is real, genuine overprescription.

Another thing I would like to point out—and I do not mean to pick a quarrel with the doctors, as my brother is a doctor and so is my father—the total $2.2 billion that is required to sustain those 171,000 people is about half of the billing to the Ontario health care system by doctors each year. So there is probably some room there to find some of this money. I guess what we are saying is that it is a question of spending priorities rather than a question of whether there is money there.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick question on the assistive devices program: How do you find the bureaucracy deals with that program?

Mr Dector: Do you want to deal with that, John?

Mr Southern: The bureaucracy with the assistive devices program is not the worst thing. I think the problem with it is that there is not enough money in the program to provide people with what they need. That is the main problem. Of course, there are still some items that are not available to people up to the age of 24. After that, you are not eligible for the program. There is still that age limit on some components of the program, which we would obviously like to see eradicated. But then I just do not understand why they do not put more money into the assistive devices program, because I think the benefits of the program could be enormous if they would put enough money to allow people to become independent and to acquire employment and live full lives; the benefits to society even more so, never mind as regards social-wise.

Mr Christopherson: Thanks to the presenters for a most meaningful presentation. I have a quick question on the transportation issue of accessibility and the parallel system, and perhaps some comments on exactly what the vision of PUSH is on what the system would look like when it is finished.

If the main systems are fully accessible, then is it a parallel system that is required in addition, or are there special needs there? I know when I was down in Atlanta, Georgia, about a year and a half ago there was a demonstration down there that hit most of the North American newspapers in fact, where there were sit-ins, I believe, about the whole question of accessibility.

There seemed to be an entirely different approach down there than what I saw in Canada. Then I attended a conference here in Canada and Beryl Potter had some difficulty or some differences of opinion with certain groups at here in Metro on the approach. I do not pretend to be an expert in fully understanding all of that, although my background is city and regional council, where you deal with the transportation issue. I would appreciate if you could just clarify a little bit for me how you see all that coming together.

Mr Southern: As I pointed out earlier, I think the two systems are definitely necessary. There are people who always need door-to-door transportation. I think both systems could support each other. I know there are wheelchair users who cannot get all the way to the subway system or to the buses on their own because they live maybe five minutes or five minutes from the main intersection who would need some kind of transportation to get them at that point there and then they could switch to the regular system, which would take an awful lot of burden off parallel systems.

In the best of all possible worlds, I think we need both. That is what we are lobbying for. There are people who really need different kinds of transportation. Also, I think that we need is not just vehicles that are capable of carrying wheelchairs, and it is not just vans, but we are lobbying also for some accessible taxis in Ontario. If they want to decide to go out and have dinner, people should be able to get a cab and go out and have dinner. They should not have to, as Richard pointed out, book four days in advance. Do you know what you want to do next Saturday? I do not.

It is a very broad issue, transportation. You need a lot of things. I do think we need both systems and we do need an accessible cab system as well.

Ms McGregor: I think the demonstrations you are referring to in the United States were related to the Americans with Disabilities Act. The veterans who had been disabled from the Vietnam war, together with the disabled population, lobbied very hard to get this bill through.

There is a different attitude now in the United States on disability. There is no question of it. I was in the United States just to Florida in October. I did not feel disabled there. My dog and I were granted access. It was quite a change for me for taxicabs. I have to go to court again in March. I came back after having a lovely week just to sort of recoup myself. The first day back it was pouring rain and I am with Mr Scott from the city at a meeting, and he could not get a cab for me. He argued with this guy for 15 minutes as to why he would not take me. I thought: "That's nice. Let someone else do it for a change."

Mr Phillips: That is just unbelievable.

Mr Southern: Sometimes if we are in a hurry to get somewhere, we say to Carol, "Hide your dog while we get a cab" and then pull the dog out. We have to do that.

Ms McGregor: But I have to go home every night. I am at these GO stations and we are getting quite a rash of violent crime out there. When I cannot get people to pick me up, I get very upset. I get read as to why dogs—you know, "God is going to come down and kill all the dogs." So I have to pay $20 and listen to that for another half an hour. But if we complain about services, you must realize that very often we are denied the services even more, and I expect I will be in March. I probably will.

Mr Phillips: You should just be relentless on that one.

Ms McGregor: I refuse to. I am going after them.

Mr Dector: If you bring them to the Metro licensing commission, there is a roadblock that Metro Toronto does not have an accessible taxi service. They exist in some of the smaller communities. We are in favour of taxis that can be used both by disabled people and by able-bodied people. There is no reason. That is partly a funding question, but it is largely a regulatory question.

Again with the buses, there are intercity buses that you can take a wheelchair on. I believe that the problem has to do with the length of the buses. There probably is some funding subsidy required, but again it is largely a regulatory issue.

There are a lot of things that can be done to change these things. These are not insurmountable obstacles.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming and making your submission. This committee will reconvene at 10 o'clock Monday morning.

The committee adjourned at 1810.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 28 January 1991

The committee met at 1007 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATION

ONTARIO ROAD BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: I am going to open the proceedings. Welcome back, everybody. Our first presenter is the Ontario Road Builders' Association: Arthur Ryan, the executive director; Leo McArthur, the president. If you gentlemen are ready, could you come forward, please? Welcome to standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

Mr Ryan: What we would like to do, Mr Chairman, with your concurrence, is to read through the brief which is presented to you, and then we would like to answer any questions you may have once we have finished.

Introduction:

The Ontario Road Builders' Association represents virtually all of the major firms involved in constructing and maintaining Ontario's provincial highways and municipal roads. The association was formed in 1927 and now comprises more than 170 companies in over 50 communities across Ontario. Our members represent a large labour-intensive industry, both union and non-union, working in an industry which has a substantial impact on the quality of life of Ontarians and on the economic viability of the province. We welcome this opportunity to present our views to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and trust some of our concerns will be addressed in your recommendations to the Legislature.

Economic development:

The road building industry is an important segment of the Ontario construction industry, which latter is the province's biggest industry, its largest employer, Canadian-owned largely by small entrepreneurs, pays the highest wages and is the province's largest taxpayer. These facts underscore our industry to have a substantial impact on all segments of our society.

As we move cautiously into 1991, it is apparent that external factors will have a significant impact on the Ontario economy. Energy prices, interest and exchange rates, war in the Middle East are all factors which will have a serious effect on an economy already facing recession. The economic indicators for 1991, be it real growth, consumer spending, housing starts, business investment and employment, are all negative and are continuing the downward spiral evident in the latter half of 1990. Treasury will be hard pressed to determine the necessary funding priorities that best address these major concerns.

Employment:

We strongly believe that job creation is the most significant step that a provincial government can take to provide impetus to the economy and instil confidence in the people.

Construction and maintenance of roads can increase Ontario's job creation program and reduce unemployment levels. Roadbuilding is a very labour-intensive industry. It has been stated that the job creation impact of road expenditures is second only to that of the housing expenditures. In addition, there are accompanying payoffs in tax returns, indirect job creation and decreases in the cost of social safety nets.

Road works have an added multiplier effect of 1.85 in triggering other job-creating expenditures within our economy. The unemployment rate is currently forecast to rise from 6.1% in 1990 to 7.3% in 1991. In northern Ontario, we believe these statistics will be substantially worse.

Safety and social services:

Aside from compelling economic facts, there are a number of safety and social arguments which may be made for ensuring that the road system in Ontario is maintained at an optimum level. In 1988, Ontario introduced amendments to the Highway Traffic Act which more fully supported the National Safety Code. The NSC will achieve nationwide uniformity in safety standards. It aims to clearly enhance highway safety, which can best be achieved on unclogged, free-moving road networks.

Many of the day-to-day services that the people of Ontario have come to rely on are major users of the road system. Municipal transit systems, intercity bus services, school buses, police, fire protection, ambulances, hospital services and other emergency vehicles are but a few of the social services that require an efficient road network. We cannot overemphasize the importance of a well-maintained road system for all social services in the province. Free-moving traffic eliminates congestion, reduces pollution and individual stress.

Tourism:

Tourism is an important sector of the Ontario economy accounting for more than 4% of Ontario jobs. Tourism spending in the province, estimated as being in excess of $9 billion, must be maintained. A first-class, efficient road network is absolutely vital to the tourism industry. We must have a direct, uncongested road system which can accommodate travellers and not subject them to stressful delays, traffic jams and poor roads. Approximately 80% of all tourists travel by road in Ontario.

Good roads mean good business:

Roads and highways have always played an important role in the economic and regional development, especially in northern and eastern Ontario, where longer distances must be travelled. Retailers, agricultural producers, manufacturers and countless other commercial enterprises in cities and towns across Ontario depend on this network, particularly as just-in-time inventory management practices are being widely adopted.

The value of commercial shipments using our road system, for example, is greater than that carried by all other modes of transportation combined. Consider that approximately 100 million tonnes of freight are shipped across Ontario roads each year, more than $12-billion worth of goods arrive via road annually in Metropolitan Toronto alone and goods exported from Ontario via truck are valued at over $36 billion per year.

If business and industry are to remain competitive, they must have access to direct, uncongested and well-maintained roads, roads that will allow them to transport goods quickly and efficiently. Highways, roads and bridges are all part of the vital transportation network that we rely on to keep Ontario's economy moving ahead.

Carefully constructed over the past century, our road and highway systems represent an investment of more than $23 billion. Together they serve the needs of business, industry and the general public, providing important surface links for millions of cars, trucks, buses and other vehicles.

In terms of our specific recommendations, long-term planning:

We strongly support the current government's multi-year approach to government planning. Over the years, we have urged previous governments to develop at least a five-year plan for provincial highway funding needs and recommended close co-operation with the municipalities to determine their long-term requirements. As general contractors, the ability to plan for capital and human resources over at least a five-year span would obviously stabilize the industry and would have substantial cost benefits to the taxpayer.

The previous government in some way attempted to address this issue when it announced its $2-billion transportation enhancement program, which was scheduled over five years. We urge you to recommend continuation of the scheduled time frame of this program and recommend that the program be formally approved by the current government. We would stress at this time, however, that the transportation enhancement program still does not meet the funding requirements necessary to maintain our current infrastructure at the optimum level. Recent studies show that current rehabilitation expenditures are only meeting 75% of the needs.

Funding—capitalization of highway infrastructure:

As are most organizations, we are concerned about current deficits, both at the provincial and federal levels. However, we strongly believe that an increase in the so-called deficit resulting from capital expenditures differs from deficit spending resulting from operating costs. Normal industry accounting practice treats assets as balance sheet items which do not affect operating lines of credit.

We believe that the government should consider defining new highway expenditures on the same basis. The public accounts currently show the investment in water treatment and waste control facilities in this manner. These costs are amortized over a period of years. Why not treat all new highway infrastructure spending in the same manner? We would be willing to discuss this item in more detail with Treasury at its convenience.

Dedicated funding:

During the past couple of years a number of provincial governments have established a dedicated funding mechanism to fund their highway programs. These governments have taken a number of cents per litre from their gasoline tax revenues and specifically allocated these funds to be used on their highway programs. We suggest to Treasury that it consider a similar approach in the province of Ontario.

The current fluctuation in gasoline prices presents an opportunity for the government to dedicate one or two cents a litre from its gas revenues to fund a new highway program. One cent a litre in the province of Ontario generates $100 million on an annual basis. We present the above two recommendations to the Treasurer because we believe that some form of creative financing arrangement must be established by all levels of government if we are ever to meet the ever-increasing costs of new infrastructure and its timely maintenance and renewal.

Federal participation:

The government's Agenda for People emphasized its commitment to build a stronger northern Ontario. One of these commitments was that Ontario would undertake negotiations with Ottawa to proceed with the four-laning of the Trans-Canada Highway across the north and to improve this vital transportation network corridor. We strongly support this approach.

The Transportation Association of Canada, TAC, has just completed a study to establish a national highway policy for Canada. Phase 3 of this study, which has just actually been completed, is tackling the funding mechanisms for this new highway system. We urge the Ontario government to become an active participant in this process and to participate in these discussions with the federal government relative to this particular report.

Over the past number of years, it seems that more and more provinces have received funding for maintenance operations on the Trans-Canada system which traverses the province. Ontario has received no part of this revenue. We urge the committee to request the Treasurer to approach the federal Minister of Transport and to press for at least some shared funding to develop a stronger northern Ontario.

In conclusion, in recent years the Ontario government has been neglecting road expenditures to an extent that puts the entire road system in jeopardy of becoming inadequate to the needs of the province. We must ensure that sufficient funds are allocated to maintain the infrastructure which has been created in this province. Our road system should not deteriorate further.

Ontario is the engine of the Canadian economy. When firing on all cylinders it drives investment, consumes resources, demands more services and creates new jobs. Tragically, we are starving the engine of fuel with a traffic-choked system that is declining rapidly because of insufficient attention. We urge you to reverse the trend.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in your view that it is important to proceed with the four-laning of the Trans-Canada Highway across northern Ontario. I wonder if you would have a cost estimate on that proposal.

Mr Ryan: The cost varies depending on the extent of the work done, but it is many billions of dollars, there is question about that. One of our problems with that is that a government initiative, it realistically—and we as an association would like to have it in place, but we do not have the funding available for that certainly in a reasonable time frame.

Mr McArthur: I would also believe that back in 1985 the Ministry of Transportation did a study on the cost of, I guess, twinning that highway, and maybe those numbers could be available through MOT. That was done, and then what you would have to do is just update it to the current level. I happen to kind of remember a number, but I do not want to say it because I am not just too sure really whether it was the specific number, but in 1985 it was done. But that was very, very substantial.

The Chair: Any other questions for the presenters? Do you have any estimation of how much tax is taken out of Ontario through the gasoline taxes at the federal level?

Mr Ryan: I am not sure of the exact figures at the federal level, no. I could give you the figures provincially, in terms of the revenues that come into the province from the highway system, which are the provincial gasoline taxes, licences and things of that nature, they are way in excess of the actual Ministry of Transportation's budget. Close to $1.8 billion comes in in total revenues, which is the result of motorist and trucking expenditures. In terms of the total payments out from the ministry, it is something like $300,000 less than that, $1.5 million. In terms of the federal excise taxes, I would not know that figure offhand.

Mr Sterling: Is there any trend in the United States towards toll roads? Are states backing away from that idea, or are they implementing more and more toll roads in the United States at this time?

Mr Ryan: Actually, they are looking at one now in California. As you know, there is some private financing. The United States is looking at all sorts of creative financing, which includes toll roads, but it is also looking at private participation in the highway system. In other words, as you do in the private sector commercial building, you build the whole package and then you finance it through your own individual tolls at a private level. That is what they are looking at in California at this time. But the toll road system in the United States has always worked very well.

One of the problems we have in Canada—and this is Canada as a whole, not just the province of Ontario—is that we spend less money in Canada per capita for our road system than any country, literally, in the western world, substantially less than the United States; substantially less than England, France and Germany. We do not pay attention to our highway system in this country, and Ontario is obviously guilty of that as well, as other countries do.

Some of the recommendations we make, and we have done this to previous governments—we understand that because the requirement is so great in this province at this time, there will have to be some different kind of financing for the transportation network to realistically get the job done within a reasonable time frame. Just Highway 407 itself, which has been committed over a long-term time frame, the way the recession is going now and the demands that are going to be made, we can see that there will be so much pressure for dollars that some other funding mechanism has to come into the system and toll roads do have a place.

When you are looking at a toll road system, the first thing you look at apparently is to make sure there is alternative access, and in terms of Highway 407 itself, the new highway which will traverse the province and which will replace, in effect, Highway 401, you could actually toll that because you do have an alternative. In other words, if you did not want to pay the toll, you could use Highway 401. This is a very valid point for the toll roads and that is one of the things the United States watches very carefully. Looking at the plans for Highway 407, that particular highway does lend itself to a toll road system.

Mr Sterling: Do they pay for themselves?

Mr Ryan: I think historically in Canada, when you look at Quebec and places like that, it depends how well they are managed. I think one of the problems is the cost-effectiveness of collecting tolls and the slowdown, the time of the lineups. As I say, it is all part of not having an alternative. As long as it is moving quickly and you have a good collection system, they certainly pay for themselves, no question.

Mr McArthur: I think we understand that in the United States, I guess, some of those toll roads are very marginal, but other toll roads where you have a lot of traffic seem to pay for themselves. But I guess just as a general statement that probably—and I think this is the feeling of your own ministry staff people—it is questionable as to whether they really do pay for themselves. But the funds are really kind of available to help build the program.

Undoubtedly, in some situations they may have to require extra funds to be picked up somewhere along the way, but I think you would find that it would be tough to have 100% of it. So maybe it would end up being kind of recovered because of the fact that it is tough to do that if you do not have the traffic.

Mr Stockwell: I have great interest in alternative financing, in particular for transportation improvements. I know in the Metro Toronto region when they talk about any kind of subway or light rail transit extension or improvement, particularly the Sheppard subway line, they talk about participation from the private sector, basically selling density rights to develop the subway lines themselves. I am not certain if it could work in the scenario you have painted, but clearly if Highway 407 does cut through the greater Toronto area, there could be value in selling density rights off abutting that package.

Potentially, I guess, if the development industry wanted to get involved, that is another alternative way you could use to generate revenue to pay for the construction. I am not certain how much it would do, but clearly, in North York along the Sheppard line from Yonge to Victoria Park it is a considerable amount of money. I do not know if that avenue has ever been explored. If it has and has not panned out, I can understand because of the cost. Certainly it is something that I think you should look at. Clearly in the rural areas it is just not going to be much of a density improvement, but really in the GTA, if you could sell greater density rights for the development of a highway, I am confident you would collect a considerable amount more money.

The Chair: Are there any other questions? I would like to thank you for your presentation this morning. Thank you for coming.

ORGANIZATION

Mr Phillips: Before we get into it, I do not see the Treasurer on this schedule here.

The Chair: That is up to the committee to decide when it would like to hear him. I was going to do it at the end, but since you brought it up now, we will deal with it now. We have Thursday 31 January, 12:30 to 1:30; Friday 1 February, 8:30 to 9:30 in the morning, and Wednesday 6 February at 5 pm. Now, Wednesday 6 February at 5 pm leaves the writing crew behind a little—no time at all—so for the writing crew either of the first two would be preferable.

Mr Phillips: The key for me is just making sure that the third-quarter results are out. I gather they will be out before he appears here.

The Chair: You know as much about that at this point as I do. All I have heard is what we were told from the beginning; that is, that they should be out this week some time.

Mr Phillips: That is what they say in the media, but I do not know.

Mr Stockwell: Has that been confirmed by the Treasurer's office?

The Chair: It has not been confirmed to me.

Mr Stockwell: Maybe you could try to confirm it.

The Chair: To nail it down?

Mr Stockwell: Yes, I would really agree with the member. I think it is more important that we meet with him after those third-quarter numbers are released.

The Chair: If he were to come on Thursday or Friday, we could ask him.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, but that is a little more difficult. I would rather have an opportunity to review them and then ask some penetrating questions, rather than ask my penetrating questions while I am reviewing them.

Mrs Sullivan: We will wait for that occasion.

The Chair: Some of us are still waiting for penetrating questions.

Mr Stockwell: Some of us are still waiting for a government, too.

The Chair: You mean in Ottawa? We could have lunch sent in on the 31st for the meeting from 12:30 to 1:30. What are the wishes of the committee? I think we have probably eliminated—because the writers cannot do it on 6 February. What about Thursday or Friday?

Mr Phillips: It is a good day for me. I do not know either day is fine. The only criterion is that the results are out, that is all.

The Chair: Thursday? Do I have a consensus Thursday, 12:30 to 1:30? Okay, we will invite the Treasurer to come Thursday 12:30 to 1:30.

There is another item of business. As you all know, I invited the governor of the Bank of Canada to come and speak with us. I am going to try to do this without really being too facetious, but he feels so bad about not being able to come that he has offered to send a designated person to meet with part of the committee or the subcommittee to give us some information. The reason he has given for this is that the world hangs on everything he says and he has an effect on the markets and everything, so he would rather give his projections and his information in camera to a select group so that it does not become a media or a public event. Does the subcommittee want to meet with this designated person? When do we want to do it if we want to do it? Would anyone like to comment?

Mrs Sullivan: It seems to me that this kind of information, given that these are public hearings, any information that will be coming from the governor ought to be considered in terms of being a part of public hearings and not an in camera situation. Also, the entire committee should be participating in hearing the presentation. At the end, all, the entire committee will be involved in writing a report at the end. I wonder if the information that he is likely to provide in terms of projections and so on is of such concern that the people of Ontario should not be hearing it.

Mr White: I would like to concur with Mrs Sullivan. I cannot see why our government should have standards of openness and honesty and candour and expect anything else of another level of government. Surely the hearings should be open not only to the full committee but also to the public.

The Chair: We are already stuck with the position where they have said they will not come to do it publicly. What they have indicated is that the information that they have requested from them can be made public. If I boil it down to the correct assumption, it is that we are constrained to having him either come and give part of the group some information or not come at all. I think those are the choices.

Mr Jamison: Our ability to evaluate and establish a report could be enhanced by listening to the Bank of Canada delegates here. I would suggest that we gather information as well as we can. We understand that there is going to be some difficulty in how it is going to be presented, but I think that the information is going to be important and we should make every attempt to obtain it.

The Chair: Do I take it that you would endorse the designated person coming and speaking to the subcommittee?

Mr Stockwell: I think we should probably spend a little more time talking to our staff and trying to get revenue projections rather than worrying about a senior level of government's report to this committee. We probably might have a little more success cleaning up our own house and getting revenue projection that will probably ve a greater impact on our recommendations to the government than having a designate from the Bank of Canada coming in, in my opinion.

It seems to me we have a little more clout, considering there are a considerable number of members here who sit on the government side, to get that kind of information. Frankly, I am kind of shocked that there seems to be a bit of concern here that this gentleman is not showing up when there was little, if any, concern about getting our own revenue projections, for goodness' sake.

Let's become a little more consistent. If we are going to spend a little bit of time and send out snooty letters to the federal government, maybe we could send the same snooty letters to our own bureaucrats and ask them to comment on preliminary revenue projections. Let's be a little more consistent in dealing with those people we would like to hear deputations from.

The Chair: Given that those letters came from me, I object to the comment "snooty." They were not snooty; they were polite requests for information that I believe and the committee has believed is necessary for this committee to be able to make proper projections in the long run for what is going to happen in Ontario.

Mr Stockwell: Maybe the letters were not snooty, Mr Chairman. I will withdraw that. But certainly your comments to date at this committee have been.

The Chair: Up to this point, it becomes very difficult for this committee to go into pre-budgetary consultation and recommendation, given that we do not know for sure the answer to two questions. The most important question is will the Bank of Canada allow the Canadian dollar to float with respect to market forces? I think that is a very important question that we need to have answered, because that has a great deal of impact on what is going to happen in terms of revenue coming in and in terms of borrowing and when we make our deliberations and make the recommendations to the Treasurer.

Mr Sutherland: I would suggest that if the Bank of Canada people do not want to provide this information to the entire committee in a public forum, then we just take the information they provide and we as a committee interpret what we feel is the meaning of the information they provided, since they do not want to give an explanation of it to the open committee.

Mr Phillips: I do not think we can deal with it in private, and I think we should say that we are a public committee and that whatever they can provide to us in public we will take, although I am concerned that we still do not have a revenue estimate. I have said in the House that I believed, for this fiscal year, that the previous Treasurer's revenue estimates are more accurate than the current Treasurer's estimates. I am looking forward to seeing the numbers, but I do think we need to know what our revenue estimates are for this year and next year, even more important than the dollar, even more important than the interest rates. I would expect that is what the Treasurer will bring us when he comes.

The Chair: I take it yours is a no vote?

Mr Phillips: Absolutely.

Mr Kwinter: I am intrigued by the offer. It seems to me that anything that the governor of the Bank of Canada had to say he has been saying to the federal politicians, and I think there may be some misreading into this that he is going to come and tell us things that he does not want to be public. It seems to me that would put him in an absolutely untenable position. The minute he comes and does that, someone is going to know about it, and if the word got out that the governor of the Bank of Canada was telling a committee in camera things that he does not dare tell the public, as I say, that would be an untenable position.

It seems to me that what they are really saying is that they do not, as a matter of policy, want to come before a provincial standing committee of the Legislature, but "If you want to meet in camera, we will sit and talk with you." But I would not read into it that you are going to get information that they will not share with anyone else. I think it is just a matter of saying, "If we come for you, we're going to come for everybody, but if you want to talk to us, we will come just as long as it is not in a public forum." If that is the case, then I do not see any great value in having them come.

The Chair: Are there any other comments? I have so far, by consensus, that if he will not speak to the committee in public, then he need not come. Okay? Then we will transmit that information to them.

Mr Stockwell: Can we not have a vote of some kind? Can we not vote or is this just consensus?

The Chair: Well, I have got—Interjection.

Mr Stockwell: We do not vote? Okay. Thank you.

The Chair: I asked if there is a consensus. If you would like a vote, I will ask people.

Mr Stockwell: I just wanted to know if there was ever a vote at the end.

The Chair: There was no motion.

Mr Stockwell: Okay.

AJAX PUBLIC LIBRARY ADMINISTRATORS OF
MEDIUM PUBLIC LIBRARIES OF ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next presenters are from the Ajax Public Library, Geoffrey Nie, chief executive officer, and Jane Kirkpatrick, chairperson of the Association of Medium Public Libraries of Ontario. Welcome to the hearings, if you would like to begin.

Mr Nie: Mr Wiseman, members of the finance and economics committee, thank you for giving us this opportunity to speak to you about provincial funding levels for public libraries in Ontario. I believe that Mr Decker has handed out a copy of One Place to Look: The Ontario Public Library Strategic Plan to the members of the committee and a copy of the attachments to my presentation. Mr Decker also has a supply of the presentation for you to read at a later time.

My name is Geoff Nie. I am the chief executive officer and chief librarian of the Ajax Public Library. With me today is Jane Kirkpatrick, chairperson of the Association of Medium Public Libraries of Ontario, which is an organization representing public libraries in Ontario that serve communities with populations between 10,000 and 100,000 people. AMPLO represents 89 library boards serving 30% of the population of Ontario.

Our purpose today is to make two points about the level of support provided by the province for its public libraries. First, provincial support for public libraries as a percentage of the total cost of library service in Ontario has been reduced dramatically in the past 10 years. Second, the formula used to calculate the base per-household grant for public libraries is inequitable.

What is a public library in the 1990s? It is more than a place to go for a good read or a place to send your kids on Saturday afternoon to the film program. Today's public libraries serve the information needs of a diverse community by providing information and assistance to all its residents regardless of age, mobility, education, ethnicity or economic background.

In order to address the information needs of our users, public libraries are confronted with a number of challenges. Some of these are as follows:

The arrival of new Canadians in what were formerly primarily Anglo-Saxon communities. For example, some 30 libraries across Ontario have recently formed a multicultural services co-operative to ensure that collections in a range of languages will be available to library users whose language of first choice is neither English nor French.

The need to provide access for the physically and developmentally impaired user is another area of increasing demand. To address this need the Scarborough Public Library has recently introduced a collection of Braille children's books in Chinese.

The impact of technology has created a third issue. It is predicted that by the year 2000, 25% of all data will be available only in electronic form. The Brampton Public Library was the first public library in Ontario to provide dial-up access to its database for any client who has a personal computer and modem.

Shifts in our economic base have included plant closures and downsizing in manufacturing and industry. To address the community need created when the Goodyear plant closed several years ago in Etobicoke, the Etobicoke Public Library established a help service for its laid-off workers.

Finally, there is the tragedy of those who are unable to read or write well enough to function as productive members of our society. It is estimated that one in four Canadians cannot read at a grade 3 level. This means that 25% of our population cannot read a newspaper or the label on a tin of food and they are unable to fill out applications for employment.

Numerous public libraries are endeavouring to address this access issue. For example, the Collingwood Public Library has for some years provided a Leading to Reading volunteer tutorial service to assist those intimidated by the formal educational process.

For the past two and a half years the provincial government and the Ontario Library Association have worked together to prepare a strategic plan for public libraries. I believe that—I know; I can see them—you have copies of those with you. Last November they released One Place to Look: The Ontario Public Library Strategic Plan. The basic principle of this plan as expressed in the first line of the statement of purpose on page 13 states: "The public library serves its community based on the belief that every individual has the right to equitable access to information. This principle confirms the province's and the library community's commitment to equal access to information for all Ontarians."

How has the province supported this principle in the past? You will have exhibit 1. If you would turn to it, it will indicate the levels of support for the libraries by the province compared to that of the municipalities over the last 10 years. Since 1979, the provincial support for public library service has been reduced from 19% of the operating cost of libraries to 10.6% in 1989. In 1987, the latest year for available data, the percentage of the provincial budget spent on public libraries was 0.109%, a reduction from 0.162% or 32.72% since 1979. The 1987 figure is the lowest level of provincial support since 1969. Those are the latest data that I have available.

These percentages show an alarming trend; however, they do not present the whole picture. Another way of expressing this is that in real dollars since 1987 the direct provincial payments to library boards have been reduced by $4,034,000. That is a reduction in real dollars of 10.8%

Faced with this loss of support from the province, local libraries would not have been able to serve the information needs of the residents of Ontario if local municipalities had not stepped in to cover the shortfall. Since 1979, the cost of operating public libraries has increased by 135.6%. During this period, the increase of provincial support for libraries has been only 31.3%, while the municipal support has increased by 170.3%. If you look at exhibit one, it will show you the obvious trend that is outlined here. The line graph sinks from 10% to 20% over that 10-year period while the municipal bar chart goes from 70% to over 80% of the total costs of libraries in that same period.

If this situation continues, the province will no longer be considered a partner with the municipalities in the provision of library service for the residents of Ontario. Therefore, we recommend that this committee recommend to the provincial government that it reaffirm its support for public libraries by establishing a respectable minimum level of support expressed as a percentage of the overall provincial budget.

Each public library receives an annual grant from the Ministry of Culture and Communications. This grant is based on the number of households in each community. These data are provided by the Ministry of Revenue. Each household is defined as any place of two or more rooms where an individual can sleep and prepare meals. The Ministry of Culture and Communications sets a base rate for the grant and multiplies that rate by the number of households to determine the grant for each library.

On the surface, this seems like a straightforward process. However, the formula used to calculate the grant is significant flaws: first, in any given year, the rate of increase to the base per-household figure seldom matches the rate of inflation; second, the household figure currently being used to calculate the amount of the grant is the number of households for 1988. These two facts mean that the impact of the provincial grant is constantly being eroded by the rate of growth in many communities, such as those in the greater Toronto area, and by the rate of inflation.

If you would turn to exhibit two, you will see an indication of provincial support versus municipal support and the rate of increase in CPI. The consumer price index in Ontario increased by 92.8% from 1979 to 1989. Provincial support for public libraries during this period increased by only 31%. Over the past two years, the increase in the grant has been held at 4% per year. This equals a compounded increase of 8.2%. The compounded rate of inflation during the same period is 10.8%, or 31.7% higher than the rate of increase in the grant. With these figures, it is no wonder that the provincial support for libraries is only more than half of what it was 10 years ago.

The other flaw in the calculation of the per-household grant is the use of out-of-date household figures. In the town of Ajax—I use that example because I am familiar with it—the provincial grant in 1981 had been calculated using the figure of 14,739 households. In fact, by 1990, that figure had increased by 24.6% to 18,359 households. This discrepancy represents a loss of $28,586 for the Ajax Public Library in 1990 alone, and this loss increases each year that the formula uses its out-of-date information.

If the inadequacies of the formula used to calculate the per-household grant are not dealt with, then there is little hope that the inequities of this grant will be resolved or that the role the province plays in the provision of library service in Ontario will continue to diminish. Therefore, we recommend that this committee recommend to the government of Ontario that the base figure for the per-household grant for public libraries be increased annually by at least the rate of inflation and that this committee recommend to the government of Ontario that the per-household grant be calculated using the most currently available data.

All of us are well aware that these are recessionary times and that public moneys must be spent carefully and wisely. History has repeatedly shown us that people turn to their public libraries during times of economic hardship. The public uses the libraries to help cope with problems such as looking for information about new and better jobs, acquiring information about available social services, learning basic skills like reading and effective writing, and using the resources of the library for leisure activities.

An analysis of the rate of increase in the use of public libraries in Ontario over the past 10 years clearly supports this historical trend of increased library use during economic hardship. That is exhibit three in your handout. The average annual increase in library use was just under 3% from 1979 to 1989. However, during the recession of the early 1980s, the average annual increase in library use from 1981 through 1983 was 4.51% or 52.4% above the average for the decade. In 1989 the increase in library use spiked to 5.23% from 2.35% in 1988. That is an increase of 122.6% in one year. These figures indicate that public libraries are an even more valuable resource for the average citizen in Ontario during difficult economic times.

Thank you for giving us this opportunity to speak to you today. We hope that you will be able to address the concerns of the public library community during your budget deliberations. If you have any questions, we would be happy to answer them.

Mr Hansen: It is not a question, but is it possible to have a copy of the brief that you just read to us? With all the figures that were in it, I was unable to copy them down. It is to give us a better idea, because with this handout the background is very important also.

Mr Nie: As I stated, Mr Decker has a supply of the handouts. He will distribute them.

Mr Hansen: I did not realize that. Listening to you, I have to say I lost an election over a library on a municipal level by seven votes because I supported the library and some of the councillors of the municipality said that it was only more expense on the taxpayer's back. After the library was built, we did win on a referendum vote. Now it is a place you would never get rid of. The town really appreciates that it went ahead and built it. I know these are recession times. I see going up and down that a lot of people use it for referencing, different types of jobs and study and going back to school. I think it is a very important part of the community.

Mr Kwinter: I have a question about that 1988-89 spike. Do you sort of attribute that to the downturn in the economy or is there some other reason?

Mr Nie: I have done a little investigation. The indications are, not just in Ontario or Canada, that the use of libraries follows the unemployment rate in a geographical area. I would attribute that if we look over the next couple of years, it will follow that they will be, shall we say, heydays for public libraries. The rate of use of libraries will go up dramatically. I believe the dramatic increase between 1988 and 1989 is just the first year of that. I know for a fact among my colleagues and myself that the increase in 1990 for the library I work for in Ajax was 12%. That is three times higher than the rate of increase in 1989. I know that in the Etobicoke Public Library their increase was 6%, which was double the rate of increase of the previous year.

Ms Kirkpatrick: Ours was 17%.

Mr Nie: So I anticipate that, yes, people are turning to libraries now in view of the development of harder economic times.

Mr Kwinter: Are those figures on a per capita basis or on a global basis?

Mr Nie: They are the overall percentage increases for the total use of circulation figures for libraries in Ontario. They are not per capita. They are on absolute figures.

Mr Kwinter: Do you have correlation? I am thinking particularly of a place like Ajax, where the population is growing and the use of the library is growing, but the per capita use may be down. I do not know that. I am just asking, is there any kind of a correlation?

Mr Nie: I do have the figures for Ajax, not for the province. Our per capita use increased at a rate four times that of the growth of the community in 1989. I have to qualify that. I came to Ajax in 1989. The rate of increase in 1990 did go up at a rate four times that of the growth of the community of that year.

Mr Sutherland: You have talked about operating grants here. I want to talk about the state of libraries, their physical state in terms of buildings. I know in my community there are a couple that are still operating due to the generous donation of the Carnegie Foundation way back in the beginning.

Ms Kirkpatrick: In 1902.

Mr Sutherland: Yes, at the beginning of the century. I am just wondering if you could comment on the overall state of medium-sized libraries and their actual facilities. Are a good portion of them very outdated or do we have a lot of modern ones? Have we been able to keep up that way?

1050

Ms Kirkpatrick: I am still operating out of the 1902 building and probably will be for the next 25 years, I think. I would say in general terms that the majority of public libraries in the medium-sized range are out of their Carnegie libraries and into more modern facilities, although now a lot of those buildings were done in the 1950s and 1960s and they are now looking at new capital expenditures on them.

Mr Nie: May I raise one point on that? The figures I quoted in the document include operating and capital expenses. About five or six years ago, they changed the reporting formula. What they did is include base grants plus special grants. So they are there.

The ministry, over the last probably five or six years, has provided funding at the rate of about $1 million or a little more than that a year for capital development in libraries. So there have been a number of building projects. I know when I worked at the King library we constructed a new library and one third of the funding came from the province. But the library I work in now is in a building that has not received any renovation or addition since 1975. At that time the population in Ajax was around 20,000. It is now over 50,000. We are at one half the ratio of people to square-foot ratio, which is 0.6. We are at half the ratio of that and do not anticipate any capital development of our library over the next three or four years.

Mr Sutherland: Since you mentioned most of the libraries seem to be from the 1950s and 1960s, I am wondering about ventilation and those things in terms of keeping the books in proper form.

Ms Kirkpatrick: Preservation.

Mr Sutherland: Preservation of books, if you care to comment on that.

Ms Kirkpatrick: That is obviously a serious concern for all libraries and librarians, primarily because the paper that books are printed on is of very poor quality and does not lend itself to adequate preservation, right off the bat. I do not know of any library in Ontario right now that is air-conditioned. Do you, Geoff?

Mr Nie: Oh, yes.

Ms Kirkpatrick: Of a medium-sized nature. I know smaller ones are—

Mr Nie: I know those ones as well.

Ms Kirkpatrick: But yes, that is a concern. A building that is now touched has to meet the building code requirements. Certain things are built in which make the preservation issue a lot easier to deal with. I come from Perth county and we have a number of Carnegie libraries still operating in the county which have not had any major renovations. They have window air-conditioners. That does not provide adequate humidity control or temperature control for materials—or for the staff, I might add.

Mr Nie: One of the platforms of the public library strategic plan does raise the issue of the need for preservation for collections.

Ms Kirkpatrick: And the need for adequate buildings.

Mr White: I am wondering, in terms of a number of information services which have not been traditional library services, if there has been special funding or does it just come out of your base budget? I am talking here of a range of computer services, video, those kinds of things which we, in our 1990s and going into the 21st century, will need in all of our communities as part of our information technology. I am wondering, does funding for innovative programming in those areas which would allow for general public access to those kinds of information technologies come out of your base funding?

Mr Nie: In a single word, yes. There are occasional grants although not at the present time, special grants that are available. If you watch them and you happen to be developing your services along the appropriate line, you may be able to receive some funding. But basically, they are one-time grants for startup. Then it is the responsibility of the library to maintain and develop that service further.

In the Ajax library, we are now introducing video collections for the multicultural community. We are introducing popular music on tape and compact disc and the increase of these services is directly related to our base budget.

Mr White: Those additional services or additional information technologies would in fact be much more expensive than the traditional ones.

Mr Nie: I do not think that can be supported. I think they are comparable costs and as they become more common technologies they are coming down. It was true that when you were dealing with videos five or six years ago when I introduced them at the King library they cost an average anywhere from $80 and up, but the cost now has come down to around $25 to $40, unless you are getting into the more elaborate productions or you are requiring a public lending rate licence with your purchase. That makes them very expensive and they can be several hundred dollars a title.

Ms Kirkpatrick: I think that for libraries looking at new forms of technology for storing and retrieving information, the big difficulty is the hardware costs to start. Once you have the appropriate machinery in place to these, the subscriptions are now running comparable to print as CD-ROM technology. For example, we have at our library that we have just bought Books in print on compact disc as opposed to the print version. We get an update three times a year and it is only going to cost us another $100 a year. So the prices of the products themselves are running more or less similarly, but the big problem for libraries is acquiring the hardware and then paying the communication costs to keep it running. That comes out of our operating budgets.

The Chair: Are there any other questions? Seeing none, thank you for your presentation. It was very well done.

HOME SHARING PROGRAMS

The Chair: Our next presentation is the VON home sharing: Beryl Stephen, co-ordinator, and Harry Grant. Would you like to proceed?

Mr Grant: I have very little to say. My name is Harry Grant. I am the chairman of this committee. I am also on the board of the Victorian Order of Nurses in Hamilton. Our constitution calls for us to always have a VON chairperson on any committee we look after. I am going to let Beryl say everything today. She has it all written down and ready for you. If there is anything I can give you from a VON point of view, I certainly would be happy to. Incidentally I think we are the only VON in Ontario that supports this particular committee in Hamilton and I would like to say that Beryl is also representing all these committees in Ontario.

Ms Stephen: I am the co-ordinator of the VON home sharing program but I am speaking on behalf of all 17 home sharing programs in Ontario. Some of the co-ordinators are present here and one consumer is here as well. I would like to point them out. They are this gang here. If you want to know where they are from, there might be people from your constituencies. I would like them to give their names and where they are from if that is permitted.

The Chair: How do we do that?

Ms Stephen: I am sorry. I do not know all their names. We have just got together. Usually we are in our own communities and we see each other very rarely.

The Chair: Perhaps they could tell you their names and you could speak into the mike.

Ms Stephen: Susan Nwosu, North York Housing Connection; Ali Zahedi, East York and Flemingdon housing registry; I know Christine Chun from Scarborough Housing Assistance and Placement Education for Singles; Ola Salmon and Bev Goodman from Niagara; Andraya Opppe from Waterloo region; Angela Covert from York Community Services; and Lois Parker, an 86-year-old home seeker—successful. She lives with a 92-year-old. They needed very little help from me. Just a little bit of teaching and they wanted to know what they should be talking about and I gave them a written agreement and that is all the time they took. So I invited her on to my committee. She has been very helpful.

We came here today to speak with one voice as co-ordinators because we have some things we would like to speak about. I am pretty well following this text. In case everyone did not know what home sharing is, I brought a generic brochure from the ministry. They were very kind to give us a lot. Then I brought a pack of client profiles of what the program actually does, and that article by Michele Landsberg is a very good example of what happens here in Toronto. Then I have brought some letters of support. That is the third thing.

I brought excerpts out of a very recent biennial report. I just finished it the end of December. Table 1 especially shows you the type of people we deal with: the special needs client, frail elderly, mentally and physically disabled people, people who are visibly in minorities because of the colour of their skin basically, family violence survivors and one-parent families. That is what my agency does. Other agencies deal with homeless people off the street, people living in the Don Valley. They find places for them to live.

The last piece in your package is an idea for the future which has to do with the direction that I see this new government going in and I would like committee members to read it.

First of all, we would like to endorse the new policies and directions that we see the new government going in. We understand and sympathize with your government's unexpected inheritance of a $2.5-billion deficit. We applaud your efforts to date. As taxpayers, we are encouraged by your intention to significantly reduce this deficit in spite of a recession.

As housing workers, we are impressed with your efforts to introduce needed changes in the court system, pay equity, the welfare system, health care and the myriad of essential social and employment services. It is even more encouraging to read that the Premier's councils on health and economics are taking new directions. A council on health, wellbeing and social justice and a council on economics and quality of life sounds like a comprehensive attempt at integration of policies.

Creating such linkages logically leads to more effective and efficient services. This is good news for home sharing co-ordinators across the province as we attempt to negotiate and facilitate adequate social and economic conditions in shared housing arrangements at the grass-roots level.

Now I would like to tell you the goals and objectives of the home sharing program as mandated by the Ministry of Housing. Home Sharing programs have been established to screen and match those 18 years or older who are interested in shared accommodation as a safe, affordable alternative. Many programs focus on the needs of seniors, that is, people 55 years or older and concentrate on inter-generational matches.

Home sharing programs have four main objectives: to provide an alternative for individuals seeking safe and affordable housing; to enable seniors to consider living independently within their own homes and neighbourhoods; to reduce social isolation experienced by both sets of clients by creating opportunities for increased companionship and security; to intensify and preserve the existing housing stock in a unique way.

In short, home sharing is a means of fostering independence, self-determination and autonomy in the lives of many who have been forced to live in socially and economically restrictive circumstances.

The history of home sharing:

Home sharing programs have been formal organizations in North America for over 20 years. Home sharing has had a national profile in Canada for at least 11 years. In Ontario, the Niagara region is the pioneer. In 1985, the Ontario Ministry of Housing began to co-fund programs with the regional government through 75 to 25 cost-sharing arrangements. In the past six years, this partnership has worked very well. Presently there are 17 programs growing. There are not any that are not growing and meeting the social, economic and housing needs of a wide variety of Ontarians. We have special-needs clients and then just ordinary people who, because of the recession, feel the crunch and want to move to a more affordable space and are willing to share their accommodation. That is why our waiting lists are growing and growing.

In fact, the Ontario model of home sharing is internationally recognized for its effectiveness, cost-efficiency and innovations. In 1990, the majority of matches across the province involve special-needs clients. According to statistics recently compiled on 12 of the 17 programs, 44.7% or 265 matches kept seniors out of non-profit senior housing units, and 16.8% or 99 matches kept mentally and physically challenged home sharers in the community off the street, out of hostels, out of emergency rooms and hospital beds, nursing homes, homes for the aged and rest homes—that is out of institutions, preventive institutionalization.

On the other hand, 28.3% or 168 matches enabled home sharers to come out of institutions, either out of rest homes or hospitals. In Hamilton I am able to take people right out of hospital even though they are facing nursing home placements. The total number of matches made in 1990 was 839. In addition, two programs—SHAPES, the Scarborough Housing Assistance and Placement Education for Singles, which is Christine's and mine, and the Victorian Order of Nurses home sharing—deal with significant numbers of new immigrants and multicultural groups while others are able to match the survivors of family violence. I do that too.

Although the actual numbers are relatively small, the Ministry of Housing's share of $50,000 per program—that is all it costs the provincial government—is $50,000 into the communities. The communities pick up the rest and are very glad to do it because these programs are essential for the services that already exist. By injecting that $50,000 in each of these communities, there is a large multiplier effect in other ministries such as Health, Community and Social Services, and Citizenship, and for human rights, the disabled, seniors, race relations and the new division of community health and support services.

Also, there are many other effects that are hard to measure but that are very significant, such as the reduced stress upon family care givers, the reduced stress in neighbourhoods. The police are not called as often, the fire department is not running down the street because some little old lady pressed the button or called 911 when she did not have to or called other informal support systems. This is significant. I am not being facetious here. This really happens a lot.

The cost to the government:

Now I am going to tell you what this $50,000 per community would cost if it were withdrawn. The cost to the government to build one non-profit housing unit is $10,000. We know that is a conservative figure, but we do not want to inflate the value. A hospital bed costs over $400 a day. A nursing home bed or home-for-the-aged bed costs from $745 to $1,100 per month. A bed in a hospital costs $24 a day in subsidies. I am only talking about subsidies here. Beds in women's shelters and second-level long-term care homes are up to $31 a day. Simple arithmetic quickly shows how millions of dollars are saved by spending $50,000 across the province.

Our concerns:

The reason we are here and not interviewing our clients today is that in mid-January the majority of the Ontario home sharing co-ordinators were told by a senior Minister of Housing official that there would be $40 million trimmed from base-funded programs within the ministry. According to the official, the home sharing program was one of the most vulnerable programs because they have always existed on the surpluses. They have never been base-funded and so if there are no surpluses, what happens to us? This is what our question is. We were also told that the final decision by the Management Board will be made by the end of January. Today is 28 January, therefore we are here asking what is going to happen to this very effective program, this innovation.

We have not been able to get an answer from the Ministry. We want an answer from the ministry because our clients are getting upset because we are not sure what we should be doing. We decided last week to form a lobby group. That seemed to be the most effective thing to do so that we could get what we did. As stated previously, we are not questioning the necessity of cuts or tough decisions. We applaud you for certain cuts and tough decisions but we are saying please save this program because of all the benefits it has in other ministries. The confusion we have is that given the NDP's grass-roots style and philosophy of helping the most needy, we are confused by the potential elimination of a program which effectively serves such groups, to say nothing of the frail elderly and the working poor seeking safe and affordable living arrangements within the community.

Living with this cloud of uncertainty affects the very essence of our matching service, which is built on a trusting relationship established with matched and potential clients. At the moment we cannot provide that trust with a degree of certainty or confidence. The demand for service is ever increasing as the news of our successful matches become public. There is great concern on the part of the needy in the community and among their service providers.

For example, when a case manager from the Hamilton program for schizophrenia called me last Thursday, I told him I could not take his referral because I was organizing a support group. I informed him of our predicament. I did not ask him; he just told him I could not take his referral.

Within an hour I had a letter of support within my hands. It was not faxed, it was hand-delivered. It was written by the clinical and executive director of that program because I am able to match and place schizophrenics and physically disabled people. They are the people who need a lot of help. That is not all I do; it is very broad, what I do, is that if our program goes, where are they going to live?

We have a solution. We have told you the problems and we know we can run an effective service within the present guidelines. We are only asking to be saved from a $40-million trimming. That is all we are asking, to be saved from the trimming. Many of us have ideas on how to paden our service on the existing resources. We all have many ideas and we would be willing to sit down and talk with you or the ministry at any time about these ideas.

Some of the ideas are found in the conclusion section of this. Andraya has ideas, Christine has ideas, we all have good ideas to do with what we have now. This document which was submitted to the health innovation fund committee is an idea for the future which builds on the concept, which provides jobs. This document provides jobs and also takes people out of hospitals. We will only deal with home providers who are in hospital awaiting nursing home placement and then we will deal with people who need to be paid care givers. So that is a future idea. We have our ideas. We are willing to sit down and talk about them any time.

However, I want you to know that our present resources are very, very stretched. Basically, we want to go on at a provincial level until broader evaluation criteria and a different unit of analysis can be applied to take into account a more realistic cost-benefit analysis, because right now it is just directed at housing when it should be much broader. The Ministry of Housing is paying for all these benefits, but we cannot do them all adequately because we need actually every one.

The home sharing program in its present form has much to contribute to the social housing needs of the rapidly growing aging population and the increasing numbers of new immigrants. However, piggyback funding to extend this vital and innovative service to special needs clients is a future consideration. It is not what we want now. We are just saying it is something that we should consider for the future.

We have two recommendations that we would hope, you would urge you to recommend to the Legislature. They are pretty simple. Because of its proven effectiveness, widespread social benefits and cost efficiency we urge this committee, the finance committee, to recommend the proposed $900,000 be found somewhere in the 1991-92 Ministry of Housing budget for all 17 programs. Second, we urge this committee to recommend that broader evaluation criteria and a different unit of analysis, such as "registered client," be considered so that the wide-ranging social benefits can be partially captured. You cannot capture them all but we can partially capture them that way, in an equitable way.

In conclusion, I would like to thank you for your time and consideration. We look forward to a written response from the Ministry of Housing about this urgent matter as soon as possible.

Mrs Sullivan: We have had another presentation before the committee from a home sharing organization in Toronto and it was a very interesting one. I want to say at the outset that I see in your brief that you are very encouraged by the new government and I am glad to see you are. I do not belong to the party of the new government and I want to underline the fact that it was the old government that began this home sharing program.

Ms Stephen: We understand that.

Mrs Sullivan: You are looking for $900,000 in base funding.

Ms Stephen: No, we are looking for $900,000—

Mrs Sullivan: Let's talk about $1 million. Where else are you applying? I see that you have applied to the innovation fund for about $200,000. Are you going elsewhere as well and did the home share organizations receive money from other sources besides the Ministry of Housing?

Ms Stephen: We have to go after the other 25% ourselves and that basically comes from the region. This house innovation is just an idea from my local agency. It has nothing to do with the other 16 programs. We have tried. We are severely understaffed and this was an attempt to get increased staff and now we find not only are we severely understaffed but we are in jeopardy. We might be all gone and the service will be gone to the communities. At a regional level, regions are very supportive, but they are all on zero-based budgets and so we can get the 25%, but it is contingent upon getting the 75% from the province. That is why we came here.

Mrs Sullivan: I understand that. What I am asking though—in the past you received funding from other sources in the provincial government as well, comparable to the special application that you have made to the innovation fund—did you not receive funding through Community and Social Services at one time?

Ms Stephen: No, Niagara did in one way, but it is a very small amount. It was part of the 25% of the regional share. It is not the 75% from the province, so to speak. What we are told is that under the present rules you cannot have piggyback funding. You cannot get funding from one ministry and another ministry; they will not let you do that. It should be done in the Community and Social Services—I am part of another group and we applied for the program money to Community and Social Services and the housing money from the Ministry of Housing. The problem with us, home sharing, is that we do not have buildings. We are not bricks and mortar. We are social housing so we are kind of an anomaly, but as long as we have Ministry of Housing funding we cannot go to the Ministry of Community and Social Services.

Mrs Sullivan: Has the VON in Ontario taken this as one of the issues that it is seeking funding for generally?

Ms Stephen: I am not speaking on behalf of them. I have nothing to do with them. I am at a local branch. I am from Hamilton.

Mrs Sullivan: I understand that. Have you met with the Minister of Housing or people on his staff?

Ms Stephen: We have tried to get an appointment, but it takes three weeks. We have mounted a letter-writing campaign and we have alerted—we just knew this. We found out informally and first of all it took a week to convince our agencies that this was true because this is just a shocking matter, and then last week we started getting letters going. We have not talked directly to the minister. Some people have talked close to the minister, but not—

Mrs Sullivan: Have you met with the regional office of the Ministry of Housing in your area?

Ms Stephen: Not yet. I mean, we thought we had to get right to the source of it first. We are willing to do whatever it takes, but when you are told that in two weeks the decision is being made and you are probably going to be eliminated, you want to go right to the source because bureaucracies are kind of slow and we might be out in the cold. It is not us; it is not the workers; it is our clients, because who is going to advocate for them when we are gone? No one.

Mr Phillips: Well, a government that will listen to people and respond to their needs—the throne speech. But just a couple of comments; one is, I guess, on the good news side. In your brief you say you recognize they inherited a deficit of $2.5 billion. I think that the news may be better than you are aware. I am not sure they inherited a deficit now of $2.5 billion, so as we look at the numbers it may be encouraging news to you.

I guess my comment, though, would be that I am quite familiar with SHAPES. It is a good organization. For those who are familiar with the organization, it takes a long while to build up that network because, first, you have to find a lot of people who have the facilities they want to rent. Then you have to find the people who want to rent. It is kind of a networking thing, which, as you say, is not bricks and mortar. SHAPES, I guess, came out of the Agincourt community services. I was around at the start of 1970, I think, when about five people started that. It emerged out of that.

I agree with you. If your funding is cut off, it takes a long while to re-establish that. Also, I believe these are the kinds of organizations we are going to look to in the future because they are kind of self-help, the things that are quite—I hate the term—cost-effective.

Ms Stephen: It is a private solution.

Mr Phillips: I think as we look ahead there are going to be more and more needs. I think you are at the right place with the sound of desperation in your voice because you think it may happen in the next couple of days.

Ms Stephen: We have no assurance that it will not.

Mr Phillips: If I can speak from personal experience with one of the 17 groups that cover all of Scarborough, it is a very cost-effective organization whose needs will grow in the future. The challenge for this committee is that we are trying to look at a longer-term budget, and you are facing a perceived crisis in the next few days, whether or not it is real. I could speak as one who will not be able to have a huge influence on them, but they are listening and hope they respond to it.

The last thing I would say is that I am surprised we have not seen the Victorian Order of Nurses here as a total organization, because I think it also has some fairly significant—

Ms Stephen: Maybe next week.

Mr Phillips: Maybe next week? I support your thinking and say you may have better news than you realize, but because they may not have inherited a $2.5-billion deficit, I hope they can handle things for you over the next few weeks.

Mr Malkowski: Thank you for your presentation. It has given us a lot of information. But I would like a little clarification. You say there would be a trim of $40 million. Is that through the Ministry of Housing?

Ms Stephen: Yes.

Mr Malkowski: Can you explain where you got that information? You said a senior administrator. How did you come about that?

Ms Stephen: The Toronto co-ordinators meet on a quarterly basis and the ministry officials come. The Toronto people have known about this potential elimination or have seen the signs of it, since at least December, maybe November. The Toronto people had to write a letter. They might not have had any more funding come 1 January, but they wrote a letter 15 December and got assurance that they have funding until the end of March, and we have funding until the end of March.

Then there was a meeting I think about 17 January in Toronto and this is where a senior official came and told me specifically about the cuts and the conundrum that they were in. He said, "We're not choosing between buying a truck and cutting you guys." It was between seniors' housing and home sharing. But the problem is that we are a project that has been living on the surplus, so if there is a major cut like that in the base-funded programs, it just seems like it is clear: You are not there any more. He said that the decisions would be made by the end of January very shortly after that.

Mr Hansen: I met with Betty, I believe—I cannot remember her last name—from home sharing here in Toronto and I assured her that I would write a letter to the minister to find out. I did not have as much information then as I have here now in front of me.

The other thing too, and maybe Betty misled us, is that there were 800 brought together in a year. Is that in a year or altogether in the program? She had me believe it was 839 matches altogether, but that is only in one year.

Ms Stephen: Yes, that is all programs. We are back in 1990. There are many ways, as of course you know, to count statistics. We were counting them in a fiscal year, but all of a sudden now we are counting them in the calendar

r. So we found out how many were in the calendar year, and that is 839. That may sound a small number, but it has a ripple effect in communities, such as what happened to Susan back there. She was not a direct match, but she found out that we were doing this and could give her some advice and she went off and did it herself. So that is a very misleading thing. That is why we would like to be count-registered clients instead.

Mr Hansen: You could actually double that figure, because that is only one half of the match.

Ms Stephen: Right, that is only one half.

Mr Hansen: So there are 1,600, close to 1,700 involved in the match in one year.

Ms Stephen: Well, actually, many of the matches involve more than three people. I match whole families, families of three or couples and their mothers and their children, so that is a very misleading figure. That is one of the problems that we face when it comes to cost-benefit analysis.

Mr Hansen: One thing I have to say. I met with the Niagara district health council, and I was talking to Doug Pelje, and I was very pleased that it is pioneered out of our area. Doug has done a lot of things in this particular area, and I know that he supports it. He lobbied that particular day, and I know there were four other MPPs from the Niagara area. We are going to be talking to the minister to find out why this funding is stopping.

Ms Stephen: Well, we still need a written response, because the problem is that we do not know what to do with our clients. I have over 200 clients. When the phone rings I am not sure whether I should be making an appointment, taking any new ones or just dealing with my present ones and finding somebody, a case manager, who can look after them in one way or another. So we need to know very soon. We cannot be sitting here waiting for another month or two not knowing.

Mr Hansen: Okay. I can say my assistant here in Toronto has already contacted David Cooke on this. I just have not got a reply back yet.

Mr Phillips: You actually spoke to him?

Mr Hansen: No, his office.

Ms Stephen: Thank you very much.

Mr White: I just wanted to comment briefly about a couple of things. One, obviously the nature of the program is an excellent one, very innovative. I think we got lost a little bit in terms of the immediate short-term difficulty, which I am sure is a bureaucratic mixup which perhaps the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Housing could take back to her minister. Two, the need for this kind of program, not simply to secure funding but also to be a valuable program throughout the province. I do not have such a program in my area. It is obviously a very valuable program, particularly for, say, abused women in rural areas where there is not an institutional setting, nor is it appropriate for there to be one.

So I guess what I am struck with is the difference between the overall program, its merit, how it would fit in in an innovative way into communities and the immediate threat that seems to hang over you.

Ms Stephen: We are facing an immediate threat.

Mr White: I think that has sort of distracted us a bit from the overall value of your program, and I am sure that the Minister of Housing will look into that temporary, short-term problem there. Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to sound a note of caution. I got the sense of urgency in your presentation, and I just wanted to make sure that you did not think that this particular committee was in a position to do anything about it—

Ms Stephen: We understand that.

Mr Kwinter: —and that what you really have to do is to pursue the minister now, the ministry and anyone else that you can get to do it. We are having pre-budget consultation meetings. We are listening to you. We will be making recommendations. Whether the Treasurer or the government decides to implement any of our recommendations is up to them. If you are of the impression that by coming here you are coming to the source and we are going to resolve your problems, I just want to make sure that is understood.

Ms Stephen: I understand that, but this is a public forum, and this was the only public forum we could get to this week.

Mr Kwinter: I think it is great. In your presentation, I got the impression that you were looking to us to respond immediately and resolve your problem. We are not capable of doing that.

Ms Stephen: I understand that. But I understand that you make recommendations to the Legislature as a whole, so I thought it was appropriate to come and speak. Some of the matches are very beautiful stories. The Michele Landsberg one is. The top one on this one is between an elderly lady with panic disorder who was recently widowed and who was borderline anorexic before her last home-sharer came. He was a young man. He cooked. He fed her up so that she gained 20 pounds just in time to now console him because he is Iranian and he is very concerned with the Middle East war.

The roles have changed; the tables have turned. She is consoling him now. That is a very beautiful thing and that is what can happen in these matches. I have a match between a physically disabled man and a schizophrenic. One is not able to physically cook, but he can read the recipe and the other guy just gets a little bit of reassurance and he can put the things in the pan. Those guys are going to be together for years. So this is what we are talking about losing. Should not do it.

Ms M. Ward: Some of my questions have been answered. You have never had assured funding?

Ms Stephen: No. We have been living on project funding. It is time to base fund us.

Ms M. Ward: So every year you would have been wondering if it was coming forward.

Ms Stephen: We only had assurance that we would have project money for two years. The third year was how well we did in our match quotas. We work on a quota system, a minimum of 35 a year. If you do not make your 35, then there is a real evaluation as to whether you get funding for the third year. That is the wrong way, but that is what we have been living under.

Ms M. Ward: Thirty-five matches?

Ms Stephen: A year. But Christine sits there and does 200 a year.

Ms M. Ward: The other point has been brought up about the other contacts that you make, people coming to you with what appears to be a housing problem. People I have talked to who are working in it say you are very often dealing with other problems too which you may refer.

Ms Stephen: Not always. It is your definition of housing. Before you ever get to what kind of housing you are going to have, you have to find out what are the operating factors in the person's life. It takes an hour to find that out. Sometimes you have to do a little bit of advocating for them and what not. You try not to do too much; teach them how to do it for themselves. But yes, there is a large counselling component in it, but the Ministry of Housing calls that a soft service. That is not a hard service.

Ms M. Ward: These statistics are only the matches, not the number of people who contact you or walk into your offices.

Ms Stephen: That is right. If you want that, we have it. We have that information.

Mr Hansen: I agree with Mr Kwinter there. This committee is listening to the needs of the different groups out there. I was speaking as an MPP from the Niagara area, I hope you understand.

Ms Stephen: Yes, I do. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

Ms Stephen: Thank you for listening.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Federation of Agriculture; Roger George, president, Bill Weaver, second vice-president. I notice there are more than two, so perhaps you could introduce the rest of the members on the panel.

Mr George: Along with second vice-president Bill Weaver, I have on my right our executive director Carl Sulliman, and on my extreme left, manager of research and policy development Cecil Bradley. They will be with us on any technical issues today. I am Roger George, the new president of the OFA. Along with my wife, I have a livestock and grain operation in Nipissing district. Bill, do you want to tell them about yourself?

Mr Weaver: I was newly elected. I am second vice-president of the federation in hog and egg operation in Kent county. So you have real, live farmers in front of you this morning.

Mr George: We have circulated to the committee a brief, which we do not intend to go through in detail but it will serve you as backup material. We are pleased to be here in these consultations before members of all the parties in the Legislature to hopefully explain to you some of the circumstances that farmers find themselves in as we move into a new financial year in Ontario agriculture and as indeed the provincial government is formulating its financial policy for the next while.

I do want to touch on three major issues you will find on the inside page called the introduction. We intend to touch briefly on farm credit issues, the whole issue of grains and oilseeds stabilization, and a little bit on rural development.

But before I get into those, I kind of just want to give you a little bit of an analogy. I almost feel like Oliver Twist here today. I did see the movie Oliver over Christmas again and I thought it had some sort of appeal to farmers because here we are again coming back and saying "Please, sir, I want some more." I am quite sure that many of the newly elected members of the Legislature, particularly those who have no great experience of our industry, will be thinking about, you know, the government is going to be moving very shortly to give cabinet approval, we hope, to a new grains and oilseeds stabilization plan which we call GRIP. This is short for gross revenue insurance plan which is part of a new national program that our organization and many others have been working on for the last few months. This will indeed put some stability into a sector of the industry that has been very hard hit.

But that is not the end of the story. The agricultural industry is going through some tremendous changes. We have also got some tremendous impacts affecting us, particularly in the whole issue of credit and interest rates. Our industry is very susceptible, probably more so than most, to high interest rates. Inasmuch as by and large we are price-takers rather than price-makers, we do not in many sectors have the ability to crank up our returns to offset ever-increasing input costs, of which interest rates are a major factor—$4.6 billion is the amount of farm debt in Ontario farms today, which is only down about $500 million from its historic high of a few years ago.

We also want to explain to you, or try to explain to you, the importance of our industry in the economy of rural Ontario—not just rural Ontario but Ontario, period. While agriculture's gross is something in excess of $5 billion direct prime input generated, the total spinoff effect on the provincial economy is in excess of $40 billion. This includes the food-processing sector and all the different manufacturing jobs that farmers directly or indirectly cause to happen with their activities, and that is $40 billion and tens and tens of thousands of jobs which hinge directly or indirectly on the wellbeing of a good, prime agricultural industry.

I think in Ontario from time to time we tend to take for granted the farm sector. With Ontario being such a diverse economy, I think that farming tends to get forgotten from time to time, especially among the urban sector. Really, we have to ask the question, what does urban Ontario want? Well, they want adequate supplies of safe, affordable food and that, Mr Chairman, is what Ontario farmers have given their urban cousins and in fact everyone in the province last 100 years—adequate supplies of safe, affordable food. By and large, I think that is taken for granted, and we cannot afford to take that for granted because of the economic situation in agriculture. Many farmers are for the first time really reconsidering their position as having a viable future in this industry. I do not think that the Ontario government can take farming for granted for ever and ever. I would hate to be in the position of a future government that has to pick up the pieces if indeed we lose much more of this sector. It is going to be a lot easier to keep it going through difficult times than it will be to pick up the pieces down the road once the wheels have fallen off the cart. So I hope when you are making your recommendations to government and to your caucuses that you do take into consideration and investigate the importance of this industry and try to understand the importance of this industry in the general economy.

On the issue of farm credit, you will see that we have attached a brief that we made to Pat Hayes's committee, which went around the province before Christmas investigating and consulting with farmers on the issue of farm credit. It goes into fairly exhaustive detail on giving the state of the Ontario situation out there in agriculture—as I say, $4.6 billion in debt. We put in some technical information on all those things that you may be interested in.

I just want to hit the general high spots here and say that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, along with many other farm groups, is going to be asking our Minister of Agriculture and Food and the Treasurer and the provincial cabinet when we meet with them in April to introduce a long-term credit plan in Ontario. We understand that it may take another year of study and development to put in place that type of sustainable long-term credit for Ontario farmers.

In the interim we shall be asking for an interest rebate program, probably specifically targeted to those farmers in the most need of it. For certainly four out of the last five years, we have had interest rebate programs of one form or another, and by and large they have been highly successful in dealing with this problem, but on an ad hoc basis. The FA believes that the time has come for Ontario farmers to have the surety of having a long-term farm credit program that they can depend on, just the same as is available in most of our competing major agricultural provinces, namely, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Quebec, where the provincial governments give preferential lending rates on a long-term basis to their farmers.

Clearly, it puts Ontario farmers at a disadvantaged position and the responsibility for that, we have always felt in Ontario, has fallen to the federal government. That is why Ontario has kept out of that, but the federal government has clearly been neglectful in its duties. The federal Farm Credit Corp has fallen away as being a prime and meaningful lender of long-term credit to farmers. If the federal government is not interested any more in that, and we do not see too many signs that it is, then I think this province has no option other than to get back into the long-term credit business. But as I say, that is going to take some time to develop. In the meantime, we are going to be pressing our minister and our Treasurer to come up with an interim program for 1991.

The second point I want to make briefly is on this whole issue of grains and oilseed stabilization. As I mentioned before, we are very close to getting cabinet approval for the GRIP program, the gross revenue insurance plan. That will indeed give a base price to cash crop farmers. I do not want to get into the technical details of that. We think it is going to be a beneficial program. It is not going to be cheap. On a national basis, the premiums are going to total about $1.6 billion. That is for all three parties. It is a tripartite program and the agreement at the national level is that the federal government will pay 42% of the premiums, farmers will pay 33% of the premiums and the provincial government 25% of those premiums, so there is going to be a cost to the provincial government in that respect.

Also, the second portion of the plan, and it is a two-pronged plan, is called NISA or the net income stabilization account. That is a different type of program based on a farmer's, as it says, net income. The figures will be taken directly from the income tax form. The final details are not yet worked out, but we are certainly expecting and hoping that this government will indeed join others across the country in making this a truly national program because the net income stabilization account does have some very long-term, positive aspects to it.

The real problem we have with it is it takes a number of years to get the program up and running in so much as each farmer builds up his own individual account with after-tax dollars. Clearly, the time to be building up an account is in times of good prices rather than, as we are now, trying to start the thing off in poor times. We are not starting it off at a good time—and I was on the national committee that helped to put this thing together—but we believe that over the long haul, the net income stabilization account will be of major significance to take us into the next century. I would be very disappointed if Ontario decided, because of fiscal restraints, not to get involved in this one at the beginning, because from the point of view of international trade compatibility, it is going to be a key thing in the future.

The final thing on grains and oilseed is that, again—and as I said before, “Please, sir, can I have some more?”—we are going to be coming back. When I say “we,” the Ontario Federation of Agriculture and all our commodity allies are going to be coming back to both levels of government and asking for a deficiency payment for grains, oilseeds and horticultural crops for 1990, because in 1990 there was no effective stabilization program out there. It has taken us over a year to get this far with GRIP and NISA and the cash flow problems facing many producers this spring are going to be horrendous as they come off a year when they had pretty decent crops but the prices of seed were just pitiful. Certainly the world price of wheat is at a historic low in terms of real dollars.

I just again would hope that committee members can get some understanding of these difficulties that farmers have been facing, brought on in large part because of the international trade wars.

On the final issue of rural development, I do not want to get into any details on that. Maybe we can deal with it in questions, but our organization believes, as I think does the Ministry of Agriculture and Food, that there is a need to investigate this whole issue of rural development. Rural development can mean many things to many different people, but to my mind it means spurring economic activity in rural Ontario with entrepreneurial help. We need some seed money from governments, but I think a lot of the thing can be generated in rural Ontario itself on a localized basis. It becomes almost self-help, but it needs some kickstarting from governments.

I think it is an exciting, long-term, multimillion-dollar, multi-year project that I would hope the government would certainly be looking at, because Ontario people I think can be the masters of their own fate as well, but we also need the sort of encouragement that urban areas have had. As infrastructures are being built up in urban areas, I think rural Ontario has from time to time been forgotten.

With that, Mr Chairman, I think we should move, if you wish, into questions. I just want to say that we are here today to back up in the strongest terms our Minister of Agriculture and Food, Mr Buchanan, when he is going to be making his pitch to the Treasurer to not only maintain the budget of the Ministry of Agriculture and Food but to increase it for some of these areas in which I have pointed out we need the aid. I think it is very important to get back to my original question of what does urban Ontario want? They want adequate supplies of food. What do they give us in exchange? It often is their garbage and that is just not good enough, because if the farmers are going to do their thing, produce this affordable and safe food, then urban Ontario has to look at the farming community in rural Ontario as a lot more than a playground and a place to dump its waste. They have to recognize it for what it is, as a centre of key economic activity and that farming is the second-largest industry in this province.

Mr Sutherland: Given that last comment you said about being the second-largest industry, I had someone comment to me that in terms of overall economic recovery for this province the fact that what may slow it down is that there are approximately 10,000 or fewer farmers now than there were at the time of the last recession. I was wondering if you can comment. Are those the numbers you have? With that many out of the industry, I was wondering if you could comment on what type of impact you feel that is going to have on economic recovery for the province as a whole.

Mr George: The question of how many farmers there are in a province is one that has eluded most of us. It depends on what you define the farmer as and certainly our organization is never going to attempt to define a farmer.

I guess when we get the 1991 census, we shall have an idea, in terms of census criteria anyway, just how many farmers we have lost, but you are absolutely correct, many farmers have left the land. More important than that, I think many more farmers are working off the farm in order to support their operation.

Cecil might advise me what percentage of farm family income actually comes from non-farm sources and it is fairly significant. I would venture to say that it is probably half. Most businessmen would not expect to have to send half the family out in order to support their business, that is exactly the state that agriculture is in at this point in time when we are doing that.

Just remember that when a farmer's family is forced to not only maintain his farm but go and work off the farm, they are also displacing someone else, probably young people without any experience, who are trying to get their first elusive job in a factory or wherever. Clearly, we have a vested interest, from a total picture, in keeping our industry healthy so that our farmers can actually make a living completely off their farm and so that we are not competing for jobs with everyone else.

Mr Kwinter: I was just curious to know whether either or both GRIP and NISA have been checked as to their compatibility with both the free trade agreement and the GATT. Are there going to be any problems as a result of pursuing these particular initiatives?

Mr George: In so much as we do not know the final outcome of the GATT yet, that question may be a little bit premature. However, certainly as a person who sat on the committee, we believe that NISA is absolutely trade compatible no matter what happens at GATT. It is in what we call the "green category," along with crop insurance and everything else in so much as it will have no detrimental impact on trading issues.

As for GRIP, the gross revenue insurance plan, in fairness I think we would have to say that it may be suspect given the current trade regulations, but it is no more suspect than a lot of other programs out there. Very clearly when our committee was putting together GRIP and NISA and looking at this whole issue of the grains industry, we decided at an early date that we would do what was right for Canadian farmers at this point in time to address a critical issue, rather than skate around trade issues and develop something that was going to be trade-acceptable when we did not even know what the trade deal might be. Certainly we were not prepared to lay down everything and be completely clean when everybody else in the world is playing games too.

So I think in answer to that question, Mr Kwinter, I just want to say that when everybody else lays down his internal supports, then Canada will clearly be doing the same. It may well be that somewhere down the road when we have resolved some of these trading issues there may need to be modifications. That is the right time, in my mind, to do that but not now. We have to have a program there to help our farmers in a time when they badly need it.

Mrs Sullivan: There are a couple of things that I want you to elaborate on, particularly in relationship to farm credit. I recall that in the 1990 budget, and I think in the budget before that, there was about $50-million worth of funding for the Ontario family farm interest rate reduction program and son of OFFIRR. In short-term funding, a looking for a similar program in terms of interest rate reduction programs? And at what would you estimate the cost of this year, given that the estimates I have seen are that the total debt will rise in the upcoming fiscal year?

Mr Weaver: I think as Roger has spoken of, we are definitely looking at two parts. Given the realities of developing a long-term program, we are definitely looking at a short-term program for this year; you know, something that is going to keep the cost of lending down to a reasonable level.

I do not know if Cecil is going to have any hard and fast numbers for us right now. Obviously some of the cost involved is going to impinge on what the interest rate is. Fortunately, we see some creeping down in the interest rate, and that is good. It is good for us as farmers because, under any program, all of the debt is not going to be covered but, at the same time, it is going to be good for the government because as interest rate does slip down, it is going to mean less of a burden for any programs. Do you have any hard figures you could add, Cecil?

Mr Bradley: No, other than I suppose during its large payout, I believe the OFFIRR program paid out something in the neighbourhood of $67 million or $68 million. During its peak payment year the OFFIRR program paid out approximately $67 million or $68 million. I think if you were to check the figures now you would find that farm debt is not much changed but the interest carrying cost attached to it is somewhat higher, so to get the equivalent level of support that was provided by OFFIRR in what farmers would call its best year would probably cost something in the order of $70 million. But of course there is judgement that needs to be exercised in what is an appropriate floor level for interest rate and how targeted the assistance is in terms of what sorts of farm operations are eligible for support.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay. That was going to be the next question. What would your best recommendation be for eligibility?

Mr George: Well, certainly we were not too impressed with the last one, where the endeavour seemed to be to spread it out as widely and as thinly as possible. Clearly it has to go to those farmers who need it, and so I think OFA is quite prepared to sit down with the minister and make suggestions as to the groups that should be targeted along, as I am sure there will be suggestions from other commodities in that regard.

The other issue comes down to the extent to which that money goes to help the banks, and I think in some of the past programs there has certainly been some, I hate to use the word "gouging" but it is the only one that comes to mind at the moment, where banks have not necessarily given farmers the best interest rate in town, simply because they know that those farmers are going to be able to cover that interest spread from a provincial government program. Clearly when we have only got a limited amount of government funds, and we are always concerned about that constraint, then we want to make sure that the beneficiary of this thing is going to be the farmers of Ontario and not the Canadian Bankers' Association.

Mrs Sullivan: That has certainly been the situation in my community. I want to move on to the kinds of farm credit organizations that exist in the prairie provinces. You have mentioned that over the longer term you would see those as viable operations. How would you see them working in conjunction with the Farm Credit Corp in Ontario, and what kinds of moneys do you think should be put into a farm credit operation?

Mr George: The OFA has said in both its brief to Mr Hayes and also to the national farm finance task force that we are prepared to go with some sort of a cost-sharing national farm finance program, but very clearly we are interested in making sure that the federal government actually puts real money into this thing and does not just provide a shopping window in the name of the Farm Credit Corp.

The federal government has got to put something in its storefront and not just offer us the storekeeper and his assistants. At the moment we see the Farm Credit Corp as basically a store with a lot of attendants and nothing to sell. It really bothers us to turn to the provincial government and say the feds have given up on farm credit so the province has to do it all, because very clearly that was not the original commitment.

I am hoping, and I think it is getting to be a slimmer hope by the month, that the feds will indeed reconfirm their commitment to supplying core financing at affordable rates on a long-term basis. But in the absence of that, as we said earlier on, I think we have to work with the provincial government to see just what we can do to create a pool of money to make sure that when farmers enter into a long-term, 20-year plan for their farm, they are going to have matching capital requirements.

That is the real problem now when we enter into that, buying a farm and thinking we are going to pay for it in 20 years, with no idea at all whether interest rates are going to be 10% or 20% over that period of time. Again, a lot of this has to come back on the federal government, but given the situation there, I think we have to look at all sorts of options.

It is clear in my mind that there is no one single fix for this thing. I think it is going to take a whole basketful of different types of programs for different situations and we need to be looking to see where there are other sources of money. We need to be looking at the tax system. Is there any way we can go back to the old agribond proposal, where investors could get a break on investing in agriculture at lower rates? At that point in time we were looking at fleshing out some 7% or 8% money because investors would get that type of rate.

We should be very frank. There are a lot of wealthy farmers out there, farmers who would gladly retire or sell their farm and reinvest back in their industry. So we want to find, if we can, ways in which these retiring farmers will either pass on that farm to the next generation or else will sell it to someone and take back the mortgage at lower than market rates, because this industry cannot stand 16% interest rates. It can barely stand 10% interest rates. I think it is probably one thing that some members of the Legislature do not understand, the difference between our industry and industry as you know it.

Mrs Sullivan: Can I just ask one final question, also on the credit issue, relating to farmers coming into the industry? At one point last year, as I recall, the OFA began to argue that with appropriate stabilization programs, a program such as the beginning farmer assistance program would not be necessary. Do you concur with that?

Mr Weaver: I have been working somewhat in that area. The costs of getting into agriculture, as I am sure anybody who is at all involved knows, are immense. The stabilization programs are going to be beneficial, I think, for developing an ability to plan, because as Roger talked about the idea of having long-term credit policies, right now we see commodity prices going up and down. It is the realities of agriculture today. We are talking about lower margins per unit and the need to produce higher volumes. Those are just the realities we face.

As for your direct question, do we see that stable incomes are going to be adequate for incoming farmers, I think we have to be very careful with that. Beginning farmers have some real needs there that have been addressed with BFAP. They have been addressed very poorly in the past program, which addresses the farm stock program. So we will see a likelihood of some sort of program coming up.

I think this is where we are talking about the possibility of targeting programs. We are presently going through a discussion process within OFA about where our recommendations should go as far as where and if things should be targeted. If we are going to have perhaps slightly larger weighting of targeting of credit policy towards the incoming farmer, then that might be suitable and we will not have to have these other farm-start type programs that appear now and again.

I have been a farmer for 15 years. It does not seem that long. The ability or the need for us to be able to plan, to have some sort of level—we know there are going to be ups and downs in commodity prices and there are going to be ups and downs in interest rates, but to take some of those peaks and valleys out is very crucial to us, because we just cannot stand the 50% or 60% changes in commodity prices that we see. I think that is why we are after many of these plans that we are looking at here.

Mr Bradley: I would supplement Bill's answer to the question by pointing out that there is an independent rationale for beginning farmer programs, even in the presence of very good stabilization programs which GRIP and NISA promise to be, because beginning farmers generally have disproportionately higher costs in their early years of operation, particularly because of financing and of course particularly in these years when interest rates are where they are.

They also unfortunately oftentimes have below average yields because they are getting into the business and they are trying to establish themselves. They may not have a command of the management skills or the machinery or the land base that they are working from. Since the GRIP program tends to be driven by farm yields, that would suggest that a beginning farmer might not be getting the full benefit of the protections that GRIP can provide. So I think there will continue to be an independent rationale for entry-farmer assistance.

Mr Jamison: I would like to get back on the impact so we understand the impacts. I know you have lived through a surplus here of both the free trade and gas situations on agriculture in general. That is the first part of the question, to give us a real feel for how that has affected you over the last number of years. The second question have really dovetails that in a smaller sense, and that is how we stand as far as how the provincial government has performed in relation to other programs applied in other provinces; specifically Quebec, for example. Those are the concerns.

Mr George: Maybe if I can take the last question first, if you want to start comparing Ontario's agricultural programs to the province of Quebec, we are not even in the ballpark, and when you start talking about a level playing field, we are not even near the stadium, never mind saying whether the field is level or not.

We were in Quebec last week. You go there with our general farm organization, the Union des producteurs agricoles, that is holding a $1-million conference next week to look at rural development. It is an incredible thing that the farmers are doing and I commend them for it. They are driving their own destiny there in Quebec and Quebec is very clearly getting itself in a position where, if it goes for sovereignty, it is going to have the infrastructure there to be self-sufficient, and not only self-sufficient but will be an exporting nation. Quebec is a prime example.

Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba are all agriculture-based economies and they have done tremendous things over the years, not only just in finance, but in other programs particularly in the livestock sector in Alberta, to encourage their industries and build up modern competitive industries.

I think that as a major agricultural province, Ontario is just about bottom of the pile. We have constantly pointed that out and it is one of these things that just tends to get glossed over. The only thing that saved our industry, quite frankly as I said before, was because we are so diversified in Ontario and we have so many other options. There are jobs there for our farmers to go and supplement their income. You can all see the tragedies happening, particularly in Saskatchewan where it is a completely wheat-based economy and there are no options. Heaven forbid that our industry ever gets into that state.

To answer that question shortly, Ontario has been prophetic so we are not here—I was talking to the minister recently and he is worrying about the budget. We are looking for more money, not less. I think this would be of provincial importance, of importance to the provincial economy that this be considered very seriously, regardless of the fact that we have some major budgetary concerns in this province. The options, as I said before, in the long term are going to be a lot worse if we do not deal with the issue of where we are on trade and whatever, one issue that comes to mind as a result of free trade is this heightened awareness of competitiveness, where particularly in the food processing sector, processors are scrambling to meet the challenge of United States competitiveness as tariffs are removed.

My research and development has been involved in the national task force on that exact issue on competitiveness and is able to speak to it tonight. The other issue of course is the unresolved GATT negotiations, where the impact of it thus far has been to create a lot of uncertainty, particularly in the supply-manage sector where many dairy farmers and people who come under those jurisdictions do not really know what the future holds. It makes their bankers nervous and they are nervous.

I would suggest that a lot of plans on those farms are on hold until GATT is resolved and we can hopefully secure our supply-manage system under GATT. The whole issue of these export subsidies, which have knocked great holes in the profit margins of grain farms, just has to be resolved, in my mind. It is going to be a tough challenge and the next couple of months will see whether it can be worked out or not.

Mr Phillips: On page 5 of your document I think you say that the $100-million credit program of the new government, if I read between the lines, will go a long way in the next year in helping your credit issue. Is that a fair conclusion?

Mr. George: It depends what we are talking about with the $100 million. If it was $100 million into an interest rate program, yes, that would indeed go a long way.

Mr Phillips: Is that not what is proposed in the document?

Mr. George: We are not sure what the $100 million means. If we are talking about $100 million of capital for long-term financing, $100 million is a drop in the ocean.

Mr Phillips: But up to $100 million would be made available, and it is under the interest relief program, so I assume—

Mr. Weaver: I think what Roger is saying is that details of how that is going to come out have been sketchy.

Mr Phillips: But it is just because it falls, as it does, in the Agenda for People, interest rate relief and up to $100 million would be available. I assume that is what is meant so that would help your credit issue.

Mr. George: The "up to" is the other critical thing. It could stop at $19 million, could it not?

Mr Phillips: No. Then the two things if signed, the GRIP program and the NISA program—I gather the negotiations on are well down the road, the 11 ministers I hear or thereabouts have signed it and that is what we would be watching for next.

Mr. George: I think the GRIP one is the one that is under control. That is ready to get cabinet approval from what I make of things. The NISA program is not quite so laid down yet and I would just ask members of the committee to pay particular attention to that and make sure that it does not fall off the rails because of any fiscal restraint. The only reason that NISA is still around in our debate—we have been talking about this thing for 12 months in Winnipeg—is because of its phenomenal ability to deal with what we call the whole farm issue over the long term. We have agriculture programs come and go. NISA has real potential to withstand the test of time and to withstand the test of trade challenges and all those things as it deals with the whole farm issue and with a farmer's individual accounts.

Mr Phillips: Right. I just have these questions, really. There is a big one and a little one. The little one is just again on the number, that each 1% increase in interest rates adds $9 million in interest charges to Ontario's farmers, whereas I kind of had this mental image of your debt being $4.6 billion, and 1% of 4.6 is not 9 in my mind. I just wondered how you reconcile that. That is my little question.

The big one is the one you touched on earlier. That is an image I have of the food processing business, that it is heading out of Ontario. That is an image I got, rightly or wrongly. Reading the free trade agreement, I think the prognosis was that if there was one industry going to be hit early it would be food processing. That does not necessarily mean the food producers are in trouble, but you would think there is at least a possibility, and I wonder—it may not be directly related to the budget, although it is indirectly—if the programs we are implementing are not going to help you long-term, if this other trend hurts you long term, if you could help us there.

The $9 million is the first question and the second one is, should we be really worried about food processing leaving or is there still a good market once they are gone?

Mr Bradley: I guess of the $4.5 to $5 billion in farm debts that is out there, approximately $1.9 billion of it is a floating rate, so as the bank rate is adjusted week to week and month to month, that flows through immediately and directly to interest expense. The balance of the debt is medium- and long-term debt, so it will only notch in at a higher rate if in fact it comes to term while those rates are high. But there is still money out in the farm community, long-term mortgage money at less than 10% and locked in for extended periods of time. Not all of the $4.5 to $5 billion in farm debt is at the current interest expense.

The food-processing-sector question, maybe Roger wants to take a—

Mr George: I think Bill wants to take a stab at it.

Mr Weaver: Well, just a couple of comments. I think in general, in the area I come from there are quite a number of food processors, a strong tomato belt, certainly in Kent and Essex counties, and we have seen one plant just shut down—Hunt-Wesson shut down—and the impact of that on neighbours and buying that they did in very recent years. Probably some or most of you have seen a tomato harvester out in the field, a $200,000 investment in a tomato harvester which cannot be used for anything else. So the impact of the Hunt-Wesson closing on I think about 12 producers has them scurrying around looking for contracts in a decreasing market, and some of them are not going to be able to receive that so it certainly does go right back to the producer.

A smaller example in Leamington was Heinz, I think, closing down a pickle run that was going to go completely to the States. I think we also see the attempt at efficiencies. When Nabisco shut down, a smaller plant in the Leamington area put an expansion in Dresden trying to be as efficient, be as competitive as possible.

I was at a dinner with the minister that was attended by some representatives from the food processing sector and one individual there was commenting to him about the need of the food processing sector to have some avenue perhaps for capital investment or enhanced capital investment opportunities for upgrading some of their plants. He was using the example—I cannot recall what it was—of one particular piece of equipment, very expensive, that would then allow them to maintain a market share in a particular product and at the same time allow the producers in the area to continue to produce that particular product. So there is certainly a need and we are sitting here talking about agriculture. We have realized the need to expand that into the needs of our customers and people we work with very closely in the food processing sector.

Mr George: I would just like to add to that, also never forget that the raw product, the tomatoes or the wheat or whatever, is a relatively small part of the cost of that product when it gets on to the supermarket shelves. Very clearly, a lot of our processors are up against other issues like higher energy costs, higher labour costs, the higher cost of doing business in Canada, period, vis-à-vis their competitors. I would say that has become a more major question in my mind, what the federal and provincial governments can do to make not only the food processing industry but any of our industries more competitive rather than worrying about whether a supply-managed chicken costs more money than it would in the States. So, I think that is something we should bear in mind, because that obviously has an impact way, way beyond agriculture.

Mr Phillips: I agree with that. I just wondered if this is an industry which is moving faster than other manufacturing industries and whether that should be cause for concern, because you people know it far better than we do, but you are saying—

Mr Weaver: There is a definite concern, obviously, in terms of affecting us. They realize the need to modernize, be competitive. It is affecting us on this year's products, I am sure.

Mrs Sullivan: You have not raised these issues in the paper, but I thought you might want to have an opportunity to underline your views of the land stewardship program which, certainly in my community, is an extremely popular and well taken up program. In the budget consultative process, you might want to get something on the table about it.

Mr George: We are very positive about all efforts in land stewardship, as I think there has been a growing awareness in the farm community about land stewardship. Whatever governments can do to help farmers to understand new technology and work with it, then, that is good. I do not think it is supposed to be downsized.

Mrs Sullivan: I had a sense that there would have been a lot more farmers involved had the program been larger.

Mr George: Sure. I mean, we keep coming back you time and time again saying, "Well, great, put another $30 million into the thing, sure."

Mr Weaver: One of the frustrations with that as is that we made applications, made some decisions on it and then because of the size of the budget and because of the popularity of the program, people saw the need for a land stewardship program. Then they came back and they were apportioned a certain percentage of that. I mean, again, personally we made a decision expecting a certain amount of money coming out of that, I guess even 60% of that, which startled some people. That is the way we have to move with the environmental pressures, we understand that, and that is the way it should be, ample economic returns for the farmer. It is one of the things that encourages and allows him to do the things that he should, rather than the things that he will have to do to survive for another year. So I think the two things do run together, the economics of it and the land stewardship program.

The Chair: I would like to thank you on behalf of the committee for your presentation on a very important sector of the economy.

Mr Sullivan: Mr Chairman, with your permission, just a couple of points. The first is, we appreciate again the opportunity to come before your committee. It is an absolutely crucial committee of the Legislature for an organization like the OFA. Again, it is a $40-billion-plus industry, the second-largest economic sector in the province. It is absolutely crucial that this committee be aware of that.

The OFA itself is the largest general farm organization in the country. We meet on a monthly basis. The board of directors of 135 is larger than the Legislative Assembly. They are open meetings. We would encourage any member at any time to be in touch with the OFA. It is a very complex organization that attempts to arrive at a consensus on agricultural policy for the province and advise members of the House, ministers of the crown.

It is, again, a process that includes nearly 30 commodity organizations, some of the largest commodity organizations in this country, many of them world class; independent regional or county federations of agriculturalists are represented on the board. The Women's Institute Women's Farm Network are soon to be involved. There are others knocking at the door to be a part of the process.

We would welcome members of the House, of all parties, as we meet with you on at least an annual basis at your caucuses, to share with you the vision of agriculture, to take advantage of the opportunity of working with OFA. We are right here in Toronto. The board meetings on a monthly basis are always held in Toronto. Any member of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario is always welcome to our board meetings. We would be delighted to have you there and share with you some of the struggles that face the farm families of Ontario. This committee is very important to us. Soon—next month—we will meet with Mr. Laughren as Treasurer.

I know that the stories you have heard in this room are tough stories from a variety of sectors in the Ontario economy, whether it is in health care or education or social services, but agriculture is crucial to the health and vitality of Ontario's economy. We would want to thank you again for that opportunity and pledge to you our willingness to work with all members of the House and all parties to advance the cause of farming and strengthen the economy of Ontario. So, thank you very much, Mr Chairman, for this opportunity.

The Chair: Thank you. The committee is adjourned until 1:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1237.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1339 in committee room 2.

MINISTRY OF COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES

The Chair: We have a rather heavy schedule for this afternoon. I would like to welcome Dr Brzustowski, deputy minister on the card, but I understand a new position.

Dr Brzustowski: The card is good for four more days.

The Chair: I would like you to begin if you would, sir.

Dr Brzustowski: Thank you very much. Let me first of all express my appreciation that the standing committee on finance and economic affairs should take an interest in the state of university and college funding in particular. I welcome that interest, because I think these institutions represent an instrument by which we make an investment in the future. The more people in government consider more broadly the investment in the future in the people who go through those institutions, the better Ontario will be served.

I would like to make my presentation basically in two parts. First, I would like very quickly to hit the highlights of the material that was distributed—this is the package that was distributed—which I think might provide some useful information and useful insights into the system and how it operates. In addition, I have distributed just recently a much more detailed brochure of statistics. You might find later that there are questions that some of the information in there raises. Please feel free to contact me or anybody in the ministry for answers.

In the second part of my presentation, if you allow it, Mr Chairman, I thought I would spend just a few minutes looking into the future and suggesting ways—maybe not even ways—suggesting issues of finance and economics for which we have to prepare ourselves. They are in the post-secondary sector. If you agree, I would be pleased to proceed on that basis.

Let's begin with an indication of how large the system is. I will turn to the third page of the handout, the one called "System Overview." The post-secondary system in Ontario is really quite diverse. It has 15 institutions that we call universities, and in fact if you include certain others in that grouping, the number rises to 22—I will just mention those very briefly in a second—and at the moment 23 community colleges.

The universities range from a very large university which is a few hundred yards from us, which has advanced work, graduate study and research in most of the traditional disciplines, in fact all of the traditional disciplines, right down to very small institutions such as Lakehead University and Laurentian University in the north which specialize rather more.

The universities, I think, are experiencing what is almost now a decade and a half of growth. They are still growing and now have an enrolment—the numbers are in the table here, but I would like committee members simply to think in general numbers—of about 200,000 full-time students in the universities. It is a little more than that, but if you think of 200,000 full-time students in the universities and 100,000 part-time, these are nice, round numbers work with.

The colleges, on the other side, are much more complicated institutions. Our colleges are quite different from almost all the other college systems in Canada. They are different from the CEGEP in Quebec; they are different from the transfer institutions in the west. I like to think of them as teaching enterprises which cover everything from post-secondary courses leading to diplomas in various fields, including advanced technologies, right through institutions which provide basic life skills to people who are being helped by government through various assistance programs.

The numbers in the table are in a sense a little bit misleading, because they underplay one role of the colleges. The number 217,000 listed for part-time students for part-time students taking post-secondary programs. We estimate that there are another 400,000 people taking non-credit part-time studies at the colleges. If you inflate the numbers by that amount, then in the total you would see that something in the order of one million Ontarians each year are clients of the post-secondary system, either universities or colleges, either full-time or part-time.

The system is supported through two sources of revenues. One is the operating grants from the government of Ontario, and the numbers are indicated here, something in the order of $1.8 billion for the universities and approaching $800 million for the colleges annually. In addition there are tuition fees paid by students. Although that number is not explicit on this page, the tuition revenue is in the order of $500 million per year, about $400 million plus on the university side, $100 million or so on the college side. So half a billion roughly in tuition fees, something in the order of $2.6 billion in transfers from government and fund of about $110 million in capital, as you can see.

One of the points that is often made by the institutions in approaching government is illustrated on the first chart which is on the next page, "The Ontario Government Budget Dollar: Expenditure Forecast 1990-91." The point that is often made by the institutions is that in the spending of government dollars the post-secondary sector is at a lower level now than it once was, and there are explanations for that. Nevertheless, we see here that of the expenditure dollar, 19 cents are devoted to education and of those 7 might be listed in the post-secondary area, including 1 cent for skills development. I list that among the post-secondary activities because it does involve the colleges as well.

Now, whether that number is the right number, whether the historical trend is justified, these are moot issues. One can formulate policy on many bases, but the fact is that the percentage of provincial revenues devoted to post-secondary education has been declining and the colleges and universities of this province frequently remind government that that is the case.

If I may turn to the first bar chart, this is the way that the expenditures of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities are broken out by the categories I used in the estimate process. The point I would like to make is that student support is quite a significant amount; in fact, it is $220 million in 1991. That amount of student support is taken by about 100,000 students, and that amount represents the cost to the province of Ontario of providing, as you will see later, almost twice that amount of support, given that some of it is in loans. So about 100,000 of those 200,000 full-time, post-secondary students receive financial support through OSAP. The Ontario student assistance program is actually an umbrella of a number of programs, and I will touch those.

You can see from this particular presentation that university support, which includes capital and includes the cost of running the programs, college support likewise and student support dwarf the amount spent on administration in the ministry. I must say I am very proud of that at times like this when I am meeting with a committee. The ministry in fact does transfer over 99% of its total budget to the institutions and to individuals.

There are times when I am less satisfied with that process and that is when we are asked to do things which require resources, because this particular ministry is very inefficient. It may be some measure of efficiency in government, and if it is, then MCU takes first place. My colleagues enjoy my boasting about that. They feel things would be better if we transferred less and had more people to carry the load, but that is how it is.

The next chart shows the breakout of the sources of operating funding available to the institutions. Now I would, to explain these charts, point out that the colleges engage not only in post-secondary programs funded by the Government of Ontario and by student tuition, but also in programs under the Canadian Jobs Strategy which attract some federal funding. They also do some small amount of teaching and training which attracts industrial funding. So there is a substantial "other" category, but most of that would be federal dollars in the CJS.

On the university side, most of that "other" category would also be federal dollars and it would be federal dollars tied with the research activities of the institutions. You can see that in the case of the universities tuition is a much larger percentage of the total than in the colleges and the "other" source of revenues is much smaller.

I am sure you are aware that there has been a lot of discussion about tuition fees, and much has been written and much has been said and much has been carried on pocket signs on that subject. If you look at this diagram, there is a useful conclusion that one can draw: simply that to increase college revenues by 1% one would have to increase tuition by 10% because tuition represents one-ninth of college revenues. On the university side it is very close to needing to increase tuition by 5% to increase revenues by 1%. There is that difference in the multiplier. Whenever discussions of tuition are being entertained, I find it very useful to keep in mind this ten-to-one multiplier for the colleges and the five-to-one multiplier for the universities.

I mentioned at the outset that the post-secondary system has been experiencing growth. In the bar graph the number of full-time students illustrates that for both the universities and the colleges. The colleges have shown a spurt of growth just in the last couple of years; in fact, the growth this current year has been something in the order of 5.6%. The universities, as long as I can remember—and that is getting on to about 15 to 20 years now—in projections of enrolment, the enrolment was always going to decline after another two years. It never has. It has continued to grow; there have been plateaus where the growth was slower. A diagram such as this really flattens the presentation, it does not allow you to pick out the plateaus.

Nevertheless, more and more of our young people are choosing to go to universities. It almost seems that the bachelor's degree has become an aspiration for a very large number of people, somewhat parallel to what might have been among my classmates at the time when I was finishing high school, grade 12. One could get quite a decent job at that time—I am sure this dates me—with grade 12. In fact, jobs with career paths were open to people from that level.

These days, I think almost any full-time job requires at least grade 12, maybe some post-secondary, and a job with a career path that is visible requires rather more than that. A lot of employers are telling us that they simply do not hire people who do not have diplomas from the colleges or degrees from the universities, and that is a phenomenon which seems to be taking hold more strongly.

I cannot make any prediction that I would have faith in of what will happen to enrolment in the universities and colleges, and one of the reasons for that is that a component reflects immigration. A lot of our recent arrivals place a great value on post-secondary education, and their participation rates tend to be as high as their wealth allows.

Most recently, there has been just a tremendous growth in the participation rate of women in all sorts of university programs, with the exception of the professional programs in technology and engineering. But even there, the growth has been much greater than historical. There has been a growth in the participation rate of students from rural areas, and again it is hard to explain that. Nobody predicted it. It is hard enough to explain after the fact.

I see no basis for any firm prediction that this period of growth will end in some magic way. In fact, I think that if one looks around at the various equity measures that have been implemented and additional ones that are being proposed, not only to provide access to the post-secondary system but to provide access and a successful completion of a program, then when those measures succeed, as I am sure they will, participation rates will increase even further and the enrolments will reflect that.

I think that there will be many, many factors which will contribute to changes in enrolment, I expect to a growth in enrolment in both colleges and universities, and not the least of this will be the success of various social measures designed to promote participation. So, Mr Chairman and committee members, please do not look for a flattening of this sequence of bars. I do not think it will happen.

The next figure, showing operating grants for a full-time equivalent student, is something which is a fact. These are operating grants expressed in constant dollars.

They indicate in a way which is quite unmistakable that the purchasing power of the institutions per full-time equivalent student has been decreasing. There was a period of quite pronounced decrease—there has been some recovery since—but in fact the levels in 1988-89 are still substantially lower than they were in 1978-79. One could say a great deal about this. One could say, for example, that there must be some benefits of scale in this. One can also put a counterargument for it that against the economies of scale there are the diseconomies of complexity. Let me give you an example.

A full-time equivalent student represents five part-time students. A full-time student, a single student, will have one admission decision, one program decision, one file in the registrar's office. The five part-time students will have five program decisions, five admission decisions and then five files maintained. The complexity is increasing. One could always say that there is some absolute standard against which one could measure the operating funds provided per full-time student. I really tend not to believe that. I think the people look at incremental year-over-year changes.

Education is a sector in which I believe there are really no normative costs. There are expenses, because one can always trade off quality by whatever measure in what one does, so it is possible to teach a course with 30 students in it; it is possible to have 60 students in there; it is possible to have 200 students in there. What you cannot measure is the output, the quality of the educational experience. That remains one of the great imponderables in the whole area of education finance. I think the best one can do is to compare ourselves with other jurisdictions, preferably ones where we have to compete economically, and those comparisons show that this decline has been too severe, that Ontario's place has slipped in the ranking of the Canadian provinces in the funding for full-time.

The next diagram illustrates that in a way which is quite unmistakable, because this diagram in effect expresses what I just finished saying. These are operating grants to universities per full-time equivalent student, 1977-78 to 1988-89, in constant dollars. The solid line at the bottom of this array is the Ontario performance. The dotted line in the middle of the array is the national average, including Ontario, and the top dotted line is the average of the other nine provinces. These are facts, these are figures that have been assembled with some care. I do not think anybody disputes the figures. This is what they are.

The next chart makes the comparison within Ontario, and it looks at various sectors and looks at an index of expenditures per client served. The language was changed; it would be a little difficult to talk about FTE patients or something of that sort in hospitals, so the language was changed. This is an index of expenditures per client served in constant dollars.

The interesting thing is that you can see that the costs have risen in the hospitals and the schools, they dipped and rose in the treatment of adult offenders, they have declined rather more continuously in the matter of universities and declined quite precipitously, with some recovery, in the colleges.

I suppose one can always look at a diagram like this and explain all the components that go into it, but such a picture does raise interesting questions of public policy. In terms of public policy, is this what the ranking should be? I hope that the committee members will note this particular item of information and maybe devote some of your attention to it.

At this point, if there are any questions on the number, I would be most happy to fill anybody in before we go to what seems to be a somewhat different set of issues on the next page.

The Chair: Are there any questions?

Mr Curling: The recession places a heavy burden on the colleges and universities, meaning that instead of finding work now people go back to school. You expect the enrolment to increase more now, do you?

Dr Brzustowski: Yes, I think there will be pressure for people to go back and maybe finish off programs that they had not finished before or to acquire new skills. Yes, indeed.

Mr Curling: Are your figures in any way in your presentation for your next budget making provision for that, or has that been indicated in your budget?

Dr Brzustowski: To the extent that one can, yes, I think that our presentation for the next budget will reflect that as a pressure.

Mr Curling: My last question: Would you say that the colleges suffered more from receiving less money than the universities over the years, in the last 10 years?

Dr Brzustowski: I think it is evident from the figures I looked at just recently that the funding available per client served or per FTE student declined much more deeply in the colleges than in the universities.

Mr Curling: My real last question: The money that is given to the colleges is less, as you said; psychologically would it not be more—let me put it another way. The clients that are served in colleges are really on the sort of survival base of getting better jobs. In universities, let's say that the students have acquired good academic skills and would survive. I do not know how you would put a ratio to that. If $1 was cut from the college and $5 cut from the university, it would serve a more severe blow there for those.

Dr Brzustowski: It would be a larger fraction of the total operation. As you can see in the trend that I just mentioned, in fact the two lines are converging. The colleges are being brought much closer to the universities.

I do not have the figures in front of me and I do not have a chart, but committee members might find it interesting that—these are very difficult numbers to get—but I think if one took, for the high schools, the sum of the provincial funding plus the municipal funding per student you would find that that total is greater than it is for a student in the colleges. That was the case in the last year for which we were able to document that, which was about three or four years ago. I have not seen anything happen since that would make that situation change.

Mr Phillips: Just because I am not sure what comes next, just to maybe get the questions out, I have a variety of things. I know in your new role you are going to be interested in science and technology and those sorts of things, can you provide us with any advice in terms of what things we should be thinking about financially to accomplish that objective?

The second thing is, I gather that to bring Ontario up to the national average in grants per student might be a minimum of $500 per student, if I can read the charts right. Is that roughly the number and how much money is that?

The third is just any advice you could give us in terms of how we should view enrolment in our schools. My collection is that about one third of the students do not finish secondary school, one third do but do not finish post-secondary, and a third finish post-secondary. Should we be thinking of whether that is something that is way out of line with what we should be thinking of as a society? If so, that would, I guess, argue for more resources to be placed somewhere in this post-secondary stream.

Dr Brzustowski: Thank you for those questions. If I may, could I take the last one first, because really that is what I wanted to talk about in this final little part of my presentation.

I believe that by the end of the decade or perhaps before that, for reasons of our survival in many dimensions, for economic survival, our cultural survival, perhaps our physical survival vis-à-vis the environment, even our psychological survival as individuals, we may need to have a much larger participation rate in post-secondary education than we have now.

Today's figures show, as Mr Phillips has indicated, that about a third finish post-secondary. At the input end, about 60% of those who register in grade 9 show up in post-secondary education, either in college or university, at the end of their stay in high school. With the equity measures that we are promoting, that is, that all groups in our society should find equal representation and an equitable representation of outcomes in our post-secondary system, and the fact that we will need new skills in new areas, many of which we cannot quite yet predict but many of which we can, I think it would be not unrealistic at all to expect that we should have something like 60% of our students proceeding to post-secondary education.

Mr Phillips: Proceeding or completing?

Dr Brzustowski: Initially I will say proceeding.

Mr Phillips: I am sorry. Do 60% not proceed right now?

Dr Brzustowski: They do not right now. The reason I say proceeding is that I think we will be very inventive in the ways in which we will make it easier for people, regardless of where they are in the high school system and whether their aptitude is academic or towards more the vocational side of education, to link up with post-secondary education, maybe not initially or immediately, but eventually.

There are various articulation agreements being developed between school boards, on the one hand, and colleges, on the other, to make that happen, to make it easier. I think that a combination of people coming back in, people proceeding directly, people completing, people perhaps returning to complete, all of that could conceivably increase our enrolments in post-secondary education by as much as 50%. I do not think I am taking a great chance by saying that I expect this by the end of the decade. It may in fact have to arrive sooner.

What that faces this system with in the framework of government funding is qualitative change in funding. I mean, you do not find a 50% increase of provincial funding at the level of a couple of billion dollars through sort of minor incremental changes such as this system has enjoyed over the last couple of decades. Thinking will have to change. I do not know how it will have to change, but I expect it will have to change in response to that situation.

Coming back to your earlier question, Mr Phillips, I think something in the order of $600 or $700 per student would bring us much closer to the average. Multiply that by 200,000 students and the numbers become significant.

Mr Phillips: What is that anyway?

Dr Brzustowski: About $120 million.

Mr Phillips: I am never sure where the decimal goes.

Dr Brzustowski: That is where it goes.

Mr Phillips: My third question, just to test me on whether I remember these things: In regard to the science and technology, which I believe is the old Premier's Council recommendation and one that seems to be kind of important, is there any advice we should be thinking about for the ministry in that?

1410

Dr Brzustowski: Yes. I think this committee should encourage not just government but in fact the people of the province to begin to think about status and recognition according to skills in a more realistic way. The Chairman and I were chatting earlier, and if we compare ourselves with the experience in Baden-Württemberg in Germany, where a master craftsman has much higher social recognition and social status, so much so that it becomes quite a respectable and in fact treasured aspiration in some families to have the son or daughter become a master craftsman, we do not seem to have that. We seem to be unwilling to recognize anything other than the highest credential one can get.

I do not know what the pressures are on that, but there are pressures, for example, on all of the programs in the colleges and universities to increase the level of credential which one needs to enter into practice. Some of that would reflect having to have more knowledge. Some of it, though, reflects a set of attitudes. I think this is a problem in Ontario which we have to somehow get our minds around.

But we should provide incentives to individuals, make it attractive for individuals, reward them in terms of recognition by society when they become expert in a whole host of things, not just university-level programs, but modern trades and a number of disciplines which perhaps require a very eclectic kind of education which might not be found in existing programs or whatever.

We have to recognize skills in those areas where we need skills. We cannot afford a mismatch between the needs of the economy, on the one hand, and the choices made by individuals for programs of education, on the other, when that mismatch is driven by almost irrelevant perceptions of status and social recognition.

I feel strongly about this. I am not able to express this in as compelling a way as I feel it, but I really do believe that if we are going to compete with countries in which appropriate skills are prized and expertise is rewarded with social status, then we must begin to do the same thing ourselves.

Mr Phillips: I agree with that and I do not think we have even begun to scratch the surface on that. I know on the Premier's Council we talked about that and I do not think even the start of that has yet occurred, but I personally believe that in about three years there will be quite a mindset change in the province.

Dr Brzustowski: I hope you are right.

Mr Phillips: It will be driven because of something you do not like, which is an economic—

Dr Brzustowski: Yes, that well may be.

Mr Sutherland: Talking about growth rates in enrolment, I am just wondering about the physical capacities of our post-secondary education institutions to handle growth rates. You mentioned several and you did not even mention part-time mature students as the group where I think we are going to see the largest growth.

When I stop and think that two universities—the University of Toronto has just completed a $100-million fund-raising campaign and the University of Western Ontario close to $90 million, yet even though they are raising those types of sums from the private sector, mainly for buildings, it still seems that we are not going to have the capacity to meet the growing demand. Where are the ministry's projections in that area?

Dr Brzustowski: I hope I do not sound outrageous, because the question is an important one, but I think capital is not the problem. I say this for this reason, that at the moment there is construction going on in the university system of a total value of about $270 million, $280 million. There was a program of $40 million over four years called the special enrolment accommodation program in which money was provided very quickly for alterations of the use of space to accommodate the influx of undergraduates, temporary space being created, space being converted to teaching use.

The ingenuity shown by people in the institutions in this area is quite remarkable, and they have not even begun to explore the flexibility offered by expanding the teaching schedule into longer times. Perhaps, you know, you could expand your capacity by 10% by teaching Saturday mornings, for example, in terms of labs and things of that sort. The problem will be that on the human resource side. The problem will be a shortage of people to teach. The problem will be finding those individuals who have both the qualifications in the subject and a willingness to take jobs in these institutions.

A teaching job in post-secondary education in Ontario these days is not a reward from heaven. The workloads are quite heavy. The conditions are conditions under which one has to deal with very large numbers of students. There is not a great deal of administrative support. These are tough jobs. I will venture to say that we will have to compete with the rest of the English-speaking world, particularly with the United States, just to maintain our own base of people who are prospects now, let alone get the additional people. The human resource side is going to be the problem, not the capital. The capital we can solve. There is a lot of ingenuity out there.

Mr Sutherland: I wonder if you could comment. It just came out of the post-secondary system last year, but I have a feeling and see it happening more right now with a lot of these property tax coalitions growing within the province. It is something that I think affects both Colleges and Universities and Education. Do we have a real problem in terms of public understanding in terms of what the costs to run post-secondary education or education in general and how we compare, how Canada and Ontario compare with other jurisdictions?

Dr Brzustowski: I can offer only opinions on this. They may sound very uninformed, but I will try. I think that because the post-secondary system is so much farther removed from the municipal ratepayer that it is not a personal issue. It is not an issue dealt with by locally elected representatives right in front of the people. That degree of remoteness, I think, removes the pressure. One tends to think of these institutions as being for a more select group. No matter what the criteria of selection are, it is a more select group. In fact, another useful number is that in Ontario we have 1.2 million students in elementary schools, half of that, 600,000, in secondary; half of that, 300,000, in post-secondary. That is the extent of selection, right down to that level.

Mr Phillips: Part of that is number of years.

Dr Brzustowski: Oh, indeed. Oh, yes, it is just the numbers of people in the system, of course. I am not talking of through-puts; I am talking of the numbers of students enrolled. I do not think people are aware of what the costs are, except maybe those who are in communities that depend heavily on university incomes. Take a small place like Waterloo, which has two universities. Both the student spending and the payroll in the community are very much affected. I think that community would be rather more conscious of the economic impact than anybody else. But in terms of the public having a sense of what the spending is now and what it should be, I would be very surprised there were crisp perceptions on that point.

Mr Sutherland: I have one other question, sort of an efficiency question but looking more at the human side. I am getting a sense that you hear, certainly, stories—it is hard to get facts—on dropout rates in first year in post-secondary education. When we are looking at costs and looking at trying to get a handle on that, I was wondering if you have a sense of how we compare with other countries in that area. What directions is the ministry taking to try to deal with that issue so we have a much lower dropout rate?

I know that at university there seem to be many students coming in who feel under a great deal of pressure to succeed while they are there. I think that may be related to cost and other pressures. There seems to be a higher dropout rate in specific programs, and then in other programs it is a question of deliberate attempts to squeeze people out. Are we creating the wrong perception to people when we are saying, "Come and go for this program, but by year two we only want half of you anyway"?

Dr Brzustowski: This will date me again, but I remember sitting in a classroom maybe 300 yards from here and being told by the professor in my first-year class: "Look to the left. Look to the right. One of you three will be here at the end, but not all of you." Let me try to deal with this in a number of ways.

First of all, the dropout rates are much higher in the colleges than in the universities. One of the reasons this is the case is simply the preparation with which people come to the colleges. There are a number of colleges that have started programs in which they take the first term to prepare students for life in a post-secondary institution, giving them some study skills, doing any remedial teaching that needs to be done in communications, in writing, in whatever. The failure rate of those people who choose a program after completing such a term is much lower. In fact, in some colleges it is the greatest single source of increasing enrolments. So that kind of problem can be dealt with. I think what the ministry will be doing to the extent of its abilities is providing resources for such remedial teaching.

At the university level, it almost varies by institution. There are some institutions that have as part of their educational philosophy that they assign senior and experienced faculty members to teach the first year. This is done particularly in some professional programs, with quite startling effects on dropout rates. It is perhaps not something that all the institutions can do, because sometimes the people who are most experienced in a discipline are not the best people for handling a class of 200 individuals who have just appeared in post-secondary education for the first time. A lot of the measures of that kind are in place. More will be in place; I am quite sure of that.

In terms of comparisons with other jurisdictions, they vary all over the map. The experience is absolutely awful in places like the University of Houston's system, where by law everybody who completes high school in the state must be admitted. Their failure rates in first year are of the order of 70%. The toll that takes in human dimensions, motivation, time lost, effort lost, discouragement for future life must be just dreadful. I am very proud to say that we have nothing approaching that. Mind you, we do not have the same requirement either.

There are studies being done recently in Ontario which are suggesting that a very large percentage of the dropouts, a disproportionate number of the dropouts comes from those people who enter in maybe the lowest 10% or 15% of the students who have been admitted to the institution. In any case, it is a conclusion that almost seems obvious after the fact, that somehow the marks do reflect preparation.

When one is moved from a system where there is a lot of individual attention to a system where one is on one's own, perhaps among 200 other people who are also on their own, being able to motivate oneself, being able to study independently, are just crucial skills. Not all of our high school students have acquired those, obviously. Some remedial, some resource-centred programs, learning resource centre facilities help.

The Chair: I would like to interrupt just from the point of view that while this is a very interesting conversation, it does not really go in the direction of giving us any indication of pre-budgetary information. I do not normally do this, but we are running a little bit short of time. We do have the minister coming in who is on a tight schedule.

Mr Sutherland: Sure. I just wanted to ask about whether more resources needed to be put in that area, but I think I have got it answered.

The Chair: I do not mean to cut everybody else off. I hope there will be time at the end, but perhaps you could move through the other recommendations you are making.

Dr Brzustowski: I could speed up. On the page labelled "Pressures," I invite you simply to consider two or three pressures in particular that have arisen that are pressures on university operating grants. Some of them are additional costs mandated by government action. Others are such things as deferred maintenance. It has not been possible for all institutions to maintain their buildings over the years. They just have not had the money. That is becoming a problem.

Faculty renewal is the whole issue of looking now for young faculty members to replace those who will be retiring. I expect you will be hearing a great deal about that issue over the next little while. In most of the subject areas in Ontario universities, 20% of the existing faculty will leave by retirement about two thirds of the way through this decade and 50% within the first decade of the next century. We are talking about thousands of people at a very high level: professoriates, about 20,000 people.

On the next page, "Ontario student assistance program, OSAP, An Umbrella," the key elements are that it is a program of assistance. It is based on financial need. It has a number of components. In Ontario alone among provinces people who demonstrate need receive the grant first. When they have reached the limit of the grant, they receive the Canada student loan which we administer for Canada, up to the limit of that. If they still qualify for additional need, they get an Ontario student loan after that. The $410 million of support offered to 100,000 students comes at a cost of slightly over $200 million to the province, of which maybe $170 million to $180 million is grants. The rest would be interest paid on behalf of students on their loans.

The next page just has one or two bullet points about the program. Some of the issues: People are eligible only for eight grant periods. A grant period is a term of study. This is perhaps the one aspect of OSAP which is criticized the most because it does not allow people to go into graduate work and get OSAP. It really also makes people use up their eligibility periods if they have studied at the post-secondary level anywhere else, not just in Ontario. So if somebody comes in with an honours bachelor's degree earned in India, say, in four years of study, that person is not eligible for student assistance under OSAP. At the moment this is the single most criticized aspect of the policy of OSAP.

The ministry still has these problems, not because nobody has had the wit to see that they needed fixing, but simply because the money has not been available and other things were greater priorities within OSAP even. The assumption of a family contribution becomes controversial. There will be a major policy review on the threshold, the level of income up to which the maximum OSAP assistance can be provided.

Finally, committee members undoubtedly have seen some of the publicity surrounding the Council of Ontario Universities' recovery plan. This is on the second to last page. This was a plan put forward to the minister in the last couple of months and it is a proposal from the universities collectively that they need to find an additional $410 million a year, at maturity, in grants. This would be something which would in fact bring the province to the national average and somewhat beyond. The proposal is that this be made up of an increase in grants and tuition fees.

I should tell you that just about all the stakeholders and the minister's advisory council agree that the funding problem, in terms of the quality of service that can be offered and the amount of service that can be offered in the universities, is of the order of several hundred million dollars. Everybody agrees on that, the Ontario Council on University Affairs, the Council of Ontario Universities, the Ontario Federation of Students, the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations.

I think there is agreement that we are talking about a problem right now which needs, in two or three years' time, an increase of about $400 million a year in the annual grant. This proposal has a component which is a government grant increase and a tuition fee increase, and since it has been discussed so widely in the media, I thought I would simply inform committee members of it.

It has been brought to the ministry. It has been presented to the minister. It is on the table as a proposal that has come from the system. There have been other proposals, including the proposal from the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations, that fees be dropped entirely, and that is on the table too.

You can see that the stakeholders have a keen interest in doing something about revenues in the university and college system. They do not as yet agree on what should be done about that. If I may, I would stop here and would be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chair: I have three questions. I notice the minister has arrived and we know she is on a tight schedule, so perhaps we could have the three quick questions from Ms Ward, Mr Fletcher and Mrs Sullivan.

Ms M. Ward: I have just one question. The difference between the grants for the universities and the colleges is about $1,000, which is fairly significant. Is that justified in terms of costs or does it have more of an historical basis?

Dr Brzustowski: There is a very significant area of activity in which the universities have responsibilities and the colleges do not, and that is research. The federal granting councils provide grants, but not the indirect costs of research, so the provincial grants must pick up those. That is the largest reason for the difference.

Ms M. Ward: So it is justified on a cost basis?

Dr Brzustowski: Yes.

Mr Fletcher: I will hold mine, thank you.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to ask about OSAP, just briefly. Was the program changed to take more into account the needs of people who are leaving the workforce and need to go back into the school system for retraining and are now able to meet the criterion, including because of family home ownership or because the assumption of family contribution means that the family would have to bankrupt itself before a breadwinner could go back into the system? What kind of analysis have you done on needs upgrading to meet the needs of returning students and the impact that would have on your budgetary request?

Dr Brzustowski: The ministry staff up in Thunder Bay, because that is where these people are, have analysed a number of options of extending those to more and more people in need. They tend to come in $10-million chunks. It is not as good an answer as I would like to give you, but we are talking about—to do, for example, what you suggest, to allow the threshold to be much higher for people who find themselves unemployed, we are probably talking about something between $5 million and $10 million to make it significant for a number of people, enough to make a difference, that kind of range.

Mrs Sullivan: But in a program that costs $270 million to the province to deliver $410 million, $5 million peanuts.

Dr Brzustowski: It is $220 million. Yes, I quite agree with that. One still has to get it in the allocations.

Mr Curling: Just a quick question: I notice that no mention of counselling was in your presentation at that moment. Pressures: Over the years at the colleges, I suppose the dropout rates are indicative of the fact that proper counselling or proper guidance are not given there. Was that one of your pressures?

Dr Brzustowski: It is very much a part of the strategies being developed to handle the dropout rates explicitly.

The Chair: We do have a couple of minutes. I have been informed that the minister is waiting for the deputy minister, so I will allow the questions that Mr Fletcher graciously ceded.

Mr Fletcher: I have a question about colleges and your vision of what colleges should be. I know it is your own vision and not just a model there either. I was just wondering, has Colleges and Universities started the process of moving towards perhaps polytechnical institutes instead of what we have?

Dr Brzustowski: They have started a process of moving together and the impetus for that has been most recently the work done prior to the publication of Vision 2000 which really advocates it. For all sorts of good reasons, the tutions should get closer together and that is happening. It is happening between existing institutions.

Mr Fletcher: Such as Conestoga College moving towards, let's say, Doon campus in the Kitchener area.

Mr Fletcher: Moving all the campuses to that area.

Dr Brzustowski: And Conestoga College collaborating much more closely in certain programs with the University of Waterloo or with Wilfrid Laurier University. That is happening.

Mr Fletcher: What happens to accessibility when you do that? Does that not create more expense for people who have to travel to the campus and perhaps even the residences?

Dr Brzustowski: Let me take that in pieces. The collaboration among institutions generally begins with institutions moving to make it easier for students to do something which they have thought up in the first place. It is amazing how inventive students are in this. I think we should take pride in not having put up impenetrable barriers. There are about 3,000 university graduates who are now finishing off with college diplomas. Nobody invented such a program, nobody designed it. It makes a lot of sense—a general education, technical specialty—we just did not do it.

But the whole business of making college programs more attractive and specializing—but this college, because it is close to this university, has a very special program—has the implication which you mentioned. The colleges have been community institutions heretofore and have not had residences. But if such specialties arise, they will have residences because they will attract people from a greater distance. So there are implications for accessibility, absolutely.

Mr Jamison: I would just like to address the area of skills development. We talked about a mindset, the change in mindset, what was considered to be a profile development in the future. How much does the co-operative effort pay? I know it is funding in the sense of technology, how technology is advancing in the workplace. How much does co-operative effort bring players together and so forth related to funding?

Dr Brzustowski: I would say that nothing short of a very intensive and sincere co-operation among all the players, right from educational institutions, through labour, through the business community, is going to make these changes; nothing short of that. I think Mr Phillips is right that there have been words on this, but it is hard to see actions. There are individual actions, and one can point to a pocket here or a pocket there where it has happened, but think in terms of a massive change in attitude, nothing short of a real partnership where all parties recognize that this is a common interest will do it. I would hope some of this can start happening, and the sooner the better. I do not give prescriptions, but I have that hope.

The Chair: Thank you for making your presentation this afternoon.

Dr Brzustowski: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I appreciate the chance to speak to the committee.

The Chair: Just an announcement to the committee that the Treasurer has confirmed that he will be present on Thursday from 12:30 to 1:30. We have also requested, if it is possible, for him to bring the third-quarter figures.

Mr Phillips: I do not think it is worth while being here unless he does have them with him, so I just assume they will be available. That is the whole basis on which we set the date this morning. Is that the case, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: I have not had any confirmation that he has the numbers.

Mr Phillips: I am just saying to you that the whole reason for his coming, or the major reason, is so that we have some idea of revenue. He announced last week in the media that the results would be available this week. I sent you a note saying I do not think it is worth while meeting—if we can meet him the next day when he has the numbers, that makes sense, but to go through it and then to release the figures a day later, we are wasting our time.

The Chair: I can pass that along and we can make sure. If he does not have the numbers, then we can discuss what we will do. We have another meeting this week.

MINISTRY OF EDUCATION

The Chair: We have with us today the Minister of Education, the Honourable Marion Boyd; Robert Mitton, the deputy minister; Mark Larratt-Smith, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Education, and it looks like there are a few more.

Hon Mrs Boyd: And a cast of thousands.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for coming and giving us a presentation on what we can expect or what you might be looking for in terms of pre-budgetary consultation.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I would like to just begin by saying that we felt it was really valuable for the committee to have some background information on the funding of elementary and secondary education in Ontario. It is fairly complex and it is important for people to understand the education funding model that is currently in place and for us to be able to demonstrate the kinds of pressures that are on that current funding model.

For the first part of the presentation, Mr Mitton is going to do a total finance overview and Mr Larratt-Smith will talk about the operating system and the capital system, and then we will identify some of our general pressures.

Mr Mitton: In a very general way, we collect money for education from two sources, one from the general revenue pot of the provincial government, and school boards are given the authority to collect education funds from the local property tax base. So that is how we collect it. In the latter part of this presentation, Mark Larratt-Smith is going to explain the system by which we allocate funds to school boards for education.

I want to just talk about that whole expenditure picture, and revenue for that matter, across the province and in recent years explain a little bit about the magnitude of that. If you have the slides, you can follow along as I go. I am going to speak to the first six slides.

The general magnitude of expenditures on elementary and secondary education in the province is at $12 billion in 1990, in the last calendar year, and that served a total enrolment of almost 1.8 million pupils and 122 school boards. The provincial grants accounted for $5.5 billion of that, which amounts to about 41.5%. The remainder of that $12-billion figure, $6.5 billion, came from property taxes.

On the second slide, the general areas of finance fall into these three categories. The first one and the second one are the ones that get the most attention; the last one is less obvious. The operating expenditures really represent the biggest portion, and the largest portion of that is teachers' salaries. Capital expenditures are $540 million and the teachers' pension fund, $660 million.

On the third slide, the provincial support represents and has represented historically from 60% to 40%, and in 1990, roughly 41% to 45% of total expenditures. The local share of recognized expenditures is about 34%, and the remaining 21% of total expenditures is funded entirely by the local sector, which is not recognized for grant purposes. School boards can raise funds through their property taxes in budgets above the recognized expenditures of the province.

There are five main categories of provincial grants that are shown in that exploded pie diagram. The category 1 grant or the basic per-pupil grant is the largest component and it equals $3.1 billion. The category 2 grant, equalling $200 million, provides additional support to boards for the delivery of a base level of service that experience additional costs as a result of geographic or demographic or socioeconomic conditions that vary across the province.

The category 3 grants of about $1.2 billion are provided as incentive grants to encourage boards to extend programs and services that respond to local needs or meet provincial priorities. Category 4 is the capital slice, $332 million last year, which assists school boards in financing approved capital projects, including new schools and additions, site purchases, replacements and renovations, and in some places, acquisition of portables. Category 5 covers additional provincial support for education, and it is primarily the province's contribution to the employers' share of teachers' pension payments.

Slide 4, total board expenditures, illustrates the province versus the local share as this has varied from 1980 to 1990. The graph illustrates that provincial grants have increased annually in an absolute sense but that expenditures have increased at a much greater rate. Consequently, the rate of support by the province has fallen during that time. Since 1980, school board expenditures have increased by inflation 84% and provincial support increased by 101%, or $2.3 billion in absolute terms.

The recognized spending increased by $4.6 billion, or 120%; the unrecognized spending increased by $2 billion, or 459%. That is the discretionary spending on the part of boards. The large increase in unrecognized expenditures has contributed to the funding inequity which now currently exists among boards. Mark Larratt-Smith will come back and explain how that happens in a moment.

Slide 5, which is the operating expenditures slide, another exploded pie, pieces of that, instructional salaries represent the largest component of total operating expenditures, and that is 63%. The benefits associated with the instructional component represent close to 7%; other salaries and benefits comprise about 9%. This is for non-teaching staff. Learning materials and transportation represent 8% and 6%, respectively. Then other expenditures comprise 8% and they include things such as transfers to the capital fund, consultant fees and contract services.

On slide 6, education revenues, education grants make up 41.5% of operating expenditures and the local sector revenues for operating purposes are generated through commercial and residential taxes. That breaks out at residential taxes contributing about 35% of the total operating revenues. Commercial taxes contribute about 24% of total operating revenues. All those are hard numbers to take, but they are important to understand the breakdown and the orders of magnitude. Mark, I will turn my chair to you.

Mr Larratt-Smith: What I am going to try and do is take you through how the current model works on the operating side and then talk a little bit about the capital expenditures over the last few years. If you will turn to the page that has this particular diagram on it, I think it will be helpful. It is an attempt to show, as best we can, how the model works board by board.

The diagram on the left-hand side has the amount spent per student and it has boards listed along the bottom. The boards are plotted against that particular expenditure per student. It is a diagram for the elementary panel only, because of course you have some situations where Catholic boards are still not fully extended. So this particular diagram is representative of the elementary panel.

You will note the solid line that runs across about two-thirds of the way up. That is the current grant ceiling for elementary, which is a per-pupil expenditure ceiling of $3,500 per student. What that means is that the province establishes an equalized mill rate across the province with data that are given to us by the Ministry of Revenue so that the level of local tax effort is the same whether it is in Kirkland Lake or whether it is in Metropolitan Toronto and plots that against the amount of money it will actually raise per student. Then the balance up to the grant ceiling is provided by the provincial grant. So if you will look up the curving line that is plotted there, that indicates the amount of local wealth on an equalized basis that is raised by individual school boards, given that equalized assessment. The balance, as indicated in the diagram, is contributed in the form of provincial grants. The interesting thing is that very wide disparity in local wealth in that equalized assessment, with the Metropolitan Toronto School Board on the extreme left-hand side raising over $4,000 per student even with the equalized assessment, and with the Kirkland Lake District Roman Catholic Separate School Board raising only $275 per student.

There is a lot of talk in the education system these days about negative grant. Negative grant is very visibly demonstrated to you by that little portion at the left-hand side of the chart where the equalized assessment for two boards raises above the ceiling so that the local wealth is such that equalized assessment generates more than the provincial ceiling.

If you turn a couple of pages back in your package, I believe, you will find what looks like the same diagram with an additional overlay. It really just adds to the story that is on the first diagram. I am not talking about this one. It is the same chart. It is a little further on, but I think it is worth speaking about it at the same time.

This chart is identically the same as the other one except that it adds the plotting of the total expenditure per student. We are still talking about the elementary panel. We are talking of the total expenditure per student by boards related to the provincial grants and the local share. The very up-and-down line that is above the ceiling indicates the total board spending, and virtually every elementary panel is above the ceiling that has currently been set for the province. It also indicates in general terms that boards with a large amount of assessment wealth are more likely to make those extra expenditures than the boards on the right-hand side of the chart, which have very little assessment wealth.

The variations, however, are significant and they would reflect obviously different communities' decisions and priorities with regard to education. They would also in some instances indicate the efforts of separate school boards to remain at the same level of both service and education as their coterminous public boards.

Turning back in your package, you will find a slide which is entitled Summary of Pressures on the Current Model. I think I can summarize those fairly quickly with reference to one other chart. The decreasing provincial rate of support is demonstrated on another chart which is included in the package right behind that first one and indicates that from 1980 to 1990 the overall rate of support has declined on total provincial support. That would include all of the components that Mr Mitton outlined to you. It would not include the pension contribution; it would include capital. That has gone down over that 10-year period from 55.9% to 45.2%.

Mrs Sullivan: If you included these teachers' pension contributions, what would those rates of support be in that instance?

Mr Larratt-Smith: I cannot give you over the 10-year rate of support. I can tell you that for 1990 the rate would have been 56.9%.

The rate of support on total operating, which is just the operating portion of school boards' expenditures but includes all of their operating expenditures, both those approved under ceilings by the province and those which boards choose to fund and raise above ceilings, the decline in the rate of support over 10 years has been from 52.1% down to 41.3%.

Returning to the summary of pressures, the second point there is the very large wealth differential between boards, and I believe that was demonstrated in the two parts that we discussed in detail a few moments ago. There is an increasing expenditure variance among boards and that certainly is shown by the variety in that total expenditure line on the expenditure per elementary student.

There has been an experience of double-digit mill rate increases over the past few years and there has been an increase in the number of boards with operating deficits, which has been a problem that the ministry has been addressing over the past several years. I pointed out the negative grant phenomenon and the final item of pressure is an increased backlog of unmet capital needs.

Turning to the capital—

Mr Phillips: Just a point of clarification on the provincial rate of support, the $5.4 billion includes capital and pension, is that right?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Everything but not pension.

Mr Larratt-Smith: That includes the provincial support rate not including pensions.

Mr Phillips: You are sure of that?

Mr Larratt-Smith: I apologize, Mr Phillips. I did say it did not include pensions. In fact it includes everything, including the above-ceiling expenditure. The 56.9% is the percentage of approved, including pension and capital. The 45.2% is everything included.

Mr Phillips: We used to try to use that number, but it never flew, and I do not think it will fly. I think it is too late. Nice try. The $5.4 billion is pension and capital.

Mr Larratt-Smith: If I could turn to slide 12, if they are numbered in your package, that is the first slide that outlines the capital component of this presentation. That is titled "School Inventory."

It indicates there is currently a set of schools of institutions out there in the province with a replacement value of approximately $20 billion. That includes 3,900 elementary schools and 800 secondary schools for a total of 4,700 schools. There are currently about 8,300 portables in the system and there are roughly 900 child care facilities operating attached to school buildings.

The growth in school capital needs has been remarkable over the last few years. Prior to 1985, the ministry was spending in support of capital construction in the order of $70 million per year. Since that time, there has been very rapid growth and that rapid growth has tended to be highly localized in two areas, in the greater Toronto area and to a lesser extent in Ottawa-Carleton.

That has been a function of the baby boom echo, a function of net immigration into Ontario, and that would include both immigrants and movement within Canada to Ontario. It has also been a function to some extent of a growth in kindergarten and junior kindergarten classes in school boards.

The final point is it has been affected by lower pupil-teacher ratios which have either been identified and mandated by the province, as in the case of grades 1 and 2, or have been negotiated as part of collective agreements with teachers' federations.

Provincial initiatives over that period of time have also contributed to the pressure on capital in the school system. The separate extension of Bill 30 has created a number of situations where schools had to be moved, with inevitable dislocation and with demands for students moving from one system to another.

Child care is now and was mandated several years ago for all new schools. All new schools, both elementary and secondary, would include a child care facility. Pressures been placed on the stock of schools through the introduction of Bill 75 and the creation of French-language schools and, in a couple of instances in Toronto and Ottawa, French-language school boards.

1500

I have already mentioned the class size reduction in grades 1 and 2 and the extension in junior and senior kindergarten. The renewal of technological education has also placed a particular cost on schools in terms of a need for what are really quite expensive facilities.

The next slide indicates the total requests that have come in in the annual capital expenditure forecast exercise which the ministry conducts with all school boards. In 1985, the request from all boards was in the order of $398 million. This last year, it has been over $2 billion in requests.

Turning to the next slide on funding, there has been greatly increased funding from 1985 onward. Initially, $900 million was granted in 1989 and extended to $1.5 billion, so that there is, from 1989 through 1993, $300 million a year being assigned to capital construction. In addition to that, there is $32 million a year in special capital, related basically to the tech ed and the junior kindergarten initiatives, which has also been committed. In summary, $3 billion worth of capital approvals have been made since 1985.

Turning to the next chart on capital allocations, this shows the breakout as between the growth areas of the province and the non-growth areas. I should mention that one of the issues that certainly the ministry has to deal with is the fact that the Education Act requires that students be provided with instruction. Where their facilities are simply inadequate for the number of students, that becomes a very high priority in terms of both the school boards' and the ministry's allocation of available dollars.

What that has resulted in is a very heavy orientation of the ministry's capital program towards the growth areas. You will note over the six years from 1985 to 1990 an average in the high 80s or low 90s of the percentage of the ministry's capital budget has gone in the growth area: 88% in 1985, rising to 96% in 1988 and 87% in 1990.

The final slide just summarizes some of the school capital pressures that are currently being experienced in the province. The first one is unmet new school needs in high-growth areas. Even with that very high percentage of money allocated to growth areas, there are a number of needs that have not been met within the budgets available.

There has also been a backlog in renovation and retrofit projects because of the relatively small amount of money that the province could devote to supporting school boards in undertaking those particular activities, and there have been school space pressures, many of them created by provincial program initiatives such as the 20-to-1 initiative or the JK and senior kindergarten extension.

As a final pressure, there are a variety of environmental issues, most of which seem to occur with relatively little notice, although often they are the result of an old school stock, schools built to standards with materials that would not necessarily be used today but that were used at the time of construction. So there have been a number of issues related to the environment of school buildings, asbestos perhaps being the most widely publicized one, which have created additional pressure on our capital grant program.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Our real question is where we come from here. There are a number of education and financial issues that need to be addressed. Part of the problem is that the issues are often fairly complex and they overlap in other areas. Given the kinds of initiatives that we want to make in terms of children's social service needs and all the way in which we overlap with municipal financing and what the interlock is there, it tends to make this already a complex situation that much more complex.

We do not believe that anyone in the province is satisfied or happy with the way in which education is financed. We may have different reasons for being unhappy depending on what sector we come from and what our particular local issues are, but we believe that the system is not working well. It is important for us as a government to invite the province to examine fully ways in which we might alter the current funding arrangements so that they meet need more exactly but also so that the equity issues that arise are dealt with in a fair way.

It is important to have a hearing such as this for people to get some of their concerns out on the table and to ensure that this committee understands where the pressures are for us in the Education ministry. It is our hope that, as we go on through the process of the Fair Tax Commission, we can find ways to relieve the current burden on the property tax base which, I think is fairly agreed across the provinces, is much too burdensome because it takes no account of people's ability to pay.

We need to ensure that we are continuing to provide a fair and equitable opportunity for education in every area of the province and that is indeed a challenge, given the disparity that you saw between the assessment bases in different communities and also within the confines of our decision-making process with local boards having a good deal of local autonomy about the choices that they make in terms of program availability.

The select committee on education finance made a number of recommendations in its third report on directions for reform. It is our belief that those need to be considered very carefully, and the ministry has every intention of pressing for a thorough consideration of those reforms. The funding principles as described in the report on equity, on the adequacy of financing and on the issues around accountability are ones that concern us all. Those are the major areas where we feel the study of education financing needs to be placed.

Mr Phillips: Looking back to the big consultation that took place six months ago, if there was one issue that really got hammered on in Metro, it was this one. I think the people of Ontario are expecting a fulfilment of that commitment that was in An Agenda for People, certainly teachers. I look back on the teachers' campaign and it is extremely effective.

The trustees in Metro Toronto ran a campaign and your city, in response to that, said it would fund 20% of the cost of Metropolitan Toronto education and 60% across the province. I think there is going to be, particularly as property tax bills come out and that commitment was made to me six months ago—I am not sure that the Fair Tax Commission and other things are going to work, are going to fly because, as I say, if there is one thing that the trustees in Toronto, trustees in Ontario, the teachers of Ontario and the property tax people of Ontario are watching, it is the 60%. I think they will recognize a study and act not for what it might be.

What is the timetable for moving to the 60%? How many dollars need to be committed this year to do that? Second, I just want assurances that your 60% does not include capital and pension because I do not think that was the expectation of the trustees and the teachers and the public. A third issue is the Metro funding. I think after the election you committed to funding 20% of the public board's cost and I would like to know the timetable for that, because they are the board and you have two of our current members who sat on that board who also made that commitment. The last is a smaller one, but there is a group coming on with us afterwards that I think may be interested in lot levies. I would like to know what the position of the ministry will be in terms of funding facilities through lot levies.

But my three major ones, as I say, which I think are going to be absolutely crucial to the people of Ontario are: first, your timetable on what funds are required to move to the 60%—I think in your agenda you had a five-year timetable, the first two years $1.6 billion; second, the timetable of commitment for the 20% for Metro public board; third, just assurances that in your 60% you are not including pension and capital.

Hon Mrs Boyd: First of all, you are quite right that in the Agenda for People we were talking about a five-year timetable. It is really important that we be very clear that even in the current financial circumstances, we think it will certainly take that full length of time to make the changes and that it fits well with our intention to look at the entire structure, the way in which we collect revenues and the way in which we distribute revenues.

Basically the issue of 60% or 40%, however we want to do it, gets very muddy because of the very difference in assessment base and so on. Obviously some boards get a much higher percentage of provincial funding and others do not. One of the equity issues we need to look at is how it works. When the whole issue of 60% came up, it was to restore the balance that had existed in 1975 of the financing. That did include, at that point in time, as far as my understanding is—

Mr Phillips: Easy.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I am sorry?

Mr Phillips: It included capital and pension.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Yes, it is certainly my understanding, in a different way, because the formulae were different.

Mr Phillips: The teachers would be interested in that, but go on.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Superannuation was in a whole different kind of situation at that point, but my understanding certainly was that the change in the way the funding went meant that that money was separated out.

Mr Phillips: So your 60% promise included pension and capital.

Hon Mrs Boyd: That is certainly my understanding of it. I stand to be corrected by my fellow members, but we were talking about the total funding.

Mr Phillips: The Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation will be interested. Go ahead.

Hon Mrs Boyd: It is certainly my understanding of it and certainly what I was campaigning on. It was to restore that balance in terms of the costs that the province was putting into the cost of education, to renew the disproportionate share that was coming out of property taxes.

Mr Phillips: The timetable for getting the 60%, how much we need to provide this year, the timetable for the 20%.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I think I made it clear in the Legislature that we were not in any way prepared at that time in December to make any commitments about the changes this year because the general legislative grant had not been decided. We are still discussing that.

My sense is that given the financial situation, as I have been warning school boards and trustees as I go around the province, we cannot expect a great deal this year in terms of change. It is our position that we need to be not just jiggering with this particular formula, which we do not feel is really the kind of vehicle that is going to make that balance more equitable in the long run. It has been fixed and poked at and changed and so on for a long time.

As we have been saying as we go around the province, we do not believe we can make any great improvement in the situation, if at all, this year but that over the period of time with looking at the whole system and figuring out new ways in which to raise funds and to distribute them indeed we can make a major move within five years. My hope is to make that target.

Mr Phillips: So just to clarify, then, you are not going to be moving to the 60% although it was promised in the agenda—

Hon Mrs Boyd: I did not say that. I said I cannot tell you that now because the GLG has not been decided yet. We are still working at the figures and still deciding on the transfer payments in all areas, so I cannot tell you one way or the other at this point in time because that decision has not been made yet. But I would certainly tell members of the committee my belief is that if we are able to make much improvement it will not be much of an improvement this year, given the financial circumstances we find ourselves in.

Mr Phillips: I have a view on the financial circumstances that will come up later. I think the commitments were made saying there was a recession and I am sensitive about this because, believe me, those were fairly solid commitments to the school boards, the property tax people and the teachers. I think it is going to be very difficult if progress is not made on them to explain that.

Mr Fletcher: Just a couple of questions. I am looking at the back page, "School Capital Pressures." I heard the minister say that school boards would be given more local autonomy when it came to provincially mandated programs. Does that mean more local autonomy when it comes to some of the high-priced programs that the previous government implemented, such as junior kindergarten and some of the tech programs?

Hon Mrs Boyd: I am not sure I quite understand.

Mr Fletcher: I heard you mention that school boards would be given more local autonomy when it came to provincially mandated programs. I am sure that is what I heard. Did I hear you wrong?

Hon Mrs Boyd: No, what I am saying is that there is a fair amount of local autonomy, that the decision-making is made at that level. One of our problems as a provincial government is, because of the way in which the power to make decisions at the local level is very much the responsibility of local school boards, the issue of limiting those discretionary costs of local school boards is extremely difficult for us as a provincial government, as it has been for any other government. Part of the problem we have is that the disparity between the provincial share and the locally raised share grows exponentially if the discretionary costs of a board grow over and above ceiling. That creates some really big problems for us. I mean, in 1975 when we were talking about the 60%, we were looking at a situation where boards were not putting on the variety and the kinds of programs that they now feel they must do.

We also have to remember that in 1975 there were expenditure controls in place by the ministry which were subsequently removed. So the 60% figure, which did include capital costs, was controlled in terms of the expenditure ceilings that were there.

Mr Fletcher: As a former trustee, I can mention right now that reaching the 60% figure is not the goal; as long as we start to move in that direction. I understand you are moving in that direction.

One other thing that I noticed was accountability. Is that the accountability by school boards as far as how much they can raise taxes or how they spend their budgets?

Hon Mrs Boyd: I think it is both. As a matter of fact, we do have school boards in the province that have knowingly not raised their mill rates as much as their budgets indicated they needed to to meet the expenditures they were proposing to make. That is a real concern for all of us in the rest of the province when other school boards are prepared to do that.

In terms of the accountability of spending, that would apply of course to school boards as well as to the ministry. There need to be really good ways in which we can be sure that accountability is a shared responsibility between local boards and the ministry. I think many local boards feel sometimes that all the pressure has been on them, and what we are saying is that we know we need to be accountable and we need to be responsible and we are asking the same of local school boards.

Mr Fletcher: Yes. I think that is about time. I think that is what school boards are asking for.

Mr Sutherland: On page 5, the graph about total operating expenditures, learning materials are here at 8%. Has that figure been growing as a percentage of the overall costs?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Historically, I think it has been between 8% and 10%.

Mr Sutherland: With the large input, both at the technological level and with computers, do we see that figure growing?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Certainly we are going to be in a position where in order to support that kind of situation, the equipment costs, the training costs, the difference in space requirements, to really fulfil the technical need, that is going to be extremely difficult, in percentage terms, to make sure that that piece of the pie stays intact.

Mr Mitton: I think that in an absolute sense there has been significant growth with technology and increased use of technology in the classroom, but on a relative basis everything else is growing so fast as well, in terms of teachers' salaries and other benefits and operating costs, that it does not show in this context being out of proportion, plus or minus 2%.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you. The other question I asked it earlier when the Colleges and Universities reported here—the growing trend with these property tax coalitions that have sprouted up across the province, it seems one of their major focuses is education and increases in education taxes at the municipal level. I was wondering if you saw that as part of a lack of understanding by the general public about what it costs to have a good quality education system, and maybe just some comments on how we are comparing with other jurisdictions in terms of funding within the country and maybe with some of the European countries.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I think you are quite right that in fact the general public has very little idea how education is funded or what is involved. Part of our argument about the whole system of funding is that it is extremely complex and if you live in Kirkland Lake, this means a whole different thing to you than it does if you live in Metropolitan Toronto and anywhere in between the two extremes.

The whole issue of equalized assessment is extremely difficult for people to understand. I think, as citizens, we do not understand very well how we are taxed and what the purpose of that is. I do not think it is well understood. I do think it is difficult to explain to the average person. However, I must say I think it is something that we need to be much clearer about so that people have a better understanding.

In terms of the other, I am sorry, I have forgotten—

Mr Sutherland: Just how we compare with other jurisdictions within the country and internationally.

Mr Mitton: In Canada our expenditure per pupil is the highest, but it is in the top two or three. Mark, you help me with this. I believe Sweden and Japan have higher expenditures per pupil than we do, but we also rate the top five or six worldwide in the free world.

Mr Larratt-Smith: That is basically true.

Hon Mrs Boyd: So we are not in the abysmal position that we are in in post-secondary education and I think need to be aware of that. Where we need to be controlling costs and where we need to be looking at it is in the choices we make about the programs we offer and the way in which local communities are prepared to support those. I think sometimes local communities are not aware enough of what the choice around program means or the choice around building a new school means and what that will eventually mean to their share of the costs of education.

Mrs Sullivan: Minister, I was interested in your response to Mr Phillips's question relating to the provincial derating of operating costs. I have some questions relating to capital, but I wanted to clarify again your 60% promise, which you have indicated would take place over a three-year period. For the first time today I heard that that included teachers' pension plan contributions and capital. I wonder if you are also limiting it to recognized expenditures?

Hon Mrs Boyd: I am sorry, to the recognized expenditures?

Mrs Sullivan: Yes.

Hon Mrs Boyd: In the original Agenda for People, that was not the intention.

Mrs Sullivan: I see, all right. So, that clarifies that. On the capital side, will you continue multi-year funding? Is that your anticipation?

Hon Mrs Boyd: It is certainly, we think, to everyone's benefit to have a long-range plan and that people know in advance and are able to do their preparations in advance. That seems to have worked well. It does certainly add pressures in terms of rapid changes. We are seeing the greatest pressure in terms of capital expenditures, for example, where there have been just rapid changes of population that were not anticipated and children are coming on stream, ready to go to school earlier than was expected. There is not much flexibility with the multi-year planning and that and that is where a lot of the pressure is that we are feeling. But at the same time, in order to plan effectively, it is certainly our belief that the long-range plans are important. It also adds to the local accountability of boards, that they interface with the municipality around planning issues to ensure that that multi-year plan is taken into account when there is an expansion of development.

Mrs Sullivan: If you are going to continue the multi-year funding, given that the requests which have come in through the compiling of the lists at the trustee level are significantly higher for this year over last year, would you be looking then to expand your capital commitment this year, say, from the $300 million that was spent last year to perhaps $500 million?

Hon Mrs Boyd: We certainly know that that demand is very high. I guess we are in a situation where, given our financial situation, given the revenues as we anticipate them to be, we are going to have to be making difficult choices about the priorities there. I cannot give you a commitment one way or the other because, to be quite frank, the decision has not been made at this point, but we do know that the pressures are very high in terms of capital requests, both catch-up requests, ones that have not been approved before and have sort of been bumped up a year, but also new requests, and that is a serious problem, I think, for many communities.

Mrs Sullivan: When you were soliciting the capital lists this year, did you ask again for A lists and B lists, the renovation and the new as well?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Yes.

Mr Mitton: Yes, we did.

Mrs Sullivan: Are you looking at about the same proportion, 87 to 13, or where are you seeing that pressure situation? Are you seeing it coming in for new or are you seeing a substantial increase in renovation requests?

Hon Mrs Boyd: I do not think the balance is substantially different, but we know with the aging stock that we have in no-growth areas that it is going to increase substantially over the coming years. We have certainly had lots of warning about that, but I think it is around 15%, 16%.

Mr Larratt-Smith: We have not got the final answer on that yet.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Yes. The ones we have looked at, it looks as though it is within a couple of percentage points, but that bump has not hit us yet. I think boards, particularly in Metro Toronto but all boards that have an aging school stock, are recognizing, as the universities are, that indeed that is an increasing problem.

The other issue for us is that while we may talk about growth boards as boards where there is potential growth in terms of assessment, there is also growth because of housing intensification in older boards, and we are not talking about new schools there but we are talking about growth in enrolment, and that is creating an enormous pressure in some communities.

Mrs Sullivan: For this year's budget, would you be expecting to look at some innovative financing mechanisms that may be outside of the regular routine, whether it is lot levies or whether it is developers providing the school over a long-term lease and so on? Would you be factoring that into your budgetary proposals?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Certainly we will be looking at all ways of maximizing the fund-raising, but I would caution you again that it is our belief that we do not want to make major changes until we get the feedback around the taxation commission.

Mrs Sullivan: In other words, you will not be making that kind of a recommendation to the Treasurer this year?

Hon Mrs Boyd: I would not go so far as to say that. Certainly we know that in order to begin to meet our commitments, we do have to find new ways of raising money and we are considering a number of possibilities.

Mrs Sullivan: When will you be announcing the GLGs?

Hon Mrs Boyd: You will have to ask the Treasurer, actually. I know the final decision on transfer payments has not yet been made and is still in the discussion stage, but we are also aware of what pressure that puts on local communities that are trying to budget, so we are trying to do it as quickly as we can. I would expect by the middle of February at the very latest, personally, just in terms of the way the process is going, but I understand that the Treasurer is coming to speak to you on Thursday and you can certainly ask him.

Mrs Sullivan: Finally, are you going to be addressing the question of the deficits among the Roman Catholic separate school boards as part of your budget request this year, and do you know what the totals come to?

Hon Mrs Boyd: The totals of the deficits? They are not all Roman Catholic boards, just incidentally.

Mr Mitton: They are not all Roman Catholic boards and we are doing work with them, so the numbers are changing daily as they work on plans to balance their budgets.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Generally, those plans are looking at ways in which they can factor out those deficits over two or three years in order to prevent the cost to the local taxpayers from being exorbitant in one year.

Mrs Sullivan: In developing that longer-term kind of plan, would you be looking for an injection which would be an increment to your budget this year, that can be transferred on and then perhaps come back through another route, another clever route later on?

Mr Mitton: You mean an injection from the province to help them with the deficit? Not in any way that would put them in an inequitable position with other boards.

Hon Mrs Boyd: We are very concerned that those boards that have been responsible, that have pared their budgets to the bone and have done that in a responsible and accountable way, not get the message that that work has been for nothing, that a board that has a deficit and has not done that kind of hard work is going to get bailed out. Now, in some of the situations that have deficits it is not that kind of situation at all. They have been very, very responsible in terms of budgeting, but there has been a change in their assessment base. The North of Superior board is a very good example where, because it has a little gold mine situation that did not work out, the assessment just did not materialize and it put them in a dreadful position. That is a different situation from that of the board that has consciously chosen not to increase its mill rate in the hope that the province would bail it out, or has not taken those tough decisions that so many boards have about the kinds of programs they are able to offer and the way in which they are able to manage what assessment base they have.

Mr White: I have several questions, but I am not an economic whiz; I am just a humble taxpayer and social worker.

Mr Curling: And a politician.

Mr White: Thank you. I am not sure if I understand whether it makes a lot of difference if you are paying 65%, 60% or 55% of the cost of education if my property tax keep going up. My understanding during the election campaign, from the many thousands of people I spoke to who were concerned about this issue, is that they were concerned about their property taxes increasing at a dramatic rate, not about the per cent of the cost for education the province is paying. My concern here, to relate to your Minister, is, in what way can we ensure that there is a direct reflection between the dollars spent at the provincial level and the lack of increase in the property tax or in fact possibly even decrease? We were talking about the autonomous boards that set their own budgets and their own tax levels.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Let me be very frank. You cannot and that is why we are saying that under this particular funding system we cannot have the assurance that if we increase our funding, that will necessarily mean that local boards drop their mill rate, nor can we be sure that if local boards were to drop their mill rate for the education portion of the taxes, the municipalities would not step in and take up the slack. That has happened in the past. This is a real issue around surety and certainty, around being sure that whatever moves we make will translate into proper tax savings for home owners.

Frankly, under the current system, the way it is, there is no way for the provincial Ministry of Education to ensure that that is going to happen. We can try to exert lots of public pressure and lots of moral suasion on local school boards around the way in which they raise taxes and how that that rolls over into the municipal area, but quite frankly, our experience in the past has been—and there was one particular point in time when a lot of school boards amalgamated and there was considerable cost savings incurred by that in terms of economy of scale, but in fact the municipalities just moved in and took over the gains in taxes and the home owners got no relief at all. We have real concerns with just jiggling with this number, before and until we have some way as a population to get some control over those expenditures.

Frankly, previous governments have struggled with the same kind of issues. The growth in discretionary spending by local school boards has just been enormous over the past few years, so we cannot make an assurance of that and that is what we are concerned about. When we talk about 60% we always have to say, "Well, 60% of what in terms of that discretionary spending?" But then we always have to look at who decides about that property tax base and it is not us as the provincial government.

Mr White: So that is why you have mentioned previous governments having had the same concern. I feel some of a duty in terms of my own constituents, in fact of our government, of ensuring that while they may have had those same concerns, this is a very central part of our mandate. Mr Phillips has reminded us of it several times.

Mr Phillips: I am reading it here. You have several school board expenditures. That is your policy. School boards were very interested in that, but it was not part of It was very straightforward in here.

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Phillips, this is not a cue you to jump in again.

Mrs Sullivan: It was a perfect opportunity.

Mr White: It was, though, it was. Just verifying.

The Chair: Mr White, have you finished with your question?

Mr White: No, I have not.

The Chair: Could we move along? We are running out of time.

Mr White: But that would certainly be a central concern of your ministry, the fair tax issue.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Very much so. When one looks at the whole issue, unless we have some certainty about that breakdown in cost is and where the accountabilities, we are not going to be able to get that kind of control.

Mr Curling: Mr White, it is wonderful to know that you did not omit, I hope you did not omit, that you are a politician too, because the question of 60% of what was the thing we were asking when we were in government. Now I hear the minister is saying too, 60% of what? My question is not that, Mr Chairman.

The Deputy Minister of Colleges and Universities, who preceded you, had concern about dropouts, and counselling was mentioned. In the elementary school system, that was a great concern, but there is another concern. My question to you will be coupled with the other concern too, one of them. I wondered if there is a provincial strategy. I am sure there is a pressure on the fact that also literacy—literacy, to be more specific—that we do not have a great record, and this would answer also my colleague too, the question about how we compare with others. We have a graceful record of illiteracy in this province. Talk about competitiveness, etc and the dropout rates and, as I said, proper counselling and the diverse multicultural society and all that. Is that one of the pressures? Are you coming forward with this budget with some provincial strategy to ensure there will be money needed to do this strategy too?

Hon Mrs Boyd: Absolutely. I think it is a very serious pressure and the ministry, as you are probably aware, is carrying on with an initiative that the previous government started in terms of looking at our curriculum throughout to find out what is going on. We are not getting that kind of equity of outcome in terms of the various groups that we have in our schools.

We have very, very deep concerns as a government about the way in which success is measured for students, the reasons why students are leaving school, the reasons why students are not learning in school. You are quite right that a lot of those issues have to do with multicultural issues, with the wide differences in socioeconomic status, the effect that poverty has on children in terms of their learning, and we see that as a very integrated kind of situation and certainly are most interested in pursuing some of the notions in the Maloney report on Children First and how that impacts specifically on education and how our curriculum policies and our literacy policies and indeed the setting of benchmarks can make some real difference in terms of ensuring a better equity of outcome for our students.

Mr Curling: Am I getting from you then that there will be no more studies really but that we understand what is causing illiteracy, we do understand what is causing dropouts? You mentioned quite a few of those things and the program that is coming forward is a program; it is not a bunch of funds that we put forward to study the problem any more. We keep studying it to death.

Hon Mrs Boyd: There are a number of initiatives which have already been undertaken and a number which are planned that are specifically to address that in an action-oriented way. There will of course also be continued study around the curriculum issues, because that was a long-term plan. We were not prepared to interrupt that process, but as that plan goes forward, there are many, many different ways in which communities want to tackle those problems. We want to see what works in terms of the pilot projects that are already going on and others that we are beginning, to see what impact they have on that so that we can have a generalized idea. In an urban community, this approach works best; in rural communities, this approach works best; if we have a high group of people for whom English is a second language, we need to take this tack, and that sort of thing. So we are not trying to have a system that speaks to everybody by being the same, but to have a system that speaks to every student by speaking the language and using the methodology that reaches him best.

Mr Phillips: This is the first time I have heard about the general legislative grants not coming out until February. Normally they are out in November. I believe the general legislative grants have been out in November for three of the last four years.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I think so. Oh, yes, I think you are right.

Mr Phillips: Your official is nodding no. They have been out in November. The school boards will be six tenths of the way through the year, I think, because they set their budgets at the end of June pretty much in shape. I would just make that point. It makes it very difficult for them to manage their finances.

This has been very illuminating for me. I had never realized, because we got really hammered on this 60%. Your 60% includes pensions, capital and it is 60% of an approved ceiling that you will set.

Hon Mrs Boyd: You are putting words in my mouth. What I said to you is yes, it does include pensions and capital, and that certainly is so. In terms of an approved ceiling that we will set, there is and has been under the GLG scheme, a ceiling in terms of per-pupil grants. That is not a change, so I am kind of puzzled.

Mr Phillips: You should not be puzzled. You said that your 60% would not be 60% of spending, it would 60% of some pre-approved number.

Hon Mrs Boyd: I said that what we are going to have to do is get a clear idea and a clear commitment from school boards as to their ability and willingness to control expenses in a way that they have not been before. We simply have to look at the way in which those expenditures have grown over the past few years. Frankly, no government can allow another level of government to jump up that cost without having some notion of how it is going to meet it.

Mr Phillips: Like the federal ministry.

Hon Mrs Boyd: Well, there is the other problem of course, because as federal transfer payments drop, it puts that much more pressure. We did not even talk about that particular little intergovernmental problem, but we know that it is facing us all in terms of the caps.

In terms of your question about the announcement of the GLGs, in the past the municipalities, universities and colleges, schools and hospitals sector has been announced in November but the individual allocations have been announced in the spring, in February. In other words, the overall percentage increase has been known, but how that breaks down for the board according to the statistics has not been known until the spring.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your presentation and for coming this afternoon.

ONTARIO SCHOOL BOARD REFORM NETWORK

The Vice-Chair: Our next presentation will be the Ontario School Board Reform Network. Mr Bennett, would you like to announce your associates there?

Mr Bennett: Yes, I will. As chair of the recently formed Ontario School Board Reform Network, I am pleased to introduce our delegation and our submission to your pre-budget consultation process.

For our presentation we have assembled a delegation of Ontario School Board Reform Network trustees representing different public school boards and expressing concerns about financial accountability shared by our reform network members in various parts of this province. The presenters here today are Trustee Bill Crothers of the York Region Board of Education beside me; Trustee Carolyn Parrish of the Peel Board of Education, and Trustee Diane Austin of the Victoria County Board of Education.

First a word about the Ontario School Board Reform Network. The Ontario School Board Reform Network was officially founded in June 1990 in Ottawa as a province-wide coalition of individual school trustees representing a variety of political persuasions but all committed to reforming our system of local education governance. We were founded with 24 original trustee members drawn from a number of school boards, and we have now won the support of trustees in 15 different boards across Ontario, from the Toronto region to Windsor and from Thunder Bay to Cornwall. We are committed above all to strengthening the role of elected trustees in relation to senior administration and to establishing proper public accountability for board program and financial decisions.

The School Board Reform Network is a coalition of reform-minded trustees committed to five basic principles: strengthening the trustees' role, democratizing school boards, improving access to information, promoting reform coalitions and working with the Ontario Public School Boards' Association to further these objectives.

The Third Report of the Select Committee on Education was released in January 1990 and in it was recommendation 27, which reads as follows: "In consultation with the key partners in education, the minister should examine the responsibilities and duties of directors of education under the Education Act and any other relevant matters in order to clarify and solidify the authority of trustees of school board program and financial decisions."

It was really recommendation 27 that gave birth to the Ontario School Board Reform Network. It struck a responsive chord among reform-minded school trustees in various corners of this province. It sparked an adverse reaction, I should mention, from the directors of education. And it also convinced some of us that now is the time to take up the cause of local education governance reform.

We are here today to raise a number of financial issues and to propose reforms in certain areas. Among the major issues that we have chosen to address are: the financial management and auditing of school boards, the school board fiscal year, the level of local funding for education, school board capital needs and education lot levies, and capital allocations for school renovations and repairs. We believe these are fundamental issues and issues that your committee should examine, and we hope that you will do so.

I would like to now introduce Trustee Bill Crothers who will address the first two issues.

Mr Crothers: I would like to talk first, if I could, about something about the scope of audits of school boards. In January 1990 the select committee on education in the report referred to by Trustee Bennett made its third report to the Legislature. The focus of that report was education finance, with one section being devoted to local governance, entitled the Question of Accountability.

Recommendation 25 in that report reads: "The office of the Provincial Auditor should be encouraged to carry out comprehensive audits of boards on a regular basis and report its findings and conclusions to the public and the minister." Today I would like to spend some time discussing recommendation 25, which is also very much concerned with the issue of governance of school boards.

Section 207 of the Education Act requires all boards to appoint an auditor, and specifies that the auditor, "shall perform such duties as are prescribed by the minister and by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and also such duties as may be required by the board." In most, if not all, school boards in the province, the director of education is also the secretary-treasurer of the board, and there are very few, if any, school boards that assign additional duties to their auditors. Control over the process is very much in the hands of the director.

I can illustrate with an example from my own board, the York Region Board of Education. Like many boards in the province, my board does not have an audit committee and despite concerns raised by some of us, the total extent of the exposure of the board auditor to trustees is about 15 minutes per year during a visit of the auditor to the board.

represent the financial statements. Despite asking for one, we never seen a management letter from the auditors to the board. My board does not have an audit committee because most of the trustees do not understand the need for the role of an audit committee and the director does not encourage the creation of one.

My board had a budget in 1990 of $381 million. Clearly, this situation is not in the best interests of the taxpayers of the region or the province. While the legislation provides the mechanism for the board to become more accountable, it has chosen not to do so.

In 1990, the Provincial Auditor audited two school boards and has undertaken to audit six boards in 1991. Among the findings identified in the reports of the 1990 audits were the following: Controls over purchasing were not adequate; some Ministry of Education grants were not spent according to terms approved; errors in calculations that led to overpayment of accounts; weaknesses in budget processes; non-compliance with the Education Act; weaknesses in portable asset control.

The audits conducted in 1990, and those planned for 1991, were far from comprehensive audits, and only in the area of transportation expenditures did they touch on the value-for-money examinations. It would be unfair to attempt to use any of the early audits for the specific purpose of criticizing the practices of a specific board, because at the moment, the audits, limited as they are, are being conducted in the absence of provincial measures and standards.

Most of the situations identified are correctable, and many were not known to the trustees of the boards. However, school expenditures are increasing tremendously and constituents are becoming much more insistent on evaluation and accountability for the system. Increasingly, they want assurance that moneys are being expended properly and productively.

Even where audit practices are expanded, very rarely do school board audits either comprehensive or value-for-money audits, and very rarely do school board audits relate to actual expenditures to budget approvals. Most school board audits do little more than indicate that the financial statements of the board reflect the actual expenditures of the board.

In our view, current audit practices are not sufficient. The Third Report of the Select Committee on Education compared the recommended comprehensive audits to the operational reviews conducted on the 51 children's aid societies in the province. By coincidence, I am and I have been the chairman of the board of the York Region Children's Aid Society for a number of years, and I can make a few observations regarding those audits.

First of all, most CAS directors did not openly welcome the operational reviews in advance; most were, however, appreciative of the process afterwards. While the process initially was time consuming and initially traumatic, the results were ultimately seen to be beneficial and to exercise not a witchhunt.

Fourth, in 1989 the total expenditures combined of all 51 children's aid societies in the province was $289 million. There are more than a dozen school boards in the province that currently have budgets equivalent to that.

Clearly, if trustees are to exercise any semblance of responsibility for the expenditures of their board, and if there is to be any meaningful level of accountability to the constituents of the board, certain fundamental practices are required.

First, in the area of board audits, all boards should be required to have an audit committee, whether it is trustees only or trustees plus members from the community. Second, all board audits should be required to compare board purchasing and tendering practices to board and/or ministry policies. Third, all board audits should be required to measure, quantify and comment upon budgetary transfers that are made without specific board approval. Fourth and last, the degree of sophistication of board audits should be related to the size of the board budget. Many board budgets are now in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

In the area of the Provincial Auditor, we believe that the scope of the audits done by the Provincial Auditor should be expanded: (1) They should be comprehensive in nature. (2) Audits should include value-for-money examinations. (3) The budget process itself in the board should be audited. (4) They should be regular in nature.

We understand that the standing committee on public accounts, in its second report of June 1990, also recommended that all audits, including school board audits, be value-for-money audits and that the audit branch has prepared legislative amendments to support those recommendations. We firmly believe that subjecting school boards to regular comprehensive audits by the Provincial Auditor will provide significant impetus to local boards to strengthen their own audit practices and ultimately lead to trustees recognizing and accepting more responsibility for spending decisions within their boards.

In the area of the school board fiscal year, I would offer the following comments. One of the difficulties standing in the way of trustees understanding and accepting more responsibility for policy and spending decisions of boards of education, and therefore being more accountable to the community, is the fact that many of the decisions made are not reflected in a single board budget, but rather the impact is spread over several budgets. Most policy and spending decisions are made on the basis of the school year, while in the current situation school board budgets are based upon the calendar year.

We believe that altering the budget year to correspond with the school year will help to strengthen the role of trustees in the boards and to increase the accountability of trustees to the communities. We would recommend that the government give some priority to examining the feasibility of changing the board of education budget year to correspond to the school year.

In the area of education finance, we share the same concerns as do virtually all groups concerned about public education regarding the level of education finance in Ontario. We believe that the government must address the issues of the level of grant support to the boards, grant ceilings, the impact of provincial policies on local boards of education and the appropriateness of the property tax to finance such a large share of education costs.

We are, however, encouraged with the promise of the government to create a Fair Tax Commission, but would suggest very strongly that school boards have significant input into the deliberations and the outcomes of that commission.

Mr Bennett: I would like to now ask Trustee Dianne Austin of the Victoria County Board of Education to address the issue of financing capital projects.

Mrs Austin: I am just going to speak on a section of capital funding that has to do with renovations. Presently, the capital funding grant system moneys are divided into three separate categories: (1) site purchases and new pupil places, (2) renovation and replacement costs, and (3) program upgrading.

There is a demand that exists for new pupil places across the province due to overcrowding, but at the same time some of the demand for funding of new schools is driven falsely by current ministry practices and policies. The small amount of funds available for renovations is producing an artificial demand for some new school sites. In many cases it is much cheaper to repair and upgrade an existing facility than to construct a new building.

Why, then, do boards of education decide to abandon existing facilities and replace them with new structures? Let's examine the factors which influence board decisions when faced with a school in need of renovation.

1600

1. The chance of receiving funding for new construction is far greater than receiving funding for renovations. Of the $300 million allocated for capital grants in 1988, $15 million or only 5% of the total went towards the cost of renovating existing school facilities.

2. Boards of education receive substantial busing subsidies from the province. Thus, increased busing to a new school facility has little impact on the board's budget and is not considered as part of the operating costs of a new facility.

3. Ministry policies stipulating what renovation funds can be used for are very limiting. For example, one ministry official, while attending a public meeting of a board, was quoted in the local media as saying, "When asked about funding to upgrade the schools, the official said there are very few funds available for renovation and those funds that are available could only be used for renovations to the fabric of the building, ie, roof repairs, boiler repairs. There would be no money for the addition of a gymnasium, a library or a kindergarten."

At a conference in Ottawa held to discuss the problem of renovation funding, board trustees spoke of schools within their jurisdictions that were built prior to the implementation of kindergarten programs, prior to gymnasiums and libraries becoming integral parts of the school building.

Others spoke of schools built in the boom years of the 1960s which will soon be eligible for renovation grants. They described the structural problems in these newer old schools, arising in many cases from the use of construction materials or techniques that have since fallen into disrepute.

So what decisions are boards reaching when faced with such problems?

1. A board in central Ontario when faced with a school requiring approximately $800,000 in upgrades voted to close the school and request funds from the province for a new facility. The cost of the new school is estimated at $1 million. Construction has started.

2. A board in western Ontario, knowing the improbability of receiving renovation dollars, has voted to close down a high school and build a new one two blocks away because funding is available for new construction. The cost of a new high school is in excess of $20 million.

3. A board in central Ontario voted to close four schools and replace them with two consolidated schools. Estimates by the board set the cost of renovating four schools and replacing one at $1.3 million and the cost of building the two new facilities at $4.5 million. The rationale for the decision was that the board could get funding for the new schools, but could not get funding for renovation and upgrading of the existing facilities.

Recommendation 19 of the select committee on education states, "The ministry should reinstate designated allocations for renovations within the capital funding model."

We believe that if renovation funding became more available to boards, it would result in a reduction in capital demands for new school buildings and allow us to get more for our money.

With a change in renovation funding practices, boards would make decisions based on need and financial accountability, instead of on the false economy that now exists.

Mr Bennett: Trustee Carolyn Parrish of the Peel board will address the issue of financing growth related capital needs.

Mrs Parrish: Just before I begin, I would like to point out that we represent a wide variety of boards in this coalition. Much of what was said about audits and reviews at the beginning by Mr Crothers in fact is being practised in Peel. We have a trustee audit review committee. It has to have co-operation from the administration and in fact it works very well. So what he is asking for works in Peel. It is well under way right now and as a matter of fact Peel is one of the boards that is being audited this year. It was welcomed by both administration and trustees.

The reason I was asked to speak on financing growth related capital needs was I was chairman of our board for two years and as chairman of that board worked very hard on a growth boards coalition when the green paper on levies to finance new construction came out and made several delegations here. So I am the pseudo expert on growth related capital needs.

What you have on page 11—there is no point in going into all the details; I am sure you can read it—is over $1 billion in construction projections from the eight growth boards, half separate, half public, in the four growth areas. These are five-year projections based on 1989 statistics and do not have anything that is really up to date.

The growth boards consumed over 90% of last year's $300-million allocation, and as Dianne has pointed out there was very little money left for renovations. So throughout the four giant areas, those eight boards, tend to consume millions of dollars every year.

The $300 million that was put aside by the government last year did not begin to meet our needs.

As you can see when you read through here, we have 100 students in 2,500 portables. The lot levy legislation was passed last year, but so far has not been implemented, does not even address those backlogs. All it talks about is new capital needs, which is what we described on page 11 as $2 billion worth.

I am here to help you. Do you not love it when they come to help you?

Interjection.

Mrs Parrish: No, I am not with the government, but I would like you to help us.

One of the difficulties we have is that the levy legislation is sitting there and it seems to have been mothballed. We would like to help you free up money for renovations and other things that you want to put money into in education. One way of doing that is to help us implement lot levies and that is only a beginning.

After lot levies there are many creative ways of funding schools. Developers have spent years making money in this province and I am sure they are here to help us as well. There are many creative ways of funding capital expenses, like large $20-million secondary schools. They are listed here on page 13 as a starter.

Allow school boards to buy and sell land and build on it, thereby developing a capital pool and providing more flexibility and greater cost saving over time. With the levy legislation, we have received permission within the last six months to start buying property ahead of when we need it. That is a major step forward, because the price of land is dropping right now so that we could be in good shape if we are now allowed to continue doing that.

Expand the possibilities for boards to receive land or allow school construction from developers in lieu of levies.

Permit boards to lease commercial space for education purposes with appropriate grants. There would be no difficulty for most large boards in setting up onsite strip plaza parking lots, renting space, if we could get grants for it, which cannot.

Encourage the building industry to pursue leaseback proposals and reassess the types of grants given to boards for this purpose.

Consider designating school sites in the same way parkland is designated now, at no cost to local taxpayers. School grounds are no less significant than parks are to the well-being of a community.

The Roman Catholic separate school boards and the public school boards have had little reason to co-operate since the introduction of Bill 30. Competition for funds and facilities has been a significant barrier to this co-operation. We remain strongly unified in pursuit of an innovative funding proposal that will equitably distribute much-needed funds for the ultimate benefit of all students in all communities.

The NDP government made very strong commitments in education in the last provincial election.

The NDP government has an opportunity to support and encourage an innovative and forward-looking alternative to the funding of new pupil places. Education development charges are radically different from previous methods which serve to increase debt while falling well short of what is absolutely essential to the health of the education system of this province.

I remember sitting here in front of the Liberal government about a year ago and congratulating it on doing something really innovative and I really hope that legislation is implemented and I really hope that this government continues it because it will be beneficial to all of us.

As a little footnote, I have attached some statistics, if you will forgive me, particularly for the Peel board, because if you are considering where you are putting your money in the next year, one of the things that I have heard a lot about and all of us have heard a lot about is putting maximum class sizes on junior kindergarten and kindergarten. This is a capital funding problem.

As you can see on the last page, it will cost the Peel Board of Education $55 million in one fell swoop if you put those maximum class sizes on JK and K, so I would just caution everyone, unless you have a lot of money to hand out with it. The local taxpayers in the growth board areas will be hit very hard if maximum class sizes are put on those two grades.

Mr Bennett: I would like to close by simply saying that what the Ontario School Board Reform Network exists for is to provide opportunities for reform-minded trustees like ourselves to come before committees like this to urge changes and reforms which we hope will improve our system of local education governance, and in your particular case to enhance and to strengthen financial accountability, which we believe should continue to reside with trustees. We are the stewards and are responsible for managing those resources, but we need your help. Some of the things that we have advocated today we hope will open up some new possibilities for co-operation with the people here at Queen's Park.

We look forward to a few of your questions.

1610

Mr Fletcher: I am addressing this question to Mr Crothers who was speaking before. When it comes to your budget presentation and the wish list or whatever else is going on in the number of meetings you have, the final decision does rest with trustees when they vote on the budget, does it not?

Mr Crothers: In the school boards themselves, yes, it does.

Mr Fletcher: And you want more autonomy, you want more power over that budget?

Mr Crothers: The reference is in two things: One is an audit process, which in fact measures, relates the expenditures during the course of the year to the actual budget processes. Collectively, trustees have the authority to request that, but it has to be done collectively. If the majority of the trustees on school boards do not request it, then it does not happen. I think it should be required. I think that is the essence of the presentation.

The other difficulty, which is in the second part of what I was talking about, has to do with the school year. With so many of the decisions regarding policies or programs to be implemented, you really do not get an initial immediate reflection of the costs on the budget because your school board budgets are done on a calendar year, but your school year is on a September to June school year. You do not get the full impact in any one single budget. It is spread over two budgets. So you do not really get the impact of the cost of some of these programs.

Mr Fletcher: One more: Is this action being taken because school boards are not fiscally responsible? Is that what you are saying?

Mr Crothers: I am not saying that. What I am saying is that I do not think the trustees in many of the boards really understand and have all the information that is required in order to make a reasonable educated decision regarding the budget. That is different than suggesting that the budgets are not responsible, because the administration does produce budgets which, for the very most part, are pretty responsible documents. What I am saying is that the trustees who are responsible for that do not have the wherewithal in the current situation to really make informed—they are acting on trust, and that may not be the best situation.

Mr Bennett: Could I add a little bit to this, because I think you pointed out a bit of a dichotomy on what we presented, and that is how the role and the authority of trustees can be enhanced by the further activities and extension of the Office of the Provincial Auditor, which is a good question because on the surface it appears that it might restrict local authority.

Our position, and our view of this, is that by conducting these audits it turns up enough evidence, enough material and enough background evidence of the way the boards operate to give the trustees information and evidence and, if you want, a bit of ammunition to come forward and try to enhance accountability at the school board level. What we know is that when the audits are announced in the school boards that have been done, right away there is a flurry of activity and it in fact has a beneficial effect on the school board systems.

We have heard the case of Peel where it has provoked a serious look at its budget process, where it provokes a more careful accounting of what is going on. It also serves to educate the trustees who, after all, are ordinary lay representatives, and many of them do not have the financial expertise that is required to properly scrutinize board expenditures. Indeed the whole financial control system is not in place in many of the school boards anyway.

Mr Phillips: I found it a very interesting presentation, and it is much broader than just the just the finance. It is almost like part of this should be at another committee somewhere, I guess; social policy or something.

Just to respond to your various recommendations on the fiscal year, I think there is some merit in that argument, the point I made earlier in saying I think right now six-tenths of your budget is gone, right now, until the end of June, and then you have four months in the fall. So you do face an unusual circumstance. The problem, I gather, is going to be marrying the tax levy with the municipalities and that sort of stuff. I think from experience that is a challenge you have and maybe there is some merit in that recommendation.

Mr Crothers: From what I understand, in Canada Ontario is the only province now that does not have school budgets based upon the school calendar year as opposed to the—

Mr Phillips: Yes. If you get a surprise in the general legislative grants now, you are dead. You might get a surprise; I do not know.

The audit committee one is a balancing act, I think, between the government. I cannot speak for it, but it is, where do you help the school boards and where do you intrude on the local autonomy? You are suggesting that the government should instruct all boards to have audit committees. Maybe that is right, although Carolyn's board has already set its own up.

I always found it difficult when I was a school trustee. I said: "Province, keep your nose out of our business. If you want an audit committee we'll set one up," that sort of thing. I think that will be just a challenge for the government, but maybe an audit committee is sufficiently central that it should look at it.

Mr Crothers: Part of what I was suggesting, and I suggested this as perhaps a valued reform—I backed away from that and said that if you instituted regular provincial audits, I think most of the boards would do that on their own without being required to do it.

Mr Phillips: Just on the last three points you made, your suggestion on the capital program I think is a serious one. Are there examples where we end up encouraging boards almost to build the school rather than doing something more creative? Maybe there is something. I know in the health area that rather than looking at building more beds, those same funds have been used for community-based facilities sorts of things.

Again, we will have little impact on that, frankly, it will be the government that does that. But I think there is some merit in giving school boards the option where they can see that they could justify and get a capital project, a new building, done. A better alternative is renovation of giving them the chance to make that point. I think there is some good merit in that.

The lot levy, I tried to get an answer for you with an earlier presentation and did not, so I guess you will hear the due course, as they say. On the creative capital one, I think probably the government will be looking at that, not only in education but other areas. I think the Treasurer has given some indication of more creative capital.

The challenge in all of that, in my opinion, is to make sure that we do not just further indebt ourselves, if you will, because it is very tempting to say to someone, "You build us a school and we'll lease it," and all you are doing really is just paying someone else for the debt. It is a very seductive sort of thing. I think you will see that even with hospitals and stuff like that. I know in Alberta they are building private sector hospitals and leasing them.

I think if the government goes in that direction, and again it will make its own decision, it will have to ful that it does not put itself just into debt in a non-creative way; again, I think with probably some creative thinking.

Mrs Parrish: One of the things Peel has done as a goal is to decide leasing is something to pursue, as long as it is lease-to-purchase. I think if you are in a position where 20 years from now the developer still owns the school or the property or whatever it is, then you are doing exactly what you said; plus, in 20 years try to close that school because you do not want to pay exorbitant fees to it or whatever. Any lease proposals we are looking at in Toronto home builders are intricately involved with lease-to-purchase.

Mr Phillips: I do not know how much help our committee can be to this group because of the subcommittee's recommendations. They touch on the pre-budget, but they are almost an operation of schools.

Mrs Parrish: I would suggest that if you can encourage a lot of levies to go through, you are going to help your committee getting considerably.

Mr Phillips: I tried my best.

Mrs Sullivan: Mr Phillips has asked a lot of the questions and made many of the comments I would have made. Coming from a growth area as I do, I think many of the things you have raised are particularly significant in terms of capital, and I am very supportive of some of the recommendations you have made relating to creative methods of financing that could be introduced.

I am looking at a comment that you have on page 12, suggesting that most boards are carrying increasingly burdensome debt loads from debenturing new construction. I recall, and you may remember these figures better than I, the school board debenturing costs are certainly well below their portion of the OMB maximums allowed for borrowing. In fact, the recommendations most recently have been that school boards are not debenturing enough. Under how you have reached that conclusion. Is it around 10%?

Mrs Parrish: I think it is even higher than that. I think boards are allowed to debenture up to 10% or 12%.

Mrs Sullivan: I mean the existing levels. There is still a lot of room.

Mrs Parrish: Some boards do not debenture at all.

Mrs Sullivan: Right.

Mrs Parrish: The Peel board, for example, was given permission to build five schools over the next three years, so we need them desperately so we have interim-financed a couple of them until the grants come in.

Another example of where we have to debenture is that we had to buy 120 portables last year. By the time they are installed, wired and fireproofed, they are $65,000 a portable and because we are a growth area we do not get any money for portables at all. A portable is going to have a useful life of 20 years, so we debenture those on a 10-year debenture. But I know the Peel board carries a much lower debt load than whatever its limit would be.

We do not debenture frivolously. For example, we would not debenture a renovation now, we just postpone it. So what we are debenturing in the Peel board is absolute necessity and what we are debenturing on short term in some cases is just to get those elementary schools up and running, because we have schools with 13 and 14 portables on them. The problem with that with a junior school is that you have a lot of kids using the same washrooms, the same library facilities, the same lunch facilities and it is really a heck of a strain on the whole facility. And then you have all the busing costs for holding schools. So we debenture only what is absolutely necessary. We do not do it frivolously.

But I know some boards do not have any debentures at all. I know Durham does not. And that has just been their policy for years, and I know the government says: "Okay, we carry debt; let's transfer some of it down to you guys." Peel is doing its share. We are debenturing what has to be done.

Mrs Austin: Can I add something to that? At the board I am with, we are building several schools because we have a lot of growth. But when we went to debenture for our capital funding, we had quite a bit of trouble getting a debenture because the county and the town had gone way up to their limit and we were told that because we wanted to debenture, to share that with all the same taxpayers, it would be very difficult for our community. We are faced with several other new school constructions and we probably are going to have difficulty even getting debentures.

Mrs Sullivan: Are you talking about debentures for interim funding of schools that have been approved or sort of leaping the list, if you like?

Mrs Austin: No. These are schools we have received approval to build, so we get about 50% of the amount the school costs, and the additional 50% we are debenturing. We ran into difficulty when we went to debenture because of the situation we are in in our community with the county and the town.

Mrs Sullivan: Just as an aside, and there is not a question involved here, I do not think, but I was interested in your suggestion that some boards are in fact moving into new capital expenditures rather than renovation. I can tell you that is sure not happening in our area. We are taking whatever we can get and doing with it what we can get, but I thought that was an interesting comment.

Mrs Parrish: Could I also add, in Peel we renovated a large secondary school and we are only two thirds of the way through—it has been a three-year plan—and we have exposed asbestos, we have had problems like you would not believe. It ended up that by the time we are finished it is going to be $18 million to renovate; it would have been $21 million to build a brand-new facility. So I do not agree that it is cheaper. I think what Dianne was talking about was small renovations in a fairly solid building. When we get to the position where we get absolutely no money for renovations in Peel because we are sucking up so much for our new capital expending on population, then it costs us a fortune to do that. And we have to do that all on the local taxpayers' hook.

Mr Bennett: It is an interesting thing. The demand for renovation and repair funding comes from the urban school boards like Metropolitan Toronto and some of the older areas that would like to see more money put into renovation and repairs, and from some of the rural and small-town school boards such as Victoria county where they have buildings that are a part of what is called the consolidation movement. People like Dianne Austin and others are trying to ensure that these small schools are not closed unless there is a good reason to close them. So you have a rather interesting combination of forces at work there urging more money being put into renovation and repair.

Mrs Sullivan: You did not talk at all about transferring assets between boards, between separate boards and public boards, depending on changing demographics. Is that something your committee has looked at?

Mr Bennett: One of the things you have to keep in mind is, with our network we try to stay with our mandate. Our mandate is to promote reform and our mandate is to bring forward things that strengthen public accountability and financial accountability. Our view so far has been that that lies outside our mandate, and we certainly have different views within us on some of those questions, so we try to focus on those particular things that are within our mandate.

Mrs Parrish: And speaking very practically from a growth board area, the Dufferin-Peel Roman Catholic Separate School Board's needs are every bit as desperate as ours, if not more so. So there would be absolutely no question of transferring property between the two of us, because we are both sitting there with—we have 600 portables; they have about 550. So there is no need to transfer. What we just need is more space.

Mrs Sullivan: We were able to do it in Halton with one school in the downtown core of Oakville, and that worked and saved a lot of money in the long run.

Mr Bennett: I think the spirit that underlies our movement and the reform movement of trustees is that we are in a post-Bill 30 environment in education in Ontario, and we are looking forward, we are not looking back. We are trying to confront some of the issues that exist now and not fight old battles and return to things that were settled some time ago.

The Chair: I have two questions myself about the lot levies. I had a meeting with one of my school boards, and the board indicated to me that it was hesitant about moving in the direction of collecting the lot levies because of the impending lawsuits that the first one who starts to do the lot levies is going to meet. We were told last week by the Ontario Home Builders' Association that in fact the first person who uses those lot levies is going to court.

Mrs Parrish: If it is a constitutional challenge, I would hope that the government will foot the bills for the legal challenge because it will mean it is going to save you $300 million a year. If it is an individual one, I find it highly doubtful that there will be individual lawsuits. I think what is going to happen is that it will be a constitutional challenge against all boards.

As a growth boards coalition we were trying to get our bylaws prepared at exactly the same time and look at the same time so they will take on the strongest challenge rather than some little tiny board that rushes in. So I would really hope—and I probably should have thrown this out here—that when that constitutional challenge hits, whether it will, the government will take on that challenge.

The Chair: Maybe you can bring me up to date. The lot levy legislation has not been implemented yet. Is it about to be implemented? Where is it?

Mrs Parrish: It has been made law but the difficulty we are having is that we keep getting new sets of regulations coming out. "Okay, fill in all the blanks." We fill in all the blanks, we send them back and they go, "Oops, we just changed it again." And to me, in my humble opinion, it looks like stalling. It looks like, I think, the government is a little bit afraid of the challenge. They are a little bit hesitant because they are not as familiar with the legislation as the previous government was, and I just think that is one of those things that they are a little bit afraid; they are sticking their toe in the water but it is a little bit chilly. I would hope that somebody speeds it up because the challenge is inevitable, but I think the benefit to the province over the next three years is $900 million. I would hope that is something that is worth fighting for.

The Chair: My other question has to do with the rapid expansion of schools, and I know what it is like to be in a school with 15 portables. When the population boom happened in the early 1950s, can you give me any indication of how they financed the rapid expansion of the education system in those years?

Mr Bennett: If you are looking at me, I am the historian.

Mrs Parrish: He is older than the rest of us.

The Chair: I was just sort of looking.

Mr Bennett: It is not that I am the oldest, it is that I study history, Ontario history as a matter of fact. I guess there was a different regime, the provincial support for education was much greater. I could go back and we can look at the percentage of support for education. Every school board got more in terms of provincial grants, and I think it was just the different setting.

I need not point out to you that education was always a number one priority of governments here at Queen's University throughout most of that period. The result of that was a higher percentage of the provincial budget went to education. So an awful lot more money was put into education and there was less of the burden transferred to the local taxpayers. That is what financed the growth of the system in the 1960s, and provincial support for education reached its peak—what year was it?

Mrs Parrish: Early 1970s.

Mr Bennett: Early 1970s, 1971 I think, in fact, that is where there, and it has been significantly falling off ever since then. That would be the answer to that particular question. Of course, we have an entirely different financial regime an entirely different approach to financing education has evolved over the last 10 or 15 years.

So it would be nice to turn the clock back, but I think answers to our problems, frankly, lie in a combination of provincial legislative grants, increased and enhanced local grants, and some of these innovative schemes which will draw capital from other sources and bring it to bear on the problem. Some of those things are illustrated in brief. That is what I think is where we are going to find solutions to our problems.

Mrs Parrish: And if I could add something, back in the boom days they were building brick and mortar buildings and then in the Peel board in the early 1980s we sold down 13 schools and transferred them over to other cities and got money or whatever. What Peel designed eight years ago was what we call portapacs. We had core schools and they have movable wings on them, so the kids do not have to go outside; they can just sit down the hall. But these are demountables and Peel gets credit for designing those. Other boards are duplicating them all over the province, so we will never get in a position where we will be selling off schools.

As educators, builders and planners, we are being far more careful about that, because it is very traumatic to sell down a local community school. Now you can just count some of the excess classrooms and move them somewhere else, or whatever. So we are building far more fully now. Those boom days created a lot of problems. Schools went up on every corner and then were all sold off in the early 1980s. What we are doing now is building something that is far more practical.

The Chair: My last question has to do with this line on page 13. It says, "Schools are no less significant than parks are to the wellbeing of a community." Given that developers are responsible for giving somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5% of the land that they are developing to the town in terms of park land, in a quick answer, is that what you are advocating here, that they also be responsible to give land?

Mrs Parrish: The quickest answer I can give is yes.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation. I understand the Ontario Women's Action Coalition cancelled. Is that correct? They are not here.

McMASTER STUDENTS' UNION INC

The Chair: Our next presentation is McMaster Students' Union. Today we have Brian Leblanc, who is a member, and Gary Collins, president of the Manufacturing—sorry, McMaster Students' Union. I should have gotten right because I went to McMaster.

Mr Leblanc: A long time ago?

Mr Collins: I would like to thank you for allowing us to make this presentation today. My name is Gary Collins. I am the president of the McMaster Students' Union and I will be making a presentation concerning university education here in Ontario.

A few introductory words about the McMaster Students' Union. We are a student organization that represents 11,000 full-time undergraduate members at McMaster. The students' union provides representation and we also provide services. The services that we offer range from a day care centre to a licensed establishment to a grocery store to a graphics department to a radio station. In the representation we provide, we try to make briefs to municipal, provincial and federal politicians and we try to represent the view of students. We have a 35-member assembly. Today we would like to outline some of our concerns with education in Ontario. Brian will speak on education.

Mr Leblanc: There are several things we want to touch on. It is too bad that Kimble Sutherland is not here. I met him when he was president of the students' council at the University of Western Ontario. I am sure he and I share almost identical views on this topic, so it would be nice to have some support from him. I am just going to run through sort of a preliminary overview and then some things we think need to be done.

We think government expenditures on education are an investment in our society. I think if we do not invest in our human capital, then we will be going nowhere as a province and as a country. Ontario is the engine that drives Canada, essentially, and if we are not producing qualified graduates, then our country will be in dire straits.

I am sure that you are all aware that our universities are chronically underfunded. Student-faculty ratios are rising. The space shortages, delayed maintenance and decreased real expenditures on capital purchases and library expenditures and things like that are all over the system. Clearly we do not have the kind of system that I guess you all had when you went to university, if you did. I am sure you would recognize McMaster, if you came back now, as a very different place than when you went. I think if we do not give a tremendous amount of more money to the system, the myth of quality and accessibility will be exactly that, as there is no way we can sustain the system as it currently is.

I will give you an example of this kind of decline. In the political science department at McMaster, there is a tremendous lack of professors and there is a lack of continuity in education because of that. Honours students have to produce a thesis in fourth year for the faculty adviser who taught them the course. That is proving impossible because none of the professors who were there could give them courses. They are all on leave or they are all taking off or they have simply left the system or they have gone to the United States or they have just moved out. It is becoming impossible to finish an honours degree in the four years that it would normally take you.

Increased expenditures on faculty would eliminate that problem because there would simply be more faculty for the students. Enrolment at McMaster has gone from 8,300 students in 1979-80 to 10,700 in 1989-90, and at the same time, over those 10 years, the province is spending $1,900 less per student. I think it is almost ridiculous to think that we are delivering the same kind of education to students today as we did then. I am not saying that 1979-80 or even 10 years was some kind of nirvana for the system because if you look back at the materials from that period, they were screaming that they were underfunded then.

If they were upset then, than clearly we should be quite upset now. The government has consistently said that it is committed to accessibility and quality. It has not backed that up, though, with money, essentially over the last 20 years. There are available resources to give to the university system that just have not been getting there. Over the last 10 years, increases to universities have gone up 5.7% in real terms and transfers to health care have gone up 113.8% in real terms. There is money there, obviously. It is just a matter of political will and desire in spending it in the system.

The current government pointed this out consistently when it was in opposition. They would scream up and down every time there was a funding announcement about universities. I think they have a golden opportunity to arrest the decay in the system right now in their first budget. It is time to put some action to the words that they had said for years.

It is NDP policy to to eliminate tuition fees because I believe as a party it shares our belief that the university system is a system whereby you create social change. It is not a system where you go and you purchase a commodity which is education, but a system where you use it as a tool to change our society and to make our society more equitable. You have a beautiful opportunity in your first budget to actually put that idea into practice.

Another thing I want to talk about is a problem, I believe, in the way the universities are funded by the government. Currently, if you are not all aware, it is a sort of convoluted corridor funding system formula with a series of other envelopes for special projects. I am not sure how you people feel because you have never made a funding announcement about universities, but they used this scheme to sort of distort the amount of money they were giving to the system. Last year, then-Treasurer Nixon said there was going to be an 8% increase for universities. In fact that was not true because it was not an 8% increase in operating. It was 8% in total outlay and most of that went to special programs. The actual increase in operating was about 2.2% to 3.5% per institution depending on the institution, and as we all know, inflation was somewhat more than that and enrolments have risen 25% in the last six years.

Clearly they are not getting the kind of money they should. What we think should happen is that they should move the envelope funding system down one more level and create a series of targeted envelopes for universities based on undergraduate education, graduate education, administration, libraries, physical plant, whatever.

You can compartmentalize it and target the funds going to the universities in the way you want them to or in the way they are meant to be spent by some formula, because 70% of the funding for McMaster University comes as a direct result of the undergraduate enrolment that is there, yet only 30% of that money goes to undergraduate teaching and undergraduate services. I think that is ridiculous. I think the undergraduates, if that is the way we are going to fund our system, should be benefiting from that money and I think the provincial government should exert some kind of control over the way that is going.

We can restructure the way we fund it all we want, we also need money and the Council of Ontario Universities has said in its brief about fixing the system, which I touch on in a minute, that we need an extra $410 million base operating this year to bring the system back to some kind of health. I share that view, except my figure that calculated was about $506 million. That was based on year's Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations funding request which was ignored by the government. We are talking about a considerable amount of money—$500 million is not peanuts—but in relation to the size of the provincial budget it is not actually that large.

Now to tuition: In 1987-88 Ontario universities got about 63% of their income from government grants, the rest of Canada got about 70%; that is, about 7% more. Tuition fees in Ontario were about 15% of operating expenditures. In the rest of Canada it was about 10%. I think at the very least, in terms of tuition, the government should freeze tuition fees where they are now until our average tuition fee contribution to operating funds comes to the national average, to about 10%.

I think that the COU recovery plan—I do not know if everyone is familiar with it, but it was calling for a $500 dollar-per-student increase, and I think that is ridiculous because in its own brief it said the provincial government should obviously be the one paying this. They say that it will not, so let's hit the student. I think it is deplorable that these university administrators are having to call for tuition increases which they know will hurt students. They know it. They say, "Let's use some of the money for accessibility." I think it is ridiculous if they are forced into that position because of government intransigence on this issue. I think the government should pick up the cost, and they said so in their brief. I hope you people believe that when you are making the funding announcement.

In 1978-79, OSAP was allowing $65 a week as an allowance to students. I do not know where they got that figure of $65 a week, but I guess they assumed it was adequate then. In 1991, it is $121 a week per person living. The cost of living index over that time increased 128% and living allowances only increased 86%. Students are being starved in terms of assistance when they go to school, so I think that issue also needs to be addressed.

There is a series of recommendations at the end. I will not run through them to save time, but I hope you people read this. If you have any questions, I would be happy to answer.

Mrs Sullivan: I have a question. I know that you did not read through your brief and I am caught by a sentence on page 15 as one of the questions that you are asking, "the university of the masses inherently low quality due to the presence of a greater number of average students?" I was interested today in a conversation we had with the Ministry of Colleges and Universities officials who were discussing some of the needs of the university system in the college system over a period of time. One of the predictions that came forward was that there would be perhaps an increase in post-secondary enrolment in colleges and universities. I am wondering why you are asking this question.

suggesting a limit in admissions based on academic and with attendant changes and funding pressures? Is this here?

Mr Leblanc: Actually, that question is sort of almost obvious question because when we had—

Mrs Sullivan: It does leap out of the page.

Mr Leblanc: Yes. The system people referred to as which was of good quality was in the 1950s, and as all know that system was essentially for rich white. In the 1960s we embarked on a process of accessibility it was government policy. Since the accessibility policy has been attempted to be implemented, it seems quality has gone one down because the funding levels have decreased since then. So it is sort of a facetious question. Will we only fund an elite system properly? That is essentially the point I was making.

Mr White: Perhaps in deference to the committee members, you should have said a majority of white males and a few very exceptional women.

Mr Leblanc: True. Actually I think that is horrible, because I do not think you have got to be exceptional if you are a woman to go to a university.

Mrs Sullivan: That is not the case these days.

Mr Leblanc: No. It is not the case. There are more women than men in the system.

Mrs Sullivan: Except at the graduate level.

Mr Leblanc: Except at the graduate level, yes.

Mr Hansen: I would like to say we know your concerns. I have two of my children, one in college, one in university, so I have related back to me exactly what is going on there on certain levels. Not only that, Kimble, our new member of the government, gives us quite a few examples back there in London. We do hear your concerns and we are going to have to address them as best we can. Your concerns are being listened to, and the other universities and colleges also. It seems to be about the same voice across the board. It is no different whether you are at McMaster or you are at London.

Mr Leblanc: It is true. It manifests itself in different ways on different campuses, but the situation is truly horrible. Mr Wiseman, if you went to McMaster, when you were there were about 15 students for every faculty member. Now there are about 20, and that is ridiculous.

Mr Hansen: I am a little bit older than even Jim Wiseman. I had my education in the United States because that was the closest available college and university to go to.

The Chair: I have a question. It stems from the brief we received from the Western student union. They requested that a policy for funding and moving towards a tuition could be funded out of tax increases for students who have graduated from university and therefore are in a better position to fund it because they are in the higher income-earning jobs in the economy. Do you care to comment on that?

Mr Leblanc: It is fascinating that Western would ask that. I guess you are talking about an income-contingent repayment plan similar to what they have in several other countries. Well, first off, I would say that we have a truly progressive and proper income tax system. Talk like that would be ridiculous because, if you are making more money, you would be paying proportionately more taxes. Something like that would be ridiculous because it would already be happening without any special programs.

If you are going to tell me that you are going to institute a truly progressive tax system and eliminate tuition fees, I think that is wonderful. I think that should happen anyway. If you are talking about an income-contingent repayment plan, what you are talking about is students paying about 10 times as much in tuition as they are now because the interest on the loan, because it will still be sort of a loan. They will keep a running tally and—there are some figures in the recent OFS report—if you borrow $14,000, you will end up paying another $16,000 extra that you did not borrow. I think that is ridiculous.

The Chair: That depends on how long it has been amortizing and on what your rates are.

Mr Leblanc: I believe they were doing it over 10 years. I think an income-contingent plan is ridiculous. I think what we should do is redress the province's tax system and do it through that avenue. If we did have a progressive tax system, then we would not need tuition fees because if I benefit from the university system, I will be making more money obviously, and if I am making more money, I will be paying more taxes and I will be paying progressively more taxes.

Mrs Sullivan: That is a very questionable point of view. There are many people without a university education who are in fact earning very large amounts of money and making their contribution to the tax system now. Frankly, I get upset, and I did with the Western students who were here, with the assumption that post-secondary education automatically will now and in the future keep you in the maximum income levels of society. Surely to goodness, if that is the case, then we are doing something awfully wrong with other levels of training.

Mr Leblanc: I think I would agree with that, although statistically the highest income earners are all holders of university degrees. That is not something that I mean; that is just a fact of our society. I agree.

Then let's use the education system and the university system in particular to effect some kind of equality across the board in this province. It is a tool for social change; it takes people and it gives them opportunities that they otherwise would not have. I do think that, sure, people who do not have university educations earn lots of money and they are in high income brackets, but I also think that education is just in general a social good.

You are not just learning how to do something, how to be an engineer, how to be a political scientist or how to be a lawyer. University experience teaches you much more than that. It is not simply classrooms. It is creating good citizens. University education creates good citizens, and I think there is a general benefit for the society in creating good citizens.

Mr Phillips: Just in fairness to the previous students, I heard what they said differently personally. I thought what they said was, "Reduce tuition fees until they are zero and you will get it anyway from us because we will earn more." I did not hear them say a specific tax.

1650

Mr Leblanc: Actually, that is very true.

Mr Phillips: In case you bump into them and get into a fight with them.

Mr Leblanc: I have heard that same thing. Actually in increased taxation due to augmentations in income, you pay off the subsidy the government gave you for your tuition. They are usually talking about eight years.

Mr Phillips: That is what I thought they said. You would have to look at Hansard just to find out what they really said. That is how I interpreted it.

Mr Leblanc: But you pay off your subsidy in about eight years now apparently.

Mr Phillips: I believe that the direction the last government took was to increase the grants to the universities and colleges at the same rate as the increase in tuition. That I think was to try to get more money into the system. I know this is a difficult question for you, but you have two recommendations here. One is to increase the rate, to get the $410 million incremental money in here and the other is to have tuition fees decreasing as a percentage of—

Mr Leblanc: Sure, in other words, freeze tuition fees.

Mr Phillips: I am just trying to get an idea if you can give us any hint on your priorities. Is it more important to the system to reduce tuition fees or to increase the funds in the system?

Mr Leblanc: That is an interesting question.

Mr Phillips: Normally it does not get an answer, by the way.

Mr Leblanc: Let me talk about the previous government. Sure, they increased tuition and grants by the same number, and if they had increased tuition in operating grants by the same number, then that would have been fine. But as I said, tuition went up 8% and real operating went up about 2.5%, so that is not really the case. I am not really sure but I think if we freeze tuition fees, you would not have to touch them. If you just gave the extra $410 million, that would redress the problem right now and tuition fees would drop to about 10% of the take.

Mr Phillips: Is that right? I thought that the system said it needs $410 million more in it.

Mr Leblanc: Yes, for next year. So if the government gives all of that money, the tuition as a percentage of the new figure will be about 10%.

Mr Phillips: Just in case that does not happen, which I doubt, but just to provide a contingency plan, have you any direction for the—

Mr Leblanc: I would say give us more money in operating and, if you want increased tuition by CPI, if that is what you are asking me—

Mr Phillips: That is what—

Mr Leblanc: I am saying tuition levels are too right now and I just fear they are just going to get higher. But if you are asking me to choose between $410 million for the system or an extra $50 on tuition, I will take $410 million.

Mr White: I just want to add to a couple of things. One brief comment along the lines that Mrs Sullivan suggested, and I think you replied excellently, that the purpose of a university education is not simply an input toward the desired output of increased income, but rather a broader view of human perspective and an increase in general benefit to our community as a whole. Certainly, that has been the discussion we have heard through decades at the university in erudite and sometimes useless conversations.

Mr Leblanc: Never useless.

Mr White: No, no, they are part of the broader experience, are they not? But I am curious in terms of the tuition issue. There is a need of course, if there is any increase of tuition increase even comparable to the increase in operating expenses, etc, for that increase to be equitable, to be done in a way which does not deprive those who have a limited income of the opportunity of gaining access to the college and university system. Do you have any suggestions as to how that might occur, if there needed indeed to be any increase?

Mr Leblanc: How to maintain accessibility in the face of tuition increases?

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mr Leblanc: It is a very difficult question, because tuition is a very small percentage of the outlay of cash in university education. What it is is a number that people say, "Oh, I can't pay that." It discourages people. They say, for every $100 increase in tuition you lose 1% in enrollment, in demand. So it is not the tuition itself that is the impediment; it is the notion that it is so high. It is a psychological barrier, not necessarily a financial barrier, though it is a financial barrier as well. It is a psychological barrier because they see living costs and everything.

If we move to an all-grants OSAP system, we would in effect be cheaper than the current system because of the interest costs the government pays—this program of OSAP, was invented in the 1970s when interest costs were really low and the real cost of carrying a loan was about 0.5% to 1%, so it was really cheap. Now the interest rates are so high that the government carries them for four years and it ends up costing almost as much in total interest as the loan would cost if you just gave the money away without carrying the interest for four or five years.

If you go to an all-grants program and fix the holes in the OSAP system—I mean, the method of assessment is ridiculous. I think it is demeaning for adults to have to send in their parents' T4 slips to get student assistance. I mean, my God, I am an adult. What does how much parents make have to do with whether I should be a recipient of a student loan? I think if you could fix that, that is an avenue.

But how to fix the psychological barrier that tuition is. I have no idea, I really have no idea, because I have talked to people who did not go to university and they said the tuition fee and I couldn't go." I said, "You know, real costs are just to live or to live somewhere else or books or whatever." And they said, "Yes, but I just don't pay at tuition." And I said, "Well, that is something that I don't pay."

Mr White: And yet tuition is only a small part of the

Mr Leblanc: Tuition is a relatively small part of the cost, sure, but it is a large psychological barrier because they have to pay it all at once. If you asked people in a low-income family, "Give me $1,800 now," they cannot see a way to do it.

The Chair: I would like to clarify the quote from their report. "The money should come from us, as students, and the money should come from us after graduation through a progressive income tax system." Then they went on to say, "Therefore we do feel that through the corporate tax system there should be revenues raised towards post-secondary education also."

Mr Leblanc: Sure, because next to the graduates the greatest beneficiary of the post-secondary system is of course the corporate sector, because we give them ready-trained graduates that they can plug into whatever job they want. So perhaps progressive corporate taxes might be another good idea.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee, I would like to thank you for your presentation.

Mr Leblanc: Thank you.

Mr Collins: We will be lobbying the minister, who is our local representative, Dr Allen. We will be continuing to call him and meet with him.

The committee adjourned at 1658.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 29 January 1991

The committee met at 1004 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

ONTARIO CONFEDERATION OF UNIVERSITY FACULTY ASSOCIATIONS

The Vice-Chair: Welcome to the committee on finance and economic affairs. With us today is the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations. I believe Mr Graham, the president, will be presenting. Would you identify yourself and your colleague.

Mr Graham: Good morning, Mr Hansen and members of the committee. I am Bill Graham, professor of philosophy at the University of Toronto and president of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations. To my left is Marion Perrin, who is the executive director of OCUFA, and in the audience today are Heather Oster and Glen Brown from our staff.

We want to thank the standing committee on finance and economic affairs for the opportunity to be part of the deliberations. We have appeared before this committee in the past and in the past it has been our practice to address short-term funding requirements. This year, we would like to adopt a somewhat different approach and tie the short-term requirements into some long-term issues.

If I could start just by making a quote from Walter Light, who is a former CEO of Northern Telecom. Speaking before the Conference Board of Canada, Walter Light

In the 1990s, we've got to put our money where our mouth is in terms of addressing the quality of education from elementary school up. I think it is going to take very bold, very aggressive, very innovative management. That, in other words, is our newest form of capital. And that does it mean to treat talent as capital? To me it means treating people."

He went on in this speech to say that the majority of new job entrants in the 1990s are going to be women and members of minority groups.

OCUFA shares with the present government the profound commitment to the achievement of equity in Ontario. The realization of this goal will necessitate fundamental social changes. We believe that the universities of the province have a distinct role to play in achieving a just and equitable society; but if they are going to fulfil their mandate, they too will have to embrace change, becoming more diverse institutions where those who have traditionally had low rates of participation in higher education are welcomed and encouraged.

The face of Ontario is rapidly changing. We are becoming one of the most racially and ethnically diverse societies on earth. Over the next two decades, members of minority groups will increasingly seek access to our institutions as means of achieving equal opportunity. Women, visible minorities, aboriginal people, the disabled and the poor face a barrage of systemic discrimination. Employment equity legislation, even with mandatory goals and timetables, will do no good if educational equity, that is, making it possible for people from these groups to attend post-secondary institutions, is denied.

Universities remain largely homogeneous cultures in a society which is rapidly becoming more and more heterogeneous. We believe that this situation cannot be allowed to continue, that universities must change in keeping with the changing nature of our society, in order to forestall all kinds of economic and social problems which one can see looming on the horizon in the country just south of our border.

What we would like today to share with you is a comprehensive approach to changing and reforming the province's universities. The importance of education in the future society can hardly be denied. Both socially and economically, it is important to have an educated populace. When we are beginning to be a knowledge-based society, more and more people in our society will require post-secondary education. In fact, it is now estimated that at some time in their lives most people in our province will require some form of post-secondary education. It is on the basis of this that we make our appeal to you and our response to your request to appear here today.

Among the particular problems that we see facing the province with regard to post-secondary education is the upcoming faculty shortage which we spoke to you about last year. By the year 2000, one quarter of the existing faculty members in Ontario universities will be retiring. By the year 2006, another one quarter will have retired. That means that within 15 years we will have to replace one half of the existing faculty in Ontario's universities. That is a considerable problem because we do not have any plans in place at present to make that kind of substitution.

There are not enough people in the pipeline, so to speak, to take those positions. We are not graduating enough PhDs to take those positions and we know that other sectors in the world, such as the United States, are aggressively pursuing the hiring of our best graduates because they also face the same sort of problem in regard to retirement of faculty.

You might have seen the Toronto Star this morning in which John Dirks, the dean of the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto, wrote a letter in which he refers to an article called "A Basic Sexual Mystery Is Solved," which was reported on 6 January in the Star and describes an amazing breakthrough about the differences in males and females. This scientific breakthrough was made by Dr Huntington Willard of Stanford University.

What the article did not point out and what John Dirks wants to correct is the fact that Dr Willard was formerly a member of the department of medical genetics at the University of Toronto and moved just recently to Stanford. He moved there because of the lack of commitment by the federal government to basic medical science and because the provincial support for university research was being eroded.

In other words, we are losing some of our best and finest talent already to the United States and, when the situation begins to deteriorate even further towards the end of this decade, we will be losing even more. You may have seen also in the newspapers recently reports of other high-quality faculty members who have been lost to the United States, people I personally know. Tim Colton, for example, was pulled away by Harvard University, and Allison Gopnick to Berkeley. These are high-quality faculty people whom we cannot afford to continue to lose.

If faculty shortages are allowed to occur, as we predicted they will, there may be no choice but for universities to cut back on enrolment, and the worst-case scenario is that one or more universities might be forced to close. This is a rather absurd situation because we know that the enrolment has been growing steadily in Ontario universities. Over the last 10 years undergraduate enrolment has grown by about 25%.

At the same time that universities are facing this upcoming shortage of faculty members, because of budget pressures many universities, including the University of Toronto, McMaster University and Western, are actually cutting back on faculty, and that is the absurd paradox. We are facing a situation where we need to build faculty, and instead we are having to cut back on faculty positions. So the situation is not only severe but it is being worsened by the financial situation that our universities are in.

It is imperative, therefore, that the government act quickly and decisively to meet the impending faculty shortage crisis. OCUFA has called in the past and calls again upon the government to implement a faculty growth program, including the provision of targeted funds to increase the number of tenure-stream positions at Ontario universities.

Such funding, in addition, would provide an excellent opportunity for the universities to implement employment equity programs. OCUFA is a strong proponent of employment equity and favours the introduction of legislation which includes mandatory goals and timetables.

OCUFA believes that our universities must become more welcoming institutions where special efforts are made to ensure not only access but also retention of members of the designated at-risk groups. Such efforts should include the initiation of educational equity programs and the broadening of the curriculum.

We were at a conference recently in the United States where the situation is even worse in regard to equity than it is in Canada and we were told at an interesting panel discussion that the existing curriculum should be described as white, male, European ethnic studies, as a kind of response to the describing of certain other programs as native studies or women's studies or other kinds of ethnic studies. There is no question that the curriculum in our universities will have to change to accommodate the growing diversity of our population. We also need to provide better support services and better physical arrangements for the people of different cultures and ethnic backgrounds.

OCUFA firmly believes that students should not be forced to pay for the recovery of universities through the imposition of higher tuition fees. Tuition fees are the single most significant barrier to disadvantaged groups in our society. In the United States, tuition increases and cuts in student aid have resulted in a dramatic decline in post-secondary participation rates of minority students.

OCUFA recommends that tuition fees be frozen and that the government signal its intention to eventually eliminate these altogether. We appreciate that the removal of fees cannot be accomplished in a short time frame, certainly not in the present economic climate. It depends on improvements in taxation and federal transfer payments. However, only when this goal is realized, it must be clear that equal opportunity in higher education be truly available for all of Ontario's citizens.

Support for higher education is especially needed in times of recession, so that those who are unemployed can improve their education, training and skills. University enrolment in Canada rose 4.1% this year, including large percentages of both the 18- to 24-year-olds and people over 30, but the disadvantaged are still being shut out. The fact is that a bachelor degree is now, for many employed people, what a high school diploma was 15 years ago. So with the onset of a knowledge-based economy, most people will need some form of post-secondary education at some time in their lives. If the barriers to post-secondary education for disadvantaged people are not removed, these people will not be able to compete equally for many jobs and careers which are open only to those with higher education.

The removal of tuition fees would bring Ontario into compliance with the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, which Canada acceded to by 1976 after consultation with the provinces. This covenant commits Canada and Ontario to making post-secondary education equally accessible to all on the basis of capacity by every appropriate means and in particular by the progressive introduction of free education. It is also in line with the speech from the throne which talked about making available publicly funded post-secondary education. "Strong publicly funded institutions are crucial to lifelong education," is an excerpt from the speech from the throne, 20 November.

Freezing of tuition fees must also be accompanied by the reform of student assistance programs, including, for example, increasing the current living allowance and proving eligibility requirements. In the longer term, student assistance should be restructured with an emphasis on grants rather than on loans. Students are currently graduating from four-year programs with debt loads in excess of $20,000, and this is a tremendous disincentive, especially to economically disadvantaged students.

OCUFA does not favour the income-contingent student repayment plans which have been discussed as possible alternatives to the present method of repayment. While desirable in some ways, they still impose a user fee on education. Furthermore, they do nothing to remove the burden of debt from low- and middle-income students. Education should be publicly financed by revenues generated by fair taxation, both progressive personal income taxes and taxes on corporations.

OCUFA calls on the government to move forward with the creation of its Fair Tax Commission promised in the Speech from the Throne. We believe that the revenue generated by such innovations as a minimum corporate tax and a consumption tax promised in the last election would enhance the government's ability to deal fairly with public institutions such as school boards, municipalities, hospitals, colleges and universities.

OCUFA believes that the Ontario government must play an active role also in lobbying the federal government to restore and augment the established programs financing research to increase support for research through the federal funding agencies: the Medical Research Council of Canada, the Natural Science and Engineering Research Council of Canada and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. We urge the government to challenge federal cutbacks in the courts if necessary and to participate in any consultations on education which are not open and broadly consultative.

Ontario now provides in real dollars some $1,900 less per student than it did $10 years ago and $800 less per student than the average of the other nine provinces. In terms of per capita funding for universities, Ontario is ninth out of the 10 provinces. So we wrote, together with other organizations, to the Treasurer last November urging the government to bring Ontario universities to a two-year period to an average level of per student funding for the other nine provinces. This would cost $125 million per-year over two years in current dollars.

Mr Chairman, I would be happy to discuss these proposals and to answer any questions your committee might have.

Mrs Sullivan: Dr Graham, I am interested in a couple of aspects of your report, one relating to the faculty growth fund. I know that you have been working to a certain extent with the Council of Ontario Universities in terms of developing a consensus on what the requirements are for the post-secondary sector. Their recommendation is that $100 million would be required over four years. Have you incorporated the faculty growth fund into that or do you have an estimate of the need for a faculty growth fund, in addition to that $100 million a year?

Dr Graham: That $410 million of course was an estimate made principally by the Council of Ontario Universities of what it would take to achieve recovery in the immediate future. We are concerned with not only the immediate future, but the long term. Certainly the $410 million would cover part of the recovery of faculty growth, but there would still be a necessity over the 15-year period, longer than the four-year period, to look at the kinds of shortages we are facing and what it is going to take to replace them.

Unfortunately the longer we wait the more expensive it is going to get. The more competition we get involved with for hiring top-notch faculty members, the more competition we get involved in with other provinces and especially with other countries, the more expensive it will be. Unfortunately in many areas there is quite a market for faculty members and certainly in areas that are of very great interest to the government, such as science and technology. We have seen some of the effects of some of these people being drawn off by other universities already, so in answer to the question, yes, the $410 million would do part of the job immediately, but there is a necessity to look at the long-term problem.

As you mentioned, we are working together with the Council of Ontario Universities to develop a study of the exact demand. We know what the overall parameters are, but what we are doing is looking at each separate discipline and seeing what the demand and supply situation is with regard to each discipline. The results of that study should be available some time in May.

Mrs Sullivan: I was also interested in your views relating to student tuition. Of course we have heard that argument from students in the past, and as well in student presentations before the committee this year. The COU has recommended special student fees to assist in the recovery process. I assume, because of your argumentation, that you disagree with the proposal.

Dr Graham: We do. I think we recognize the problem the COU has with regard to its assessment of funding. However, we do disagree. The position on student fees is a relatively new one for OCUFA. The fact of the matter is that we see the necessity to deal with student fees in a vigorous way as a result of the population in Ontario, the fact that we have a very large population of minority students, of women, many of whom are now single parents who require post-secondary education.

We have a growing demand, we think, by aboriginal peoples, a necessity to take the education of aboriginal peoples seriously. We need to deal with the handicapped members of our society, people for whom this kind of tuition fee increase would simply be impossible. We unfortunately feel that the Council of Ontario Universities' solution would purchase recovery at the expense of many of these disadvantaged groups and so our disagreement with them is profound on that particular issue, although we share a lot of their concerns about the nature of the situation in Ontario universities at the present time.

Mrs Sullivan: That leads us then directly into the question of student assistance programs. One of the things I have not seen in either the student presentations nor in yours is any particular emphasis on people who are returning to the educational institution who may have family obligations and so on, where there are certainly enormous pressures, which I am seeing in my constituency office, and I have not seen that emphasis and I am curious as to why.

Dr Graham: I am sorry if you have not. It is certainly one of our concerns that the people who are now making use of post-secondary education and who will need post-secondary education in the future are not simply the 18- to 24-year-old groups but people who are returning for what has been called lifelong education, for upgrading or for education in specific skills or specific disciplines to meet the new kinds of economic and social necessities.

We are becoming a knowledge-based society and people are going to have to have different kinds of skills, so they will have to return to universities. People with family obligations are going to find it increasingly difficult, especially single parents, and we know there is a growing number of them too, to face the kinds of economic pressures that people are faced with in the current financing situation of students for universities.

We are concerned, however, very greatly with people from other cultures and other ethnic backgrounds, with the poor in our society. It is very easy, from the inside of an institution, to forget that there are people outside. Believe me, it is very easy to look at the universities from the inside and to forget there are people outside who look at the universities and our post-secondary institutions in an entirely different way. We do not see the barriers from the inside. You have to get among those people and ask them and talk to them and you will find that they see something we do not see.

If you have ever been to New York City you may have seen, along some of the walls of New York City, and especially in front of garages and so forth in some of the streets, the sign, "Don't even think of parking here." I think a lot of people who are not now engaged and who do not have a family tradition of being engaged in post-secondary education look at our universities and post-secondary institutions and see a sign painted on them that says, "Don't even think of coming here."

That is largely for financial reasons, but there are also social reasons, cultural reasons, familial reasons, reasons of curriculum. There are reasons of the chilly climate they face when one or two hesitantly put their foot through the door. It is not a particularly welcoming situation for them and we want to see these problems addressed, and as a faculty association we want to play a role in addressing these problems.

Mr Fletcher: Dr Graham, I agree with a lot of the statements that appear in your document. I was just wondering about the number of professors who are going to the United States. Help me along here. I am just wondering about their funding. They receive a lot of corporate funding as opposed to the substantial public funding we receive. That appears to be one of the factors that their education system, especially post-secondary, is one that thrives. I know they can fill a football stadium with 80,000 people and a lot of that money does not just go to the athletic part of school. They are generating more money than what our universities generate. That is one of the factors, is it not?

Dr Graham: That is certainly true. I am not so sure that we should look so—

Mr Fletcher: I am not saying that either.

Dr Graham: —adoringly at their football situation because that has created a lot of other problems that they may have read about, sports programs and what they are doing with minority students who are brought in under the aegis of becoming part of a sports program, and then if they are not first-quality people they are simply pushed out the door and suffer.

US funding for the public universities is, however, on average well over 35% higher than the public funding for Ontario universities. That is an average across the country. While it is true that corporations and private funding have been more generous and that there has been more tradition for that in the United States, there is also the fact that public funding for the institutions is better.

We favour, of course, public funding. That would include not only fairer personal income tax but also tax breaks for corporations. We believe that certainly our corporations and our businesses are some of the chief beneficiaries of the graduates of our post-secondary institutions and the knowledge that is generated in our post-secondary institutions in terms of research, as well as teaching. We think that based on progressive people such as Walter Light, that the corporations and industries would be quite happy to play a fair role in supporting the kind of graduates and knowledge that will be of help to them.

Mr Fletcher: Just one more question and comment. On page 10, "Funding for Recovery and Change," I agree with your statement that at the beginning and during the recession it is going to be hard to reverse the effects of chronic underfunding, but you are hoping that at least a minimum the government will provide sufficient funding to protect the universities against inflation and honour previous government commitments, such as funding for economic growth. Do you have a dollar figure as far as that is much that is? The "previous government commitments" were these previous government commitments from the previous government or previous government commitments from this government?

Dr Graham: I think the dollar figure we had written to the Treasurer about was $125 million per year over the next five years. That would bring us up to an average position within Canada, bring us up to the middle position. We are now second to last, ninth out of 10 provinces in terms of funding post-secondary education on a per capita basis. That would bring us up to midpoint. We had hoped that this government could establish as a kind of motto for itself, "Midpoint by midterm of government," and move from there depending upon the economic situation of the province.

Mr Fletcher: As far as the commitments of previous governments, or previous government commitments are concerned, that is the previous government's, not what the New Democratic government is committed to.

Dr Graham: Yes. The accessibility funding, for example: There was some money dumped into targ ling for faculty renewal. That established 500 positions in five years. The problem with that was that it was only a partial replacement. Even after that situation we are facing the shortages.

We are looking at a major problem in terms of addressing the future complement of the faculty in Ontario. There are 13,000 faculty members. Half of them are going to be replaced in 15 years. We are pleading for some kind of program to address that, some kind of strategy to address that. We would be happy to play a role in that strategy. It is one of the things we are going to take a partnership of students, faculty, administrators and government to try to solve that issue. We would be happy to have you.

Mrs Cunningham: Good morning. It is good to see you again. You did not take the opportunity to talk about standards in any way. I know that you were focusing more on the financial aspects and certainly the future viability of even the staffing of our universities down the road, but I guess I talk about standards in the sense of quality.

One of my great concerns in the last few years has been the increased enrolment in universities without the resources, the resources, to go with it. I think certainly from your point of view as now presently the critic for the Progressive Conservative Party, I have access and make it my business to travel a lot more and hear from students. They tell us that in many instances they are not as happy about contributing—I understand that people feel differently 10 years down the road after they have left a university—than when they are on the road as graduates of the universities, because they just feel cheated with regard to the sizes of their classes and the amount of time they have with their professors. I wonder if you would comment on this whole accessibility and enrolment trend that the students are facing.

Dr Graham: I can assure you that faculty members do feel cheated and feel that the question of quality is something that must be addressed. Faculty members also do not like to be faced with hordes of students they cannot teach and cannot deal with on a personal basis. It is very frustrating. There has been as a result a lot of bad morale among university faculty. They felt teaching should be a noble and an idealistic career, yet when you are faced with the kind of numbers we are faced with, continual cutbacks in funding and a shortage and impossibility to teach people in a field, then obviously the quality is going to suffer and the quality has been suffering.

The way to address that, we believe, is to begin to hire more faculty. We are concerned that one of the consequences of doing that might be the necessity to cut back on enrolment and accessibility. We think the inevitable consequence of cutting back on accessibility would be cutting back on accessibility for the people who are already at risk, people who are from the minorities, from the poor, from the aboriginal people, the very people we have to begin to get into our institutions and give an equal opportunity to.

There is no doubt that it is a very difficult situation. Quality is slipping and even in a time of recession it seems as if that a government should be looking towards the future and saying, "What can we do now to ensure that when the recession is over people will come out of it with some education and some skills instead of simply with social problems, crises, more hunger and more poverty?"

Mrs Cunningham: You talked about the request you have for some discussion around Vision 2000. I am wondering if you see, as an active part of that discussion, the students of both the colleges and the universities, as well as the universities and colleges, being very much a part of that discussion. I am not just talking about standards when I ask you the question. I think in Ontario we have to look at what we are doing and why we are doing it. I know that is what Vision 2000 is about, but I see it as not being a credible discussion if all the partners are not part of it, even the secondary schools.

Dr Graham: I agree with you entirely. It is certainly our view that we should be looking at education from a holistic point of view. Universities have been too long considered aloof and apart from the system. That is as much a fault of people on the inside as people from the outside. We have to begin to look at universities as part of a large public-institutional higher education system. That includes primary schools and secondary schools and our college system.

We are very much interested in what happens to our colleges. We believe there should be a much closer linkage between colleges and universities and between universities and secondary schools. If we are going to make some changes in terms of increasing the diversity of our universities, it means that we are going to have to bring people through the primary and secondary school systems having some sort of a chance to take advantage of post-secondary education.

That means getting rid of certain programs such as streaming which already tell people from certain backgrounds that they do not belong, that their job is to be part of the people who have the bad jobs, to quote the little document about "good jobs, bad jobs." Certain people are already targeted from primary school as being part of the "bad jobs" category.

Mrs Cunningham: We should maybe talk about what bad jobs are these days too.

Dr Graham: We want to make sure that people have an equal chance at the good jobs, and that means linking all forms of our education. Yes, we are interested in Vision 2000. We would like to see recommendation 40, which is the implementation committee, get off the ground and we would like to play a role in that discussion.

The Vice-Chair: I would like to thank you, Mr Graham, for your presentation and submission to this committee.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SCHOOL BOARDS' ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: We have the Ontario Public School Boards' Association. Mr Checkeris, would you introduce your colleagues?

Mr Checkeris: Yes, I will. My name is Ernie Checkeris. I am a trustee with the Sudbury Board of Education and president of the Ontario Public School Boards' Association. I have with me Pat Hillhouse, a trustee from the Halton county board; Lorraine Nowina of the Etobicoke board, a trustee, and Nancy Bentley, who is with the Lambton county board.

In addition to that we have Ron Sudds, superintendent of business from Northumberland and Newcastle Board of Education; Penny Moss, our executive director of OPSBA; Bev Allen, the director of legislation and finance for OPSBA, and Cynthia Campbell is somewhere.

We are pleased to be here to present our views to you, as the members of the standing committee. I would like to say that OPSBA represents 94 public boards in Ontario of all sizes. We serve 1.7 billion students and adult learners and we speak for the public education that represents the collective interest of public school trustees across Ontario.

We have brought with us a formal brief—you have it before you—Ontario Public School Boards: Meeting the Challenge. In addition, we have given you a group of reports that you can perhaps use for background at your leisure. We do not intend to read our report. We will be discussing it and various trustees will be taking time out to tell you from their point of view parts of the report.

I do not have to remind you that there are in fact two levels of government with the responsibility for delivering and funding education for our citizens. Trustees and boards of education are in fact a government. They do collect taxes inasmuch as the Ontario provincial government does as well, so we are talking on a government-to-government basis.

We are all very well aware of the NDP election promises to raise the provincial share of costs to 60%. We have examined the issue of 60% funding and concluded that what is needed is an action plan to overhaul the existing grant program in total. What is needed is a review of school board governance and political fiscal accountability. We know it is not going to happen in a hurry. It will not happen overnight, but we do hope that in the joint government-to-government process, where we can sit around one table and attempt to resolve these fundamental issues, some action will take place. I would like at this time to ask Pat to kick off the first session.

Ms Hillhouse: As Ernie has said, we are interested in your whole issue and presenting to you, obviously, on the issue of the financing of education. The area I am going to talk about is very much in the long term. Ernie has already referred to the fact that our association, among others, including standing committees or select committees of this House have come to the conclusion that a massive overhaul of the whole system of financing education is indeed necessary in this province. What we need to be looking at and what our association is presenting for your consideration are some basic questions about, what should education be responsible for in today's society? How much should that cost to deliver? Who should be paying for it and how?

In our briefs which we have presented to the government, we have suggested a model for consultation on education finance that focuses on the government-to-government issue, as indeed school boards are elected governments responsible for the delivery of service and responsible for taxation in their area. The best form of consultation that we can see would be between the provincial government, which has a broad area of responsibility and local school boards, public boards, separate boards, francophone boards, represented by their various associations.

This government has already indicated its intention to set up a fair tax commission to look at a variety of issues dealing with taxation at a variety of levels within this province. Our association is asking you, in your submission to the Treasurer and to the government, to support our request that the Ontario Public School Boards' Association should be part of that fair tax commission in terms of representation on the commission and on its subcommittees.

As I said, we are looking at a process of consultation around the areas of education finance and consultation around the role and responsibilities of boards of education in the province. We see this as an area that requires clarification. Education, over this last number of years, has taken on or has been allocated responsibilities which formerly fell to a number of different agencies and ministries, in terms of community and social services, health, recreation and in fact on into the whole areas of justice, to juvenile detention centres and the implementation of the Young Offenders Implementation Act.

So what we are recommending is that these negotiations, these discussions between the two levels of government should involve not just the Ministry of Education but the other ministries which are concerned, and with services to young children and their families. These are long-term issues that we know will require time to study and time to implement. We also know that you are focusing on so many short-term issues. We do not feel that all of the issues that are facing school boards are necessarily long-term. There are some short-term remedies that can be brought to bear and can assist boards of education in the financing of education and on the effect on the local taxpayer significantly in this time, in the recession, when local school boards are also facing taxpayers who have significant difficulties.

I am going to ask Lorraine to talk about some of the short-term issues that we believe your committee could make some important recommendations on.

Mrs Nowina: There are a number of interim legislative and policy changes that OPSBA is requesting for immediate solutions in the upcoming budget. I will be dealing with four areas: the general legislative grant, English as a second language, pay equity and cash flow.

I think it is somewhat ironic, as a trustee from the Metro area, when I am dealing particularly with issues of funding transfers, to note that as a representative of a Metro school board, we receive no moneys from the provincial government for education. We are funded at a zero or a negative grant rate.

However, the first area I would like to draw your attention to is the 1991 general legislative grant program. Within there are two specific recommendations I would like g forward, I would also like to remind the committee OPSBA has asked for an 11% increase in the GLG it. That 11%, we feel, is necessary to ensure a moderate education mill-rate increase. We need to recognize the 1 property taxpayers who have fixed incomes, and we that 11% is a necessary figure for us.

Specifically, OPSBA would recommend that the government allocate a significant portion of the operating funds for education to the basic per-pupil grant of the general legislative grant program. Essentially, this is needed to bridge the gap between the real cost of education and the recognized or the ceiling expenditures that we receive through the GLG. I think it is important to note that the underlying principle in this request is one of equity. We need to have equity of opportunity and to equalize the funding across the province.

A second recommendation for the GLG is that OPSBA has that adequate notice and a phase-in of all potential changes to the 1991 GLG program occur so that we do not have any major surprises.

Another area that is covered by the GLG is English-as-a-second-language funding. Currently, the established program financing is that federal-provincial mechanism where funds are shared to deal with every language education need of our immigrant groups. This funding essentially is used on post-secondary education. The public school boards are playing a significant role in the language instruction for both the adults and the children in our school system, and we must have access to these federal-provincial funds.

As a Metro trustee, I would like to relate this issue particularly to what is happening in Metro. Metro is currently receiving 25% of the total immigrant population that is arriving in Canada. I have a school in my area which for the past five years has had an immigrant population of between 75% and 80%. At the beginning of the last school year, out of that 400 school population, there were perhaps 100 Somalian refugee children. By Christmas, that figure was over 100 kids. So 25% last year, and the enrolment is increasing all the time, but those Somalian refugees represent between 30% and 40% of the total school population.

The majority of those students are in the primary grades, so you have kindergarten classes, grade 1 classes, and so on. Out of 20 kids, 10 or 11 of them are Somalian refugees. You are dealing with a population that is not only suffering from the ravages of war, but young children who are tribal, nomadic, a desert people that come from an oral tradition where not only do they not know how to read and write, their parents are not familiar with the written word in their own language. It is a critical issue and it needs to be addressed. Certainly in terms of Metro, no matter what funding has been, we receive nothing to deal with these extraordinary expenditures.

Another issue that I would like to raise is pay equity. OPSBA is very pleased to hear that the government is recognizing pay equity affecting some public sector employees more than others. I do not know whether there has been recognition that there are extraordinary costs for school boards, that some school boards are affected certainly by pay equity arrangements more than others, but should the elementary teachers achieve their current objectives, there will be significant impact across the province. We are asking that the extraordinary pay equity costs of school boards be funded from this fund, as opposed to the general legislative grant offered by the Ministry of Education.

The final area I would like to talk about is cash flow, and there are two areas of cash flow. One is from province to school board—and I will try my best since I have never really had experience with that kind of cash flow. Specifically, we are asking for changes in the way the money flows to us. We would like 25% in the first three months and elimination of the 7% holdback. It should be noted, I think, that as far back as 1985 with the Macdonald commission, it was recognized that school boards need to have the funds transferred from the province on a monthly basis as expenditures are incurred with, particular emphasis on the first three months. Provinces can borrow money at better rates and there is a net reduction in public expenditures.

What we are really looking to do is to help our local property taxpayers, and I am sure that is the direction that this committee and this government also would like to follow.

The second area of cash flow issues is from municipalities to the school boards. I am not sure of how many are former trustees here or how many are former councillors, but OPSBA would ask that property taxes be transferred to school boards as they are collected. We are responsible for levying the taxes, we are accountable to our taxpayers. We should have access to those dollars to spend them as efficiently and as effectively as we can.

Now I would like to turn it over to Nancy Bentley.

Mrs Bentley: Thank you. I want to just speak briefly to another aspect of property taxes and then to concentrate on several issues with respect to the capital funding of school boards.

Payments in lieu of taxes, both at the provincial and the federal levels, are an issue of considerable concern to public school boards throughout the province. The properties of the federal government and the provincial government do not pay property taxes on the same basis as do other properties, but pay instead payments in lieu of to the municipality. Some of these payments in lieu are shared with the school sector and others are not. Basically, at both the federal and the provincial levels, the only payments in lieu of that we receive are those that are connected with residences or tenant-occupied properties.

For example, at the federal level, we do receive the payments in lieu for defence properties and residential properties owned by the federal government. At the provincial level, we have a similar situation. For example, under section 160 of the Municipal Act, the province is paid $75 per bed or student in institutions such as correctional institutions, schools and hospitals. These are not shared with school boards, and yet the school boards are providing services to all these properties.

Another example at the provincial level is property owned by Ontario Housing Corp. For those tenants, we do receive those payments in lieu of. The Macdonald commission identified this inequity of the property tax policy and recommended that the government of Ontario require that all payments in lieu of taxes be shared equitably among school boards and municipalities.

In 1982, a very long time ago, the sum of school boards' lost revenue through not receiving their fair share of all payments in lieu of was estimated then at $120 million. So it could represent a considerable revenue for school boards, and we feel there is a good reason to rethink these existing policies because payments in lieu of really are a replacement for property taxes. The school boards and municipalities are funded on the basis of property taxes. So OPSBA recommends that all payments in lieu of taxes, federal and provincial, be shared equitably between school boards and municipalities on the basis of their respective mill rates.

Another situation exists around telephone and telegraph taxes. The Municipal Act provides for the sharing of telegraph and telephone taxes in the jurisdiction between a municipality and a school board. However, in many areas of the province, such as the north, there is not municipal organization but there is, however, a school board.

Last year, again, an estimate of $2 million a year in local revenue was paid to the Ministry of Revenue and does not benefit the local school boards at all. Those payments go directly to the Ministry of Revenue. So we do recommend that the Provincial Land Tax Act be amended to enable the equitable sharing of taxation from telephone and telegraph with the local school boards in those areas without municipal organization, which would again mean a considerable revenue would flow to school boards, which we believe should rightfully be shared with them.

The capital needs of Ontario school boards have been rapidly escalating over the past five years, as I think most of you recognize. The past provincial government, in recognition of this need, did commit $1.5 billion over a five-year period. That meant that $300 million was made available to school boards since 1989.

In spite of that financial contribution, there remains a considerable backlog of need for new schools, permanent accommodation to replace portables, and particularly renovation. More than 20% of schools in Ontario are over 50 years old.

A good portion of the capital allocation grant program is going for population growth. As you are well aware, in the growth areas of the province much of the capital allocation is being given to those boards that have growth problems. This has added in great measure to the backlog in renovation capital that is required by other school boards.

We would like to point out that there is a direct relationship to the lack of receiving capital allocation by those boards that particularly need it for renovation or replacement schools, because in many cases the students are being bused across very large areas of counties and municipalities and the cost of that transportation is increasing your regular operating expenditures. The recognition of the capital needs would alleviate some of the operating expenditures.

There is a chart included with your information just illustrates the needs as they exist. You will notice the bottom of page 16—the site purchase and new places; that is, the need for new schools—the dollars were allocated in 1990 were $254 million. The school board requests were in excess of $1.1 billion. I think it is only fair to comment that that really probably does represent the full extent of the need because school boards have to be very careful in justifying a need and are extremely aware of the budgets and the mill rate that they have to pass on as a result of these expenditures.

Then if you look below that at renovation and replacement, the dollars that were allocated were $42 million and the requests were $330 million. In that area in particular you may be confident that the needs are much higher because school boards are not able to pass on any millage to the local taxpayer. As you know, last year, most of the mill rates across the province were in the double-digit region, so that represents the very minimum of renovation allowances that are needed. In other words, only 12.8% of the projects requested were funded. That gives you a pretty quick picture of the needs of the system.

OPSBA did appreciate very much the five years of government capital funding that was provided, the $1 billion. That will be completed in 1994, and we would very much like to see this government continue that practice. It provides for a much more efficient and effective way of school boards managing their resources and in the end is better for the local taxpayer.

The recommendation then is that OPSBA recognize the past provincial government's contribution to school capital funding and recommends that this government enhance and continue the commitment to multi-year capital planning beyond 1994.

The $700-million capital job creation fund was certainly a welcome announcement from the government. We feel that it was an extremely good use of the province's taxpayers' money because it will create employment in regions of the province that are hard hit by the recession.

We are aware that government announcements will be forthcoming as to the allocation of the $700 million and it is naturally the hope of the education sector and the public school boards that this significant allocation will go to school capital and renovation.

We understand that 1991 is going to be a very difficult year, but we would like to recommend to you the continuation of the job creation fund, as it will continue to provide employment for those hard hit by the recession and it will address the issue of school board capital funding for much needed capital projects. It will be a win-win situation for both our students and our citizens.

OPSBA urges the provincial government then to allocate more dollars to the job creation infrastructure fund in the upcoming 1991-92 provincial budget for public infrastructure, which would include school capital.

The other aspect of capital funding is the program itself. As you know, the ministry assists school boards in financing of their capital projects. It includes new school site purchases replacement and, as I have said, renovations. At present, the approved cost for a capital project the average rate of 60% for new school sites and 75% for other renovations.

We feel that the present capital program is inadequate to meet the needs of communities today. We are not speaking just to the adequacy of the funding to be provided to schools of education, but also to the actual structure of the program itself. There are several areas where the policy issues need to be addressed, we feel, in a comprehensive review of the approach to our capital grant program.

I would just like to draw attention to several of those issues. One key area is the allocation process by which funds are made available to boards and the criteria that are used in granting those allocations.

Prior to the allocation process, boards of education spend considerable time and energy and dollars in making proposals to the government for these capital allocations. After the allocations are received, it is very difficult for boards of education sometimes to determine why their allocations were not received because the criteria are not published in such a way that the boards can readily associate the allocations when they are given with the criteria. There is a need to have that thoroughly reviewed and, I think, for all boards of education to understand how the criteria will be applied and be readily able to observe that for the fact.

There is a continuing need for review of the policy for the ministry's funding criteria of rated capacity and operational capacity, which certainly do not gibe. In terms of the rated capacity for schools, it is impossible for us to load schools at that level, and now especially with the last government's initiative of lowering the pupil-teacher ratio in grades 1 and 2, this does not relate to the way school boards are funded for the capacity of the schools.

The permanent rated capacity that is now acknowledged by the ministry capital plan is 90% of 35 students in a classroom. Yet in grades 1 and 2 we only have 20 children, so we are funded at the 90% of 35 students. I doubt if any boards have over 30 in their classrooms or wish to have, and in grades 1 and 2 we are obliged to have 20, so funding criteria of rated capacity need to be reviewed.

We would like to see more flexibility that would encourage innovation through lease arrangements and shared community facilities. I just speak briefly to that. The green paper on finance in 1988 encouraged "innovative methods" for funding education, yet the ministry guidelines and the Education Act do not provide for such innovation.

We would like to see more flexibility for developer and school board agreement and multi-year planning and financing and leasing agreements. While these have been encouraged in the green paper, the legislation does not permit that kind of flexibility for school boards.

Another area is that joint projects should be encouraged with coterminous boards and with local municipalities and community colleges. This in fact has happened in both county, Etobicoke and Elgin county. It would be appreciated if ministry guidelines could be forthcoming with respect to the sharing and joint projects with other school boards and municipal bodies.

To sum up then, OPSBA supports the Ministry of Education's review of the capital grant program but does urge consultation on such key policies as the funding criteria, the allocation process, permitting flexibility and innovation and providing guidelines for that.

Child care capital is another area in which there is some confusion. While it has been indicated that school boards may provide child care or make provisions that it be provided within the school system, the funding capabilities continue to be inequitable. Boards that are building new schools or purchasing new school sites can do and provide space for child care. Boards that are not in a growth position at the present time have no funding and with the rated capacity have no possibility of putting child care in the schools. The whole area of child care capital needs to be examined and clarified for everyone concerned because at the moment there is considerable confusion.

1110

Our last recommendation is that the Development Charges Act has not so far provided the funding for school boards that we had anticipated, or that the previous government had anticipated, I should say. I had better clarify that one. Because this funding is not forthcoming or we are having great difficulties with it, due again to lack of clarification and procedures or progress in that area, we would like to recommend that the provincial average support rates for capital funding be raised to the 75% provincial average from the present 60%. OPSBA recommends that in the 1991-92 provincial budget the government include an announcement that school capital projects will be funded at a 75% rate of grant.

The Vice-Chair: Since we have gone into 30 minutes just on the presentation, let's see if we can get one question from each person who has his name down. Mr Sutherland is first, and then Mr Fletcher and Mr Phillips.

Mr Sutherland: You said that you would like an 11% increase in the GLGs for this year and you said that that would probably mean a moderate increase in the mill rate for people. I am wondering if you could be a little more specific in terms of what type of real impact that would have for this upcoming year, and looking at the issue in the longer term—certainly the Minister of Education was here yesterday and talked about the commitment of moving back to the 60-40. Before that can occur, I guess you have to get both levels to agree to the 100% level. I am wondering if you could give some indication as to where you think municipal increases would be even when we got to a 60-40.

Mrs Bentley: Yes, I think that we all recognize that if we are talking about relief for the mill rate, then it is not a solution simply to provide more funding for the education sector, because in all probability the municipal sector would then move into some of that space created. I think what we are saying is that the Fair Tax Commission will be looking at the whole area of municipal-provincial programs and finances and that school boards are major players in this picture. Within municipalities, school boards invariably are collecting over 50% of the taxes and, as such, we have to be players and major players in the review of these situations, recognizing that there are not simple solutions in the long term but that there are some things that we can do in the short term.

Mr Sutherland: Could you just comment on the 11% that you were asking in increases in GLG? You said that that would probably mean a moderate increase in the education portion of the municipal bill. I was wondering if you could be a little more specific than just "moderate."

Mrs Bentley: There have been some fairly reliable estimates that school boards' budget costs will increase by approximately an average of 14% this year, so when we say an 11% increase in the transfer payments, we are recognizing that this is a difficult year for all governments but that an 11% increase in the transfer payments would enable school boards to hold that mill rate increase somewhere below what it was last year, when in many municipalities it was certainly well into double-digit increases.

Mr Checkeris: I think it is fair to say that when we talk about 11% across the province, there are municipalities and areas where school boards will get much less than 11% because of their industrial-commercial assessment, etc. Other school boards will require 14%, 15% or 16% to meet that average 11%.

Mrs Nowina: If you take a look at how that 14% or 11% is broken down, we are dealing with such things as the impact of GST, mandatory junior kindergarten and lower class sizes, the health tax and enrolment increases. They are pretty basic things that we are talking about that represent that 14% increase.

Mr Fletcher: I have a question and maybe a comment or two. First, let me say that I have always supported OPSBA, in more ways than one. I was just wondering, does OPSBA believe that lot levies are the solution to the funding situation in Ontario? I will ask Ernie that one if you like.

Mr Checkeris: On the one hand or the other hand—I do not ask me how you want me to fund school boards; I am quite radically different from others—but lot levies are just another way of transferring the cost to people. It is another tax, as far as I am concerned. The policy committee has a different opinion. We have mixed emotions across the province with respect to lot levies or development charges or whatever you want to call them.

Mr Fletcher: I have one other statement and that is that I agree that we should be working together with OPSBA as far as consultation is concerned, but we had a group in yesterday, the Ontario School Board Reform Network, and I know they were also members of OPSBA, and they tout a different tune than what OPSBA is touting today, this splinter group.

Which group do we listen to? Do we go with the reform network and say, "You are the people we should listen to and you can consult"? I know that some members across from us were very impressed with their presentation. I was not, really. I thought that OPSBA should be here giving us a presentation and you are the group that we should be working with, but if you are acting together, how can we do anything about it?

Ms Hillhouse: I think the president is going to comment.

Mr Checkeris: Trustees, like everybody else, are humans and we do have dissident groups. I suggest to that that dissident group is dissident within its own school board and I suggest to you that they do not represent the school boards that they are talking from and it is really important to us that you recognize that. The reformer part of OPSBA and we have answered their questions, we have had workshops to indicate the governance as we see it, as we believe the Education Act permits us to do it, that is not going to stop them. It is still a free country and respect their opportunity to do it.

Mr Phillips: This is a subject of considerable interest to me because, as you probably know, I used to be chairman of the Metropolitan Toronto School Board. I would say that of all the issues that affected me in the election this was probably the most significant one. Frankly, I think several of our members were defeated on it. I think a lot of property taxpayers are looking for the fulfilment of a commitment that was in An Agenda for People on the 6% funding.

My question really to the group is twofold. We heard from the minister yesterday that included in provincial support are capital expenditures and teachers' pensions. On page 12 of your document, The Sixty Percent Solution, at the bottom you have a table there essentially saying that we should get back to the 1975 split between the provincial and local. Could you just give us some indication of what pension and capital funds would be in the provincial support in 1989 and in 1985?

Mr Checkeris: Maybe Ron Sudds could answer that one. I do not think I can.

Mr Phillips: The level of pension and capital in 1985 was $4,129,000,000 and $1,629,000,000.

Mr Checkeris: As you know, it was a few years ago when they incorporated the superannuation into the education budget and claimed that they were paying more than 40%.

Mr Phillips: I think the minister yesterday said that those numbers are in the provincial support. I am just trying to get some idea of how far we have to go.

Ms Hillhouse: I really do not know, Mr Phillips, my understanding is that in 1975 probably they were not.

Mr Checkeris: They were not. I know they were not.

Ms Hillhouse: One can play with figures and one can get hung up on 60%, 50%, 70%. Our basic question is 60% of what? For us to be throwing numbers back and forth between school boards and the provincial government, between municipalities and school boards does not solve anything. I think we go back to the basic question we have raised: What should education be doing? How much will it cost to deliver those kinds of services?

Mr Phillips: They are not in there?

Mr Sudds: They would not have been included prior to 1988 is my understanding.

Mr Phillips: And they are in the 1989 figures?

Mr Checkeris: They probably are.

Mr Phillips: Pension funds and capital?

Ms Hillhouse: Yes.

Mr Checkeris: I recall the Minister of Education doing up and saying that the boards were receiving more than 40% and indicating that superannuation payments were included. They were not before.

Mr Phillips: Let me just have that confirmed. The point is that it is the way that either property taxpayers pick it up or provincial sources of revenue pick it up.

Mr Checkeris: That is right.

Mr Phillips: I think it is important. The other one is the commitment of 20% funding to the Metropolitan Toronto public board, which was major in the campaign. How much revenue is the Metro board expecting as a result of that commitment? I gather right now it is zero. What sort of impact might that have on the property taxpayers?

Mrs Nowina: I think from a Metro perspective, if I digress a little bit from OPSBA, there is also a question of 20% of what and what that 20% means for Metro. They are very cautious in terms of that particular promise, because if we are going to get 20%, we may have to give that that really becomes an issue of provincial pooling of—

Mr Phillips: Was that the condition of the promise? It was not during the campaign.

Mrs Nowina: No, that is a concern that Metro has in terms of that particular promise.

The Vice-Chair: If you contact her after, maybe we could get all the answers.

Mr Phillips: No, these are fundamental—

The Vice-Chair: Yes, yes.

Mr Phillips: I mean, 20% of Metro costs is $400 million, I think, and that was a commitment made during the campaign. We are going to have to give the Treasurer the advice on how he can carry out his commitments or I am just trying to get an idea of what those commitments mean.

Mrs Nowina: I believe on Metro budget—we have formulated—we are talking between $1.5 billion and $2 billion.

Mr Phillips: That is the range you are at right now?

Mrs Nowina: Yes.

Mr Phillips: Are you not into your fiscal year?

Mrs Nowina: We are into our fiscal year, but we have brought back our target budget.

Mrs Cunningham: It is a pleasure to see all of you before the committee today. Interesting to note that many of the things you are asking for we were asking for in 1983, and some of the recommendations at the back will not take the political courage or the bureaucratic courage to change them, because they are very simple when it comes to some of the recommendations you are making. I can, I could be very specific; I starred some of them at the back, 7, 8, 9 and 10 for certain just take the political will to get the work done around this building and sometimes not much happens.

I would like to ask a question with regard to process, because I am particularly interested in who will be advising this government, and not only the political arm of the government but the administrative arm of the government. You talk in your first two recommendations about your hope to be part of the Fair Tax Commission, either by way of the commission itself or a subcommittee of the commission. Then I think I read somewhere in this brief that you talk about having a concurrent discussion with regard to funding education.

I think that Mr Fletcher raised a good point. I mean, whom does one listen to any more? But I would hope that the public school boards of Ontario would have a very real voice in these deliberations. So would you take the time to very clearly tell me the process that you want. I do not understand the concurrent deliberations and the purpose of them.

Ms Hillhouse: Yes, I would be happy to answer that. What we are talking about here are basically two parallel groups: the Fair Tax Commission, which will be examining all areas of taxation and responsibility, accountability within the province, and at the same time school boards and the provincial government—school boards through the various trustee organizations, the provincial government and an interministerial group looking at the basic questions of policy; again I say, what should school boards be accountable for providing?—and then feeding back and forth that information into the Fair Tax Commission. Because it seems to us that the issues that have to be decided around what kind of education, what kinds of systems, what kinds of programs are we supposed to be delivering, go well beyond issues of taxation, go into issues of equity, go into issues of relevance to today's world, go into issues of society's needs to date. We must have those questions being answered at the same time.

Mr Checkeris: I think, if I may as well, we have offered from the very beginning with the new government in place the opportunity for them to take advantage of the practitioners we have in the field. We have a lot of top-notch people in the field who are both in the educational area as well as in the school finance area and their experience is very valuable. We have offered that partnership to the government. We would like very much to say to our people that government has co-operated, it has listened to us.

We know you have to make up your own minds; that is okay. We do not want consultation by letter saying, in effect, "We've been informed that the trustees have been told," and then we hear about it as a first reading of a bill. We want to be actively involved. We have the potential; we have a large staff that is ready for your service.

There have been a lot of unanswered questions here. I am prepared to offer you those people's facilities now. Phone them, use us, call trustees and we will be able to meet with you at any time. We want to make this a fair thing because, after all, our function is to educate children and as somebody said, "That is the future." It is the only future we have, regardless of how we look at it. If we do not do a good job, we are failing them.

Mrs Cunningham: A quick supplementary: Have you had discussions with regard to this process with the minister and have you had any indication that she is going to respond positively to your request?

Mr Checkeris: In my many years as a school trustee, it is the first time that I have ever been able to sit with the Minister of Education and the Treasurer of Ontario and their staffs and be heard by them. I have never had that opportunity before. It was an excellent discussion and I suggest to you it augurs well as long as we continue with that process.

Mrs Cunningham: So you have great hopes.

Mr Checkeris: I have great hopes.

Mrs Sullivan: As the next group is coming before us, since we are expecting the Treasurer to be with us on Thursday, I wonder if we could make a second request to Treasury officials to provide the information that was asked of them when the hearings began last week.

The Vice-Chair: Okay.

COUNCIL OF ONTARIO UNIVERSITIES

The Vice-Chair: The next group we have here is the Council of Ontario Universities. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Mr Prichard, would you introduce yourself and your colleagues.

Mr Prichard: My name is Robert Prichard. I am the president of the University of Toronto, but I appear here on behalf of the Council of Ontario Universities and not just on behalf of my own institution.

The Council of Ontario Universities is a voluntary organization representing the 16 universities of Ontario. Its council is made up of the executive head of each university, that is, the president of each, and one academic colleague from each institution, that is, one member of the professoriate from each university. So the council has 16 presidents and 16 professors on it.

Joining me today in the presentation, on my immediate left is Professor Ann Kittler, who is a professor in the school of business management at Ryerson. She is a specialist in computer auditing and computer information systems. On my far left is Grant Clarke, who is the deputy to the executive director of the Council of Ontario Universities. He is appearing in the absence of Dr Monahan, who would normally be here. On my right is Edward DesRosiers, who is the director of research for the council.

You may well ask why I would appear on behalf of the council. I am not the chair, I am not the vice-chair. Indeed, I am the rookie member of the council. I appear because the chair is unfortunately overseas and the vice-chair is in Guelph today and they asked if I would come and speak for them, but I do so, I openly acknowledge, as a rookie, not having appeared before you or watched others do it in advance and I seek your indulgence.

The brief we put before you is entitled A Recovery Plan for Ontario's Universities, and each of you has a copy of it. I do not intend to go through it line by line. I would be delighted to take any questions on it, but I thought what

I could probably do most usefully is speak to it rather than try to take you through the pages of the brief.

The origins of this brief and of this plan lie in what I would describe as the current situation of Ontario universities, which I believe is both a situation of crisis for Ontario's universities and a developing tragedy for the province and for the country. Those are strong words, but I mean them.

I believe that the current situation facing Ontario's universities is the worst in the contemporary history of Ontario universities, that in the past 20 years there has never been a situation of such serious harm being done to the Ontario university system and that the Ontario university system, relative both to other provinces of Canada and to an equally important, internationally, is falling and falling fast.

The tragedy in this is, I believe, in doing what we are doing to Ontario's universities, is that we are shortchanging the people of Ontario, particularly the young people of Ontario. We are shortchanging them badly. We are doing harm to the universities, harm that it will take a long time to undo unless we move rapidly to arrest the decline.

You may well ask, why do I say Ontario's situation is particularly bad? I actually think the situation in Ontario, again to use a strong word, is now approaching a situation of almost scandal in terms of the support for higher education in Ontario relative to other Canadian provinces. Ontario, the most prosperous province in the country, at the present gives support to its universities, in per capita terms for students, that ranks ninth out of 10 Canadian provinces.

That strikes me as extraordinarily shortsighted, as an approach for Ontario, as the industrial capital of the country, as the economic engine of the country, to shortchange the higher end of education in Ontario to an extent that the underfunding has reached the point where Ontario would have fallen to ninth out of 10 Canadian provinces.

The comparison, if you look beyond Canada, is even worse. Not only is Ontario in this situation relative to other provinces of Canada, but the position of Ontario, which of course is in competition with leading jurisdictions south of the border, in that competition is even worse. To take an institution like my own, a public institution offering a full range of degrees including doctoral degrees, the funding for the University of Toronto is now 40% less than—and listen to the reference point—public state universities offering doctoral programs. So compared to the average across the United States of public universities—not Harvard and Yale and Princeton and Chicago and Stanford, not the private universities—offering doctoral programs, such as Michigan, Berkeley, Ohio and Pennsylvania State, Ontario's universities, like mine, are now 40% less funded per student than those universities.

No matter how imaginative we are, no matter how creative we are, no matter how hard our faculty and staff work, it is simply not possible to compete successfully with those kinds of conditions against us.

What harm has been done? I think the harm that has been done is devastating to Ontario's universities in terms of the quality of the educational experience offered ents. Again let me speak of my own institution. We just developed a five-year plan to deal with what are the largest deficits in the university's history. That involves taking out 150 professors from the professoriate. Removing 150 professors involves cancelling Italian, German, on one campus, Spanish and native studies on another. It involves cutting program after program after program across the university as we shrink the professoriate by 150 members, at a time when we are, of course, at historic enrolment levels.

The demand for university in Ontario has grown and is not just among young people, but across people of all ages, full-time and part-time, undergraduate and graduate. At the same time we are ripping out of the faculty of arts 150 people. That in my view is extraordinarily shortsighted and is doing real, serious harm to the quality of the educational experience of our students.

There is another concern, and I think—I do not intend to be provocative in citing it—it actually worries me a lot in terms of the fairness of what is happening. There are many dimensions to this. The first is who gets hurt most in terms of what gets hurt most at the university when this happens. What gets hurt most are initiatives to try to get better—our initiatives, for example, with employment equity for faculty. If we cannot hire, if all we are doing is letting people go, we cannot change the gender balance or a racial and cultural balance in our faculty. We cannot have the most elegant of employment equity programs, but if we are not making appointments we cannot change the makeup of our faculty.

Similarly, if we want, as we do want, to strengthen our work in the area of aboriginal peoples within the university, we simply cannot do that if, instead of taking new initiatives, all we are doing is ripping out programs. The most threatened are the most vulnerable. It is the newest and the most vulnerable ideas that get hurt first as we pull back.

The second problem I have referred to publicly before is who is it who can avoid the effects of this underfunding? It is those who can vote with their feet. It is those who can afford to leave. The people who can afford to leave the province to get higher education are the ones least hurt. The ones who do not have the option of leaving are the ones most hurt. So I cite a school with which I am familiar, a private school in Toronto where over the last 23 years we have gone from less than 3% of the student body leaving Canada for higher education to now a figure well over 30% and heading for 30% of the graduating class leaving Canada for higher education. They are doing that because of guidance counsellors and the parents and the students have lost confidence in the quality of education available in Ontario and in Canada, and they are leaving because they have an income and wealth that allows them to leave.

But that is not an option available to most of the people I represent. It is not an option available to the great majority of people in Canada to leave to go to the United States and pay $100,000 or more for an education. That is not an option available, but those are the people who are avoiding the effects of underfunding and overcrowding. The rest of our students do not have that exit option, and that to me is a particular unfairness, that only the most wealthy in our community are able to avoid the effects of the current policy of gross underfunding.

Having said all that, I do not think there is really any debate, that is, I do not believe that any of your three parties disagree with the proposition that the past 20 years have led to a situation of very serious underfunding in Ontario's universities. I have met with leaders of each of your parties. Each of them has said that that is his or her position. The current minister has said in the House that it is his position. There is no ambiguity, I do not believe, on the proposition I put before you. The only questions, I believe, are questions about how to turn it around.

The issue is, how do we repair the situation—not further document the situation, which I say I believe is a source of widespread agreement as to the devastation that is happening, but rather in a difficult fiscal time, in a difficult recessionary time, how do we, with maintaining our commitment to public universities, turn the situation around? That is what the plan for recovery is directed to. This plan for recovery included in our brief has been unanimously adopted by the Council of Ontario Universities, that is, it is supported by the full council and is put forward to the minister, to this committee, to the people of Ontario as a plan to reverse the current decline and give us a much brighter future for Ontario's universities and the quality of education offered within them.

The goals of the plan are threefold, three goals only: quality of education, access to higher education and equity in higher education. Those are the three goals: quality, access and equity.

The nature of the plan is a multi-year, four-year plan to move Ontario's universities back on to a path which will allow them to be competitive with the best institutions in Canada and in due course compete more successfully with the best institutions beyond Canada's borders. It involves a base increase in the budgets for Ontario universities in total, in aggregate, of $410 million spread over four years. So it is just over $100 million a year for each of four years to move Ontario's universities first to the national average of university support and then modestly beyond the national average by the end of the four-year period.

How is it to be financed? This is the most difficult part for all of us in the university system, and in saying this, it is the most difficult not just for university presidents but it is the most difficult for students, for staff, for faculty: How, in a difficult time that we all face in the province, should this be financed?

It is our judgement at the council that, while the best way to finance it would be to increase the base allocations in the MCU budget for $410 million, in the circumstances we find ourselves in in the province, we are prepared to support accomplishing this through a combination of increased budgetary support for MCU and increased contributions by students. We say that with no particular pleasure, no particular enthusiasm, the latter part of that recipe for calling on the students to carry a heavier burden, but it is our judgement on balance that the quality of education of our students is so critical and that the circumstances of the province are so tough that it is the only option realistically available to the government at the current time.

Having said that, I should hasten to add that the structure of our proposal of increased tuition fees and increased government grants is designed so as to not only protect current levels of access in the universities through improved financial aid for students, full-time and part-time, but more than that to increase the penetration of universities into those communities historically underrepresented. That is why we call for an equity penetration program to reach out into those communities like the black community, like the lower-income communities of Ontario, which are historically badly underrepresented in Ontario universities, to reach out affirmatively with the high schools to bring those people into universities.

It is our judgement that despite the increase in tuition that we recommend, we would end up with a system of much higher quality, of at least as good accessibility and of greater equity in terms of the representation of students within the student body of the Ontario universities.

Just let me close by indicating the reaction we have had to our plan since we released it about two months ago. There is, I believe, unanimity among the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, the Ontario Council on University Affairs, the government's advisory on this subject, the confederation of faculty associations, the federation of students, the staff associations, the alumni associations, the board chairs. Everybody, I believe, agrees about the need, about the amount of the need and about the urgency of the need. I believe there is complete common ground in that respect and I believe that common ground is also shared by both the opposition parties.

The only point of serious difference that has arisen is the question of how to finance it, and that is a difficult question. That is, it is a difficult question to deal with the fairness. Is it an improvement in fairness, as I believe it is, to ask the students in the current circumstances to share a heavier burden? That is a point on which there are legitimate differences of view, but that is the only point of difference in all our discussions with the government and with others as to the wisdom of this plan.

What the minister has done is he has convened a special advisory group representing all the constituencies I referred to. We are working hard. We are looking for alternatives. We are trying to find solutions. We are trying to find ways that, as a matter of urgency, no later than the budget which comes down this spring, put in place a multi-year plan for the recovery of Ontario's universities.

Let me just close by saying that I believe the stakes are large on this. I think we have gone too long. I think we have let the situation go too long, to a situation where it should be a source of embarrassment to Ontario to find itself one from the last in Canada and way below our competitors in the United States, at a time when we have committed ourselves to open North American and international competition, at a time when the quality of mind and the quality of education and the quality of infrastructure will be so important for Ontario, not just in terms of the economic welfare of the province but also in terms of cultural and social welfare of the province.

Fortunately, and this is unlike some of the other problems you are confronting as you have these submissions, the amounts of money involved in this case are relatively small; that is, $410 million. Fortunately it would make a lot of difference and is not very much money relative to the magnitude of the other issues you face. Indeed under our proposal only two thirds of that comes from public funds. For a relatively modest investment, a large and important increase in access equity and quality can be achieved.

I am very grateful for the chance to have put that plan before you. With the chair's permission, perhaps I could invite my colleague Professor Kittler to speak for a couple of minutes, reflecting the perspective of a member of the professoriate, who are of course among those who are carrying the burden of the current situation.

The Vice-Chair: I might remind you that you have about 10 minutes.

Mr Prichard: Perhaps she could speak for two and then perhaps we could take a few of your questions.

The Vice-Chair: Fine.

Dr Kittler: I would like to speak, with your permission, on those three points: equity, quality and access. I would like to start off with equity. What I mean by equity is the students who come, their mix and distribution, as well as equity in terms of faculty and staff who will be there when the students come in to provide role models for these students. I would agree with everything Professor Prichard said concerning—we are trying to get particular at the historically underrepresented groups.

Research very solidly indicates that the decision to go to higher education is made much earlier than grade 12 or grade 13—way back early in high school, if not before that—and that one of the most significant factors influencing this decision is the attitude or knowledge of parents. That is why we have earmarked $25 million, starting off in year one, that we will ourselves go back into the high schools and talk to the students. We hope that we can set up programs where we could convince them what they have to gain by a higher education.

In terms of the equity in terms of hiring, more than a year ago we at Ryerson made a decision that of the next 200 faculty retirements, more than 52 of those replacements would be women and another significant number would be from minority groups where possible. We got an award for this policy. The irony of it is that this policy is not being implemented simply because nobody is being hired. When faculty retire they are not being replaced. When faculty leave for other reasons they are not being replaced by additional full-time faculty. Therefore, we have some short-term temporary positions. Therefore, this really disfranchises the new people we would like to hire, whom we cannot hire.

On one other issue regarding equity, we have several disabled students with varying kinds of disabilities. It is expensive to deal with these students. We are working very hard on this issue. But we have difficulty trying to get the students through to enable them to finish university because of the services they need.

I could give you a specific example about a student we have who is blind. He has a voice synthesizer and we are using a special program called Chem-CAD that the students need to use to work competently in chemical engineering. This student cannot use it because his voice synthesizer takes up too much memory within his own computer, and within any computer we can provide him, we do not have the opportunity to do the research to provide a similar package for him that would not take up a kind of resource that we can provide him. So he has to do something else. That is just one simple example.

One last point, since I know we are tight for time, is in terms of quality. I have been teaching for more than 20 years. I have seen the quality go down and down, but for the last two years it has been an order of magnitude worse. Each in some classrooms that were not designed for classrooms. They have posts in the middle that literally obstruct the teaching process. The students cannot see the board. I am a very good teacher. I work very hard at it and quality bothers me.

I have students who have no desks to sit at, no chairs. They are afraid to go to the washroom in case they come back and the seat is gone. In some classes it is that bad. I have only a certain person. The number of students I must deal with has way increased. No matter how much time I devote to it, the time I spend with students individually has decreased. The type of research the students can be involved with, and we are working hard at that at Ryerson, is being seriously hurt, as it is at other universities. Teachers are giving multiple-choice exams where it should be, in some cases, essay-type exams for the appropriate course. The time to do the marking and other things has been significantly reduced.

I honestly believe my students really are getting less quality than before and we are working hard at it.

Mr Prichard: That completes our submission.

Mrs Sullivan: I have heard both Dr Prichard and the other presenter, Mrs Kittler, present before, and as usual they speak with great passion. I want to get right to the gritty of your proposal. As I understand it, what COU has put forward is that the ministry continue with its $2-billion commitment to the university sector, that $70 million a year be committed for each of four years from the ministry, plus an additional, in round terms, $35 million a year which would come from students, for a period of four years.

I look, however, later into your proposal and I see a discussion of a trust fund and a suggestion that the funds would become part of the ongoing funding base of each institution. Basically, are you not asking in the beginning for an additional $100 million added to base each year?

Mr Prichard: The proposal is that we in effect ramp up at $100 million a year over the four-year period. The cumulative effect would be that at the end of the four-year period we would be $410 million higher than we are today in real terms. Over the course of those four years of recovery, the funds, both the tuition-fee funds and the government funds, all go into a trust fund to be spent for these three purposes alone—equity penetration, accessibility maintenance and then quality—to be spent only by approval, the funds only to be spent with approval of a committee including students at the OCUA on it, and at the end of that period of recovery, then that new base would go into the general base of the university.

The commitments that will be made on those, the new appointments, the new programs that will be in place, will then be in place in the university. So as we ramp up, the commitment of those funds will take place into agreed-upon areas for quality enhancement beyond equity and accessibility. But yes, at the end of the four-year period, the base of the Ontario university system would be $410 million higher than it is today if one includes tuition-fee revenues as part of the base, which is a slightly different terminology than historically has been the case.

We are suggesting the revenues available to the universities would be $410 million higher than would otherwise be the case.

Mrs Sullivan: But in annual commitment from the government, you would continue to be looking at a similar portion in annual operating transfers?

Mr Prichard: After the four-year period?

Mrs Sullivan: The end of the recovery period.

Mr Prichard: Once we are at the end of the four-year period, our expectation is that the government would return to the basic commitment, which is to take the advice of the OCUA on the amount required the following year to simply maintain current levels of programs in real terms. That is what the OCUA's advice is.

I might say that the $410-million calculation is not our calculation. That is not a number invented by the universities. That is a number simply taken from the OCUA's own advice since 1977, as its advice has not been followed.

Mrs Sullivan: I understand that. The question of capital has been raised by student groups that have been before us and you do not include a discussion of capital in your request. Do you see, once again, new demands in capital over that four-year period of time which you call the recovery period?

Mr Prichard: That is an important question for us and I want to give only a tentative answer because we have only just begun discussions as to how to finance the capital side. One of the difficulties of overcrowding for our students has been a lack of capital. It is our sense that the new government is committed to a program of capital expansion which would include contemplating financing it on a different basis, that at this time, with the need for expansion, we should be considering other instruments for financing it rather than just annual grants, and that we should be considering debt instruments as part of that.

We thought it was premature to put a capital plan forward at this time because it seemed to us that it was in the government's interest to have a discussion which we did not wish to pre-empt by getting out in front with respect to universities when the hospitals and the school boards and others were there. This submission does not address the capital question because we thought it was premature to make such a request at this time.

Mr Sutherland: I want to say I was very impressed by the presentation and it is certainly a very impassioned plea for the plight of the universities. I, too, want to get into the nitty-gritty of this proposal because I have some concerns.

As someone who has put himself through university on OSAP and self-financing, when I look at what you are proposing here, a $550-a-year increase in tuition for four years, that is basically—I work it out in the first year at least—a 33% increase in tuition, and on the overall increase you say that the average cost is $7,000 right now, probably over $2,000 extra, so you are looking at almost a 33% increase in the cost of going to university as a whole. That is not taking into account that the other costs outside of tuition are going to increase.

I was very familiar with the Queen's University blueprint proposal that came out last year. At least in that proposal they termed that a set amount of the money should be put aside for student grants. I see nowhere in this proposal where you are saying a certain amount should be put aside. Unless a certain amount is put aside, I do not see how you are going to deal with this question of access, because if you increase at $550 this year, a 33% increase, for someone from a lower socioeconomic scale who has already been planning to go, how is he or she going to adapt to a 33% increase in one year or within two to three years?

Mr Prichard: That is an excellent question. Perhaps I could just address two aspects of it. First, not wishing to avoid the thrust of your question, I believe, as I have heard it, you have misstated our proposal. The proposed increase is $550, but only once. It is an immediate $550 increase; not repeated. It ramps up once by $550 and is not repeated.

Mr Sutherland: I am reading from page 2 where it says "$550 per year."

Mr Prichard: Once it goes up by $550, it stays at that new level, but it does not go up again, so it is a one-time increase.

Mr Sutherland: So basically, this is the Queen's blueprint, except that you are doing it all in one year.

Mr Prichard: We are doing it all in one year instead of spread out over four or five years. But the number is very similar, in this case $550 instead of the $625 proposed at Queen's, so it is a one-time; it is just a correction. As a percentage of the cost of going to university, it is $550 as a percentage of $7,000, so it is about an 8% increase in the cost of going to university, about $3 or $4 a day for a student in class days at university.

On the question of accessibility, the reason we did not put a number is that our position is that the first claim on all the money is to ensure current levels of accessibility. If it costs 20 cents on the dollar, it is 20; if it costs 30 cents, it is 30; if it costs 40 cents, it is 40. We did not want to pre-empt that discussion of the reform of OSAP for both part-time and full-time students and we say the first claim, before a cent goes into quality, is to maintain accessibility.

The reason we did not reserve $20 million or $50 million was that we got estimates from MCU, estimates from OCUA, back-of-the-envelope estimates from other people as to how much was required. Somewhere between 20, 30 cents on the dollar of the tuition fee increase are historic estimates. Our view was it should simply lay prior claim before anything is spent on improved quality so our position is whatever is required is the amount, not some predetermined amount.

That said, I think the shortcoming of this draft of proposal is that it does not address sufficiently explicitly the shortcomings of OSAP as presently constructed, particularly for part-time students, and our next draft, when it comes out, will much more explicitly address those shortcomings and try to quantify the costs of them. I think the weakness of the document is the explicitness on that, not a weakness of intention though. The intention is complete commitment to maintain the accessibility before money is spent on anything else.

Mr Sutherland: Your university just raised $125 million from a combination of private sector and long-term commitment, I take it, from government.

Mr Prichard: No government funds.

Mr Sutherland: No government funds, all private. Okay, $125 million, that amount of money you raised, that not going to improve the quality at the university?

Mr Prichard: Absolutely, it will improve the quality. Let me just speak to that. That program announced last year and a half years ago was to raise the most money raised for any Canadian public institution, hospital or university. It was a five-year program for $100 million. I said this boastfully, because I had nothing to do with it, so I will excuse the immodesty. My colleagues, my predecessor and the volunteers who led that campaign, in half the time, in two and a half years, raised $125 million of private funds.

They did that, though, for capital purposes, which is why, when I had the question earlier from Mrs Sullivan, I held back on that because I think a combination of private support and public support for capital is the appropriate direction to go. But that support is not the support we need for the operating costs of providing a first-class education for the class size problem we face, for the destruction of the native studies program and the language program and the other programs. That fund-raising is to pay for the costs of the buildings, for the costs of the basic infrastructure within which we have to operate our programs. So it is an enormous contribution, an enormous vote of confidence, in my view, in the importance of quality education, but it is not responsive to the difficulty that we have before you.

Mrs Cunningham: Professor Prichard, Dr Kittler and others, it is a pleasure to meet you. I have been waiting to do this for some time. As the critic for the Progressive Conservative Party, I have rather made it my business to become as well informed as I can. It was interesting to hear Mr Sutherland's questions, as he was the president of the University of Western Ontario student council and I was his representative, regardless of my party. We have monious debate. It is always nice to see him informed public. I tried to do it often, but it is coming along very well.

Mr Prichard: Dr Pedersen speaks highly of him.

Mrs Cunningham: Yes, we are all very careful now, we do want him speaking for what we all believe in. You are doing a good job today. Having said that, we will continue to have our arguments, but I must say we have agreed from the very beginning on this issue of the enormous underfunding of universities. If you will forgive me, my questions may seem negative, but they are not. I am very much a supporter, have been for many years and I believe in the quality of all education.

But I will tell you what I have heard as I have been doing my digging around with regard to what kind of support, by the way, the government will get from its own administration—because that is all part of the political process and if we cannot in fact impact upon the bureaucrats in many departments of government and if we cannot get the support of this particular committee with regard to votes in the House, not only the cabinet, we are going nowhere. Although you have made an impassioned plea today, there are some things I have heard as I try to get myself well educated that do not make me very happy.

One is the same old argument—and I heard it yesterday from one of your own colleagues who teaches at your own university, as a matter of fact—that the universities are not underfunded; they are just not well managed. I would like you to speak to that. The other one is that Ontario has to decide what it really wants from colleges, universities and the secondary schools. Who should be doing what? Quite frankly, our great concern is that there are no standards. You can read what I said to your former colleagues earlier today.

So not well managed and no standards, and the third one is the total misunderstanding around how public funds are made. I can tell you, at Western, if we had asked for any money in our private fund-raising for the ongoing operational costs of universities, we would not have got one penny. They are going to pay for what they consider the capital, even for equipment I must say, but there is not one penny for that.

If there is not some match from this government, we will not be getting any more of that down the road because you can have all the buildings you want, but if you have not got the professors and if you have 300 kids in a classroom, which Mr Sutherland very much relates to, people will not even want to contribute to their own universities when they are graduating. Those are from the students.

If you would speak to those—not underfunded but not well managed, and that we have to decide on standards before we can give the universities any money, which makes me absolutely sick—if you can in fact speak to those, I think we would very much appreciate it.

Mr Prichard: Thank you. I will try to do so briefly, because the Chairman is looking firmly at me. We greatly appreciate—

Mrs Cunningham: I do not look at the Chairman.

Mr Prichard: He is looking at me, though.

Mrs Cunningham: I know how he looks.

The Vice-Chair: This is very important. We have another group that is coming in for 11:30, not tonight.

Mrs Cunningham: I think it is important for the government to hear what the president is saying here.

Mr Prichard: I will try to do it very briefly, and I am very grateful for the interest you have shown in the problems of the universities at present.

Are we well managed? I am new to management at the university. My own impression would be that there is an exceptional effort being made to live with grossly inadequate resources, that the effort being put out by my colleagues, particularly my administrative colleagues on the staff of the university, is really exceptional.

Can we do better? I do not doubt for a minute that we can do better and that we must do better and we will do better. I think every institution is obliged to do that. Certainly every public institution is obliged to do that to maintain the trust and meet its standards of accountability.

Is there room for improvement? Yes. As I said to my colleagues at the academic board of the university just last week, discussing the taking out of 150 professors from our professoriate—and I think the weights are about right—that 5% of it is probably the lack of imagination of our deans and principals and chairs and directors and others charged with the administration of the university, lack of imagination and shortcomings in their effort, and that 95% of our problem at present is simply, by every standard, grossly inadequate resources. I accept the obligation that we must strive constantly to perform and manage as well as can. My own judgement would be that effort is being made and we will continue to make it.

On the question of standards, I do not understand even the claim. My own view is this whole debate is about quality and it is that universities beg for help to allow us to set standards and meet standards that the public and the students reasonably expect us to meet. That is the problem of standards. It is not a problem of aspiration in the university. Professor Kitler speaks to our aspirations of standards for employment equity in the faculty of the university. There is no debate about that. We just cannot meet the standards.

Our problem is a complete incapacity to meet reasonable standards imposed by ourselves, by the public, by our students and standards being imposed on Ontario internationally which we are falling further and further behind. That is the problem of standards in Ontario's universities. We cannot meet our own standards, which themselves are not dreamlike, are just reasonable aspirations for the quality of education we should provide.

On the question of private funds, my own view is that the solution—and this is not the COU's position yet because we want to have a dialogue with the government, as I indicated—will lie in matching funds through incentives, working where the private sector and the government work together, through the kinds of programs you are referring to, where we consider the use of debt as well as direct operating grants to do it. In a combination of private and public funds with incentives and with debt, we can probably handle the capital side of the university.

In my view, the number one problem facing Ontario's universities, which is most damaging to the quality, is the operating grant, and that is why that is the sole point of this brief and that is why the Ontario universities are unanimous in putting the brief before you. I am very grateful for your indulgence.

Mr Phillips: I cannot quite understand the numbers yet. I need a little bit of help on that. My understanding is that the grants have been going up by 7%, 8% or 9% a year and that there is the need to increase the grants just to keep where we are.

Mr Prichard: Yes.

Mr Phillips: I would just like to get your feeling on what that is per year. I cannot quite understand the $410 million yet. If you wanted to get to the level right now, not that you think you would like to be at this $410 million, how much incremental grants each year do you need?

I am trying to get some idea of when we know whether we are hitting the target or not, because right now my impression is that whatever grants you have been getting in the last five years, which have been going up at $100 million a year, have done nothing but put you further behind. We are going to have to provide more than $100 million a year just to keep you where you are now, then I do not know whatever the incremental number is, so if you could scope out for us.

The second one has to do with the other part of it, that is, that you are, as I read this, asking the students to pick up relatively a disproportionate share of what they are picking up now. It seems to me that makes it politically more difficult. Did you consider some other alternatives?

I would like to get those two things.

Mr Prichard: In terms of understanding the past, the key thing that has happened in Ontario in the past five years has been a massive increase in enrolment in universities, not just of young people but of all age groups. So in reading the grants and understanding why Ontario would still be ninth out of 10 in Canada, you have to take account of this massive enrolment increase. A vast majority of the funds given to the university in the past five years have been for meeting that increased enrolment as opposed to dealing with the base of the existing enrolment.

Our proposal is that the government in each of the next four years take the advice of the Ontario Council of University Affairs, not our own, and I want to stress that is not the universities' council, that is the government's council, which calculates annually how much is required today to do the same job we did last year. We say the government should accept that advice, of course. That is just a starting point. But if all we did was accept that advice, we would stay where we are in Ontario. We would not recover.

Mr Phillips: I understand that.

Mr Prichard: So the proposal we put is that the government accept that advice, whatever it is, and in addition, over four years, embark on the recovery. The recovery would cost an increase in base of $70 million from the government and about $30 million from increased student fees in each of the next four years. The cumulative effect just under $280 million in increased government support above what would otherwise be granted on the advice of the OCUA. That is the number. It would be a $267-million, I believe, or $273-million increase over the four-year period put into the recovery plan, increasing the base of what is required to just stand still.

Mr Phillips: Just to state what I then understand whatever the advice of that group is, and it will be more than the previous government provided, it will be 10% something like that.

Mr Prichard: Not necessarily, because the enrolment is now flattening. The government is committed to a flat enrolment. It is the cost of living as interpreted in the university context, in which some things go up fast and some go slower, so they calculate, in effect they index to inflation in the university.

Mr Phillips: So maybe $100 million or something like that.

Mr Prichard: Whatever the number is.

Mr Phillips: Then in today's terms it is $70 million $73 million?

Mr Prichard: It is $70 million a year.

Mr Phillips: But that is in today's terms. Next year would be that plus.

Mr Prichard: In real terms, yes.

Mr Phillips: At the end of the four years, you build into the base today's equivalent of the 110?

Mr Prichard: Of the 280.

Mr DesRosier: Of the 410.

Mr Prichard: No, I am sorry. Let me just give one set of answers. In terms of the government amount, the 280, 70, 70, 70, 70—goes into the base at the end of the four years, and the student amount—30, 30, 30, 30—120 is still available in tuition. You get 120 and 280, which is the 400.

Mr Phillips: So you build that into the annual base?

Mr Prichard: Yes. The student fee continues at the same level and that $280 million goes into the base at the end of the four years: 280 and 120 add up to 400.

Mrs Sullivan: But are you asking for it in perpetuity? I guess that is what he means.

Mr Prichard: Yes. It is a new base level so that at the end of that time the average support for students in Ontario would be at and then largely above the national average support per student, which is in the base across all the other provinces. The comparison we are using is simply what is happening in the other provinces of Canada. If it is taken back out, then we would just drop back to the base level again.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you.

Mr Prichard: I did not answer the second question.

Mr Phillips: I need some help on that.

Mr Prichard: Could I ask Mr DesRosier to meet with you and provide you with the analysis?

On the second question, we have considered every alternative we know on how to finance this, because there is debate among all the groups that appear on the need for money. We do not know of a better proposal than this. This committee can persuade the Treasurer of a better proposal, we are fully in favour of it.

Our first preference is it be exclusively public funds. The advice we get from the government, from the opposition parties, from the public is, "That is not doable in 1991," and the question always put to me is: "Why won't you help yourselves? Why won't the institutions help themselves by raising tuition?"

What I come to you saying is, the 16 universities of Ontario have said we will, with pleasure, in a sense of with assurance in getting on with the job and with regret that our students have to pay it, if you give us the opportunity to do it. At present, if we increase tuition by a dollar, our grant goes down by a dollar. If we are given the space to do this, we will do it.

My governing council of the University of Toronto, students, faculty, alumni and government appointees, met on this on 20 December and they unanimously—every student, every faculty member, every alumnus, every government appointee—approved this plan on 20 December to raise tuition by $550 for all constituencies in our university, as evidence of their commitment to doing it.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you.

Mr Prichard: Thank you, Mr Chairman. You were terrific.

CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA

The Vice-Chair: Mr Darby, I apologize for our lateness. I think you looked quite interested in the debate here. You might know that we have already talked to the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the Royal Bank, and we look forward to your views on the current state of the economy and your projections for the next one or two years.

Mr Frank: I am Jim Frank and my colleague is Paul Darby. We are pleased to have the opportunity to speak with you today, and on behalf of our president Jim Ninnes of the Conference Board of Canada, we always welcome these times before various parliamentary committees.

The conference board, you may know, is a leading forecaster in Canada. We do quarterly forecasts for all of our members and one of the members of the conference board is the Ontario government.

I am going to make some opening comments about the Canadian scene and particularly focus a bit on how we see the policy environment as it will affect the near term, and then Paul will run over the details of the Ontario outlook for you. What we have presented to you in handouts are executive summaries of our latest forecasts. There are lots of numbers in there for your edification, and we can answer any questions you may have.

Before I do that, I want to tell you just a few things about the conference board. We are a private sector, not-for-profit organization. We are funded by business, government, labour unions, associations and so on. Our mission is to be the leading private sector research organization in Canada and our basic goal is to enhance the competitiveness of Canadian organizations in a global economy. That is what we are really about.

In all of our actions, we have a number of guiding principles, and the most important one for our purposes today is to say that we are an objective organization, we are independent and we are non-policy-prescriptive in all of our work. In other words, we try to analyse major economic events and carry out our forecasts in as objective and independent a fashion as is possible.

As a result of this, in our presentation today we are not going to be lobbying for any particular point of view in terms of stimulus or contraction or tax policy or otherwise. What we are going to do is try to give you the best judgement we can on the near-term outlook and hope only that it will be of some value to you as you go ahead in preparing your budget in the next few months.

Just briefly speaking, the conference board, if you like, called the first made-in-Canada recession in quite some time last fall, and as you may know, got a fair bit of publicity on it. We see the recession ending in the second quarter of this year, and that will make four quarters of negative growth. We expect growth of around nine tenths of a per cent last year declining by about three tenths of a per cent this year, with a strong rebound—well, I should not say "strong," but a more anaemic type of rebound to 3.6% growth next year.

It is a slow recovery and it is a gradual recovery, and Paul will focus on that in the context of Ontario. Unemployment is going to average 9%-9.5% this year and inflation around 6%. We think the US economy is going into recession, has been in recession in the fourth quarter and will come out of it in the second quarter along with Canada.

We think the anti-inflation policy of the government of Canada and the Bank of Canada will remain in place. Even though we see interest rates coming down, our view is that this is not a substantive, if you like, relaxation of monetary policy. It is not fundamentally changed. They are still very worried about inflation, and the wage settlements that have been coming in over the last while, particularly in the public sector, are a centrepiece of that concern.

We are forecasting oil prices to average about US$25 a barrel this year. That is high compared to what it is right now, but I am going to talk to that in a moment.

We see fiscal policy very neutral at the federal level. Our judgement call at this point is that there will be no stimulus in the federal budget nor will there be any spending cuts. It is going to be a steady-as-you-go type of budget essentially. Stimulation at this point would be procyclical, and I do not think they are into that game.

1220

Second, there is not a lot of money to spend. They have a deficit that is, as you know, hitting $30 billion now; it will probably be $3 billion or $4 billion higher than that this coming year. Additional tax increases, after what has gone on with the GST, I do not think are in the political cards, but that is within the framework that we are forecasting now, that assumption about the federal policy.

Just a word or two about monetary policy. The bank has been worried, as you know, about inflation. The GST has contributed, in the conference board's view, about one and a half percentage points to inflation this year. Add about another half a per cent from oil and you have two percentage points in additional inflation coming this year from just those two events alone.

The fundamental issue is, do wages respond to that and, if you like, catch up or exceed? You are familiar with what has been going on in the public sector. I do not need to mention that.

Our forecast for inflation this year is 5.8%. Next year it drops to 3.8%. The important point here is that we are still explicitly assuming that there will be very little wage response or catch-up, if you like, to offset this increased inflation. Now, there are exceptions, as you all know, to that.

The reason the inflation rate is not higher in 1991 is the extremely weak economy that we have here on our hands now. The oil price increase that just occurred in the fall took about half a per cent off growth in 1991 for Canada. Weaker oil prices will help to support growth, but as I said, we are not expecting a substantive change opposite that $25. If it averaged, say, $20 or $21, you will get a little bit of help on inflation, a little bit of help on growth, but it is not going to rocket us up out of the doldrums.

Interest rates: We are expecting a drop of about another half a per cent or so between now and next year at this time. Our current outlook has interest rates dropping pretty sharply and we are narrowing the spreads between Canadian and US interest rates very explicitly.

Quite frankly, without that kind of cut in interest rates, we would not see the Canadian economy come out of the recession in the second quarter. So we have made a very explicit assumption about reductions in rates and reductions in spreads. So the Canadian dollar moves down gradually over the period and trades around 84 cents by year end. That is compared to about 86 and change now.

Let me talk just briefly about confidence in the economy. We do two surveys at the conference board, one on consumer confidence and one on business confidence. I am going to give you the fourth-quarter results, which were done in November and December and are just being sent out to our members now.

First of all, in terms of consumer confidence, we had a sharp drop in the first part of this year, but the measure of confidence has remained stable for the past three quarters and the index sits at about 75, which is roughly where Ontario is. If you were to go back to the recession of 1982, that confidence measure dropped into the low 50s, so I suppose there are two ways of interpreting it. One is it could go a lot lower, and has historically. We are not seeing that. Second, it is encouraging that it did not fall in the fourth quarter last year after this recession scenario became at least generally accepted within political circles.

Consumers are very nervous. They are very nervous here in Ontario and that is true pretty well across the country, with no exceptions.

Business confidence, on the other hand, is mirroring what is happening with consumers. Businesses are extremely nervous. We had in the past several quarters record low responses to businessmen being asked whether they thought near-term business conditions would improve. We have never seen responses in the affirmative as low as 2% or 4%. Businesses in Canada are very nervous.

The other side, or the good news, is that confidence measure did not drop in the fourth quarter either in a substantive way. So what it looks to us like is that people at least are perceiving that the bottom has been reached. They are not getting a lot more pessimistic than they were in the fall.

All of that means that business investment is going to turn in a very weak performance. We know from our history on this that when confidence drops as it has among businesses, business investment drops, so we do not expect any growth and in fact we expect a decline of about 7% overall business investment in Canada this year.

Let me just conclude with a couple of comments on the length of this recession and then turn to my colleague Paul, on Ontario.

When we said that the recession we are in now is a made-in-Canada recession, we made that point because of the interest rate policy that has been pursued for the better part of a year and a half in Canada. We have spreads that are up almost, well, actually for a few weeks, over six percentage points in the spring. If I had come before you and said that we would have interest rate spreads over five percentage points from mid-February to mid-November in this country, you would have said I was crazy, it will not happen. Yet it happened from February through November. The result of that was a killing off of the auto industry, housing starts sharply dropping, and of course the Canadian dollar rising to what we think are unsustainable levels.

Now, when I go back to the main point about interest rate spreads being narrowed, it is because that is how you get stimulus within the economy; you stimulate exports and you retard imports when you narrow the spread because the currency will come down, in our view.

Why will this recession be four quarters and no longer? We get asked that all the time by people in the media and by business audiences and the general public when we are speaking at public events. There are three or four things that are important, and I think they continue to be reasonably valid as explanations. The first is that there was a severe inventory overhang in 1981-82. Inventories were very high at that time. That is not the case now. Businesses have learned to manage inventories much more carefully, and so we do not see that having to be worked off for any great length of time. The second thing in 1982, most Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development countries went into recession about the same time and they stayed down for a fairly lengthy period.

We expect Japan and Germany to turn in reasonably decent growth this year and next year. Of course, the U.S. will have a fairly modest year, along with ourselves. So most OECD countries went into recession last time; that is not the case now.

There are another couple of issues here that have to do with the downsizing that occurred in 1982. I think you all familiar with the fact that many companies did not attain the levels of employment that they had prior to 1981. That simply means they are a lot more efficient. So there was less delay, if you like, in cutting back and balancing the books during this downturn compared to the earlier one. The other point does not affect Ontario so much, but we had back in 1982 the national energy problem, which chased a lot of investment out of the west. In conclusion then, what we are talking about here is a three-quarter recession, milder, less deep than in 1982, which was six quarters and where some quarters actually had declines in growth of over 1%. We are talking now about a decline in 1991 of about 0.3% or, say, half a point in growth, compared to 3.2% in 1982. There is a quantitative and qualitative difference of substantive proportions. The recovery will occur, we think, starting in the second quarter, but it will be a gradual and a fairly slow type of recovery.

Paul, can you deal with Ontario, please?

Mr Darby: Thank you, Jim. I guess, as we are all here at this point, the Ontario economy is clearly deep in recession. The manufacturing sector has been especially hard hit. The housing sector as well has been suffering badly. I guess if you look at the leading indicators that are currently available to economists, there are actually very few current signs of hope on the horizon. However, we continue to believe that in fact there will be a fairly rapid recovery, in Ontario at least, which should begin to get under way with, I would say, full steam by the third quarter of this year. We should see some positive numbers, at least but positive, in the second quarter and some pretty good growth at about 4% at annual rates, which should start in the summer and head on right through 1992.

This recovery, in addition to some of the factors that I have discussed nationally, will be I think particularly triggered in Ontario by the sharp declines in interest rates which are already well under way. It should help to stimulate the housing markets, investment, lower savings rates, stimulate consumption, restore confidence. As well, the recovering United States economy should definitely help Ontario's exports, particularly again with respect to manufacturing, but also with respect to some of the mine products and more primary products like forestry that are produced in Ontario. Hence, I guess we still feel that there is indeed some good reason for hope as we look out into the future.

Given the restrictions on time, I am going to just very briefly touch on some of the key elements of this forecast. I hope that will leave us some time for questions after. To begin with the demographics in Ontario, there are some interesting numbers here. They have in fact turned out sharply against the Ontario economy. If you look back when the economy was, if you like, in boom times, in 1986, you had a net inflow from other provinces into this province of 44,000 people, in addition to some fairly solid international numbers as well. We are now looking at a forecast for 1991 of actually a net outflow of 10,000 people. We heard the expression earlier in terms of voting with their feet. People who live in Ontario now are voting with their feet to the extent they are deciding things look somehow better in British Columbia or Alberta. The situation has, in other words, got bad enough in Ontario that people are deciding to leave.

However, that is a phenomenon that you see in fact through most recessions as they hit Ontario. In every previous cycle that has always reversed itself, and as the situation improves, in fact, you begin to get a return to net inflow into the province. This helps to give some momentum and, if you like, accelerate the recovery process. As we look towards 1992 we see a net inflow of about 4,000 people into the province, just on a net interprovincial basis.

As well, as I think we are all aware, 1990 was just about a record year in terms of immigration from abroad. We had 192,000 people, thereabouts, come to Canada from other countries, and we are seeing that in fact maintaining itself throughout all the medium term. Ontario will get its good share of those international migrants, and this in itself should also add some solid support to growth in the Ontario economy, particularly as you look out through the medium term, but as well starting in 1992.

The export sector in Ontario has been suffering, particularly with the weakness of growth that we have seen in the US economy. The US economy has been performing very sluggishly through most of 1990, and we are now forecasting it to go into a recession starting in the last quarter of 1990 and on into the first quarter of this year. That, of course, has some pretty solid impacts on the Ontario manufacturing sector and will hurt Ontario's exports; has already done so in fact.

What I find interesting, however, is that if you look at the numbers with respect to the auto sector, and especially with new vehicles, they are not nearly as bad as one might expect from just previous cyclical episodes. The reason why this is the case, in fact, is that we are looking at a transplant phenomenon which has taken place in Ontario. You are all aware, of course, of the new Camry plant at Ingersoll, the Toyota plant was getting up to speed at Cambridge, and they themselves have had an enormous amount of new vehicles in terms of assembly in Ontario. The Ingersoll plant in 1989 produced 660 units; in 1990 it produced 46,606. The Toyota plant, which was still just coming up to speed last year, went from about 21,000 units in 1989 to 61,000 units in 1990. That is a tripling at a time when the US economy was sluggish and going into recession and all the rest of it, so that obviously adds great support to at least the assembly of automobiles in Ontario. Honda had a great year as well, 21% growth. Obviously, the more traditional Big Three did not do nearly as well, and if you include truck assembly, they had a decline of about 5.4% last year.

Clearly, the strategy to bring on some of the, if you like, transplants—I think that is the term—has worked in a sense of helping to insulate the Ontario economy from the downturn that we have seen in the demand for autos in the United States overall. I think there are some issues there, however, with respect to parts manufacture. The transplants in general tend not to have so many of their parts manufactured locally, and it is generally accepted there is more value added, more skill, if you like, in manufacturing parts than in simply assembly. I think this is an issue you might want to keep in the back of your minds as you think about moving into the future with continued transplant activity in Ontario.

Even if the auto sector has not been hurt that badly by the weak growth that we have seen in the United States, certainly other sectors of exports have been hurt and will continue to be hurt, I think, through the first half of this coming year. Paper and allied industries will have declines both last year and next; chemicals will be well down this year; machine and equipment exports are well down. Overall, the other sectors of exports in Ontario have been weak enough, I think, to drag down the overall economic performance in the province. But with the recovery in the United States and with some of the slight depreciation in the Canadian dollar that we are looking at, we do see in fact a good year for Ontario's exports, starting in the summer late this year and a very substantial amount of growth next year, so I think the future is in some sense not bleak from that perspective. In many ways I guess it is our opinion the worst is beginning to be behind us.

Just a few words about the manufacturing sector through this cycle. It has been hit very severely in Ontario, I would say probably more severely than we might have expected, looking at the overall depth of the cycle. If I can just give you some numbers with respect to employment, for example, from the second quarter of 1989, which was the last peak in employment in manufacturing in Ontario, through the fourth quarter of 1990, which is the last quarter for which we have data, Ontario lost 112,000 jobs, just looking at the quarterly numbers in manufacturing. That is about an 11% decline in employment in the manufacturing sector in Ontario. If we look back at the previous recession, 1981-82, which was, as we all know, a very traumatic experience, we are now looking at that recession being about three times as severe as our current downturn. To date, that is the pattern that has emerged. The decline in employment in manufacturing in Ontario was 13.5%, so the declines that we have gone through in employment and manufacturing in Ontario so far in this cycle are of the same order of magnitude as that last experience we had. Hence, I think it underlines the point that manufacturing in Ontario has certainly taken it very hard.

Other sectors: The service sector definitely has not and has maintained some weak, fairly anaemic growth for much of 1990. It is possible that there may be to some extent a formal structural change going on in the manufacturing sector in Ontario. I am not sure many would argue, but I think there are issues with respect to how many of those jobs might come back once the recovery is under way, how many will be permanently lost because of substitution of capital for labour and what that means for job retraining and issues in the employment market in Ontario as we move through 1992.

The housing sector in 1990 was in fact a terrible year for Ontario. Very high interest rates drove the housing sector down, but I think it is also understood that in Ontario there had been some excess supply of houses already on the market. There had been some speculation house prices had been driven up very high. Affordability was an issue.

When the downturn began in that market, I think it was clear it was going to come down very hard. That is indeed what has happened.

In fact, we are looking at further declines through the early part of this year, but we are seeing quite a strong recovery ourselves in housing in Ontario beginning in about the third quarter, through the summer. This is partly because we believe that the low interest rates will clearly trigger a rebirth in activity. We also feel there is some fairly strong underlying fundamental demand, partly because of this continued flow in international migrants who we see coming to Ontario who will need to be housed. This will certainly put some pressure on the market.

Overall, we see business investment in Ontario as lagging the cycle. We do not see any strong activity in that sector until 1992. We have noticed some severe weakness in machinery and equipment investment, which causes some worry, if you like, because of the feeling that, given the free trade agreement and other issues, at least in Canada there would be a drive towards modernization, always with the worry of global competitiveness—these are the watchwords—in the back of the minds of businessmen. The collapse that we have seen in machine equipment investments so far this year from that perspective is worrisome, but we feel that in 1991 there will be some stimulus from the introduction of the GST, which does in fact encourage machine equipment investment particularly. We are looking for some good recovery in Ontario next year in 1992. We do not believe the underlying imperatives to remain globally competitive are going to disappear.

What this translates to, just briefly, in terms of employment growth is a decline of employment in Ontario in both 1990 and 1991. We are looking at a solid 1% decline in employment in Ontario this year. We do not feel that employment growth will begin to pick up until, in fact, early 1992 in any substantial way. Employment always tends to lag the cycle. Entrepreneurs tend to want to be sure that this recovery is for real before they take on full-time staff. Hence we do not see full pickup and recovery until next year, but then we are looking at fairly decent, say, roughly 2.5% growth. As a result the unemployment rate stays at fairly high levels throughout 1991 and 1992, at close to 8% in Ontario, and does not really start beginning to come down until 1993.

The overall bottom line, if you like, is that we are looking at real gross domestic product at factor cost declining in 1990 by about 0.5% and this year by another 0.1% before increasing by a solid 4% in 1992.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, gentlemen, for your presentation. It was very informative and very interesting.

Most economists and most people in general accept the fact that the $2.5-billion deficit for fiscal 1990-91 was at an acceptable level, if you will, not necessarily preferable but acceptable, given the situation. There has already been a clear admission by the Treasurer that the deficit is going to be significantly higher than that. No dollar figure has been given publicly.

I would like to ask your opinion on what different dollar figures might mean to the economy as you would see it. For instance, $5 billion or $10 billion or a $15 billion: At what point do you feel certain reactions to seeing a number like that, if that were the case? Second, in terms of the assumptions that have been made, most of them have been made on the American economy: that it is not going to get much worse than it is, that their recession is predictable. Oil prices at this point still do not seem to be expected to be going dramatically one way or another. There is going to be a decrease in the interest rates and some lowering of the Canadian dollar.

I would like to ask you, of those key signs, which of them do you think is the most fragile and could do the most damage if it did not go as expected?

Mr Frank: I am sorry. I heard the oil question. What are the other of the signs that you mentioned?

Mr Christopherson: The interest rates and the Canadian dollar value. The reason I asked that, to put it in context, is that I was meeting with a group of Canadian manufacturers' Association members in my own community. I asked them, if interest rates dropped but the economy was still perceived to be fairly weak, how would you react to that? Would you still go ahead and make moves? Surprisingly, the answer was that this would still give them a fairly good comfort level, that they would still probably go ahead and make a few moves that they are not making right now. So I am curious to see which of the other signs, if you will, might change most dramatically and would alter your opinion.

Mr Frank: All right. Let me come to the last question. I will come back to the deficit.

On the oil issue there are a couple of basic things which you have to keep in mind, regardless of what you read in the papers. The world is awash with oil. There is no shortage of oil in the world. That is a fact. The tide of opinion, if you like, seems to move so quickly with the oil market. If you have the price drop by a few dollars, all of a sudden that is the forecast for the next few years. The numbers that we tend to think make sense, in terms of a price that could be maintained over a decent period of time, are somewhere between US$18 and US$22 in today's terms. That is sort of sustainable. When you start to move up to US$30 or to US$40, we would say that this is not going to be sustainable.

What happens to really throw a wrench into the works? You would have to have, probably, a major disaster in the Gulf war right now that would take out a significant amount of Saudi supply. That of course would immediately hit the markets and you would see the spot price jump up. We could then be pushing into the US$30s to US$40s. We did an alternative scenario in the forecast on that because we had so many people asking that question, "What happens if?"

First of all, we said that with a short war—which is anything, say, under three months—there is absolutely no economic effect that you can measure. Now I do not want to come across as suggesting that there is no impact of this war, that is not the message, but this is in terms of GDP, employment, deficits and all of that.

If you ask about the other scenario and, say, let's suppose this war goes for six to nine months—this is now talking about fighting—we would assume under that scenario that you have destruction of capacity in Saudi Arabia. Either there are Scuds or sabotage or direct attacks that take out refineries. That makes it difficult to get tankers out of the ports and so on. Then you see oil prices rising. In that scenario we put oil prices up to US$40 and bring them back down to US$30 within this year or within a year after that period. All that does is extend our recession about one quarter. So that is the range that we would say you have to look for.

In terms of interest rates, our sense on that is that the Canadian government has exercised quite deliberately the power of managing the money supply to drive rates as high as it has and to keep the spread as wide as it has. That suggests to us the corollary that there is policy room to reduce the rates. The price that will be paid for that, though—this is why economists are always teased about having two hands because everything does have a cost and a benefit, two sides to every issue—is that the currency will come down.

Our best bet for you would be that a currency somewhere around 80 cents is probably sustainable with a normal spread, which would be something like two and a half percentage points, say, between US and Canadian Treasury bill rates on the short end. Now the markets tend to overshoot, going both ways. You get a lot of volatility. If we were to see the currency spread being narrowed sharply, then I think you would see instability in the markets. They had a run with that a year ago in January and I do not think we will see that type of thing happening now. We are going to track down and narrow the spreads fairly gradually.

Now coming to the deficit issue, it is a very hard one to answer because we do not formally forecast deficits for the provinces. We forecast the expenditure side and the output side. We do not get into the fiscal situation in the provinces. Given the kind of outlook that Paul mentioned to you and the decline in growth that we expect to occur on an annual basis this year, you are probably looking at something that could be upwards of $3.5 to $4 billion. That would be something that would not surprise me if it were to occur.

Mr Christopherson: I am sorry. We are now talking about the 1991-92 fiscal year.

Mr Frank: Yes. Now there are a couple of things that of course drive this that I cannot comment on because you people have to make those decisions as government. There are issues of pay-setting in the public sector that are critical drivers. I am on a hospital board in Ottawa and we had to deal with a CUPE settlement that was much higher than we budgeted for. I believe we have just been notified by the ministry that we would be compensated for that. Now that, just in our one little hospital, is $1.5 million a year, to give you some idea of the scope. We have province-wide the Ontario Nurses' Association coming up at the end of March. You know what happened in Manitoba. What do you want to factor in on that one and then how far does that get spread?

Those are cost considerations that come into it, so when you ask yourself what the deficit looks like, you have to ask, "What is the likeliest scenario on that opposite tax increases and so on that you might put through?" But ending it up with all the dust settling, it could be upwards of, say, $4 billion.

Mr Christopherson: I appreciate that. Specifically, I understand that the government is responsible for setting what the deficit will be based on its political decisions and you have said that very clearly and succinctly. I was looking more at what is the impact to analysts if you hit certain figures. For instance, what would $3 billion or $4 billion deficits say to an objective analyst? What would $7 billion? What would $10 billion? I am trying to get a sense of how you, as an independent analyst, would feel about those numbers, not knowing of course at this point where the number will actually be.

Mr Darby: I guess there are a number of issues here. One would be if the government were to pursue a countercyclical policy and was trying to stimulate the economy while we were in a recession period, which is clearly an option. Generally, then, you get yourself involved in multiplier theory. For every $1 government is spending, that we would put into the economy, how much could we expect to get back out in terms of real economic activity?

For a province like Ontario, that multiplier is probably on the order of somewhere between 1.2 and 1.5. So if you were to put in another $1 of real spending, then you might get $1.20 to $1.50 back out in terms of real GDP. That is the very simple answer.

There are issues with respect to lags. If you start spending the money now, you may find that by the time it has an impact you are—already we are covering into the last half of 1991 and all you are doing is sort of fueling the recovery, as opposed to actually doing something about the recession. There is an issue there. Of course, there you have to have some faith in the timing of the recession. I certainly would not want you coming back to me and saying: "Hey, we've been in this for two years now. You told me we were going to get out in the summer." That is an issue. Timing has always been an issue.

Other issues have to do with the fact that there are supply-side constraints. At a certain point you start throwing money at the economy and all you are going to do is drive up prices. We know that we have gone down into a recession. We know that we have some excess capacity that now exists. We know there would be room for some increase in activity which would not put too much pressure on inflation, but at a certain point, putting more money in in general should only serve to increase inflation, and in no way to get more supply, more production out of the economy. There is certainly a constraint there. That is the short answer.

The Vice-Chair: We have Mr Phillips, Mr Jamison, Mr Sterling, Mrs Sullivan and Ms Ward to go yet, so decide on the question and the answer.

Mr Phillips: I really appreciate this. I think the three banks that we have heard from, two here and one we have read about, agree with you, that mid this calendar year will come out of the thing and I think we all feel better about that. I guess I have two or three questions.

There is no mention of the Quebec situation here. I realize you may be unable to comment on it and that is fine, but to me at least that is going to impact on the economy over the next two to three years, and whether you want to comment on that or not, that is fine.

The second thing is your projection for the Canadian dollar. You have the exchange rate here, but I am not smart enough to translate it back to the Canadian dollar. You predicted the exchange rate. What does that mean to the Canadian dollar?

The third thing is that you have indicated, I think, a significant reduction in manufacturing jobs over the last year or so. I would like your comment in terms of how important that is to our future. I had always had kind of a perception that this was a bit of an engine driving us, and whether the growth towards service jobs is absolutely inevitable and just let it happen or whether that needs to be something we need to be concerned about.

Mr Frank: On the Quebec issue we have made no explicit assumption about the constitutional issue, in the outline. The reason is, quite frankly, that it is an imponderable. That is the honest truth of it and anybody who tells you that he knows what is going to happen there is dreaming in Technicolor, I think, in simple terms.

Mr Phillips: You have factored in the imponderable?

Mr Frank: No, we have not. As I say, we have made no attempt to try to deal with that. What I would say to you is that in economic terms, no matter how it is actually accomplished, if in fact Quebec leaves Canada that is not going to be good news on an economic front. That is all I could tell you, that it is going to be a negative. It will not be a positive. How large a negative is an imponderable. But that is as far as I can go, honestly, in sort of giving you a sense of that.

On the exchange rate, if you just want to jot that down, what is presented in those tables is Canadian dollars per US dollar and basically all you do is invert it. So for 1990 the number would be 85.6 cents, for 1991 it is 84.7 cents and for 1992 it is 83.8 cents. The fourth quarter of 1991 is 84 cents and the fourth quarter in 1992 is 83.7 cents.

That might strike you as a small devaluation, and it is. The reason it is a small devaluation is that this concern about inflation is still very much present in Ottawa circles and I do not think that is going to change. Remember that for a 1% decline in the Canadian dollar opposite the US dollar, we get about a 0.3% increase in the consumer price index within, say, roughly a year. So the dollar comes down 1% and on an 86-cent dollar, 1% of that, you can figure it out, you are going to get 0.3% on the CPI. What they have gained by pumping the dollar up, they will lose t devalues, so the currency will not fall much more than what we are saying here.

Mr Darby: With respect to the manufacturing issue, in, certainly there have been very substantial declines in employment. In fact, even if you go back to the previous 1-82 recession in Ontario, where I talked about the lines we saw at that time, the recovery in employment in Ontario was fairly anaemic. There was only one quarter at the end of the 1982 recession in which employment in Ontario in manufacturing actually got back to the previous peak in 1981. Since about 1987 employment in manufacturing in Ontario has pretty much gone nowhere.

Mr Phillips: In absolute jobs?

Mr Darby: In absolute jobs.

Mr Phillips: Percentage has declined.

Mr Darby: Percentage has declined. It has just pretty much been static. Now that is not to say that output in manufacturing has been static and clearly there has been, I would say, a fairly rapid structural shift here towards capital and away from labour within the context of the manufacturing sector in Canada. That is possibly, I think globally, talking place worldwide. We have seen an enormous amount of machine and equipment investment that has gone on in Ontario through 1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988, a lot of which will, of course, replace labour.

As to whether that is a good thing or a bad thing, I do not really think I can comment. I think in some sense it is going to depend on a lot of cost issues. I think that is something where perhaps employers in Ontario have not a lot of choice. If they want to remain globally competitive, perhaps that is the imperative, but again there would need to be a lot of case-by-case empirical work done on relative costs within industries to see how important that trend really is.

But I do think there is still an issue here in terms of what you do with the people who are being displaced from the manufacturing sector in terms of employment and turn-over to other jobs in other sectors of the Ontario economy. I think we can imagine that this process will continue to go on for at least some time after the recovery takes place in 1992, that the return in jobs in manufacturing probably will not equal the losses that we have seen, at least not for some time. Hence I think there is an issue there perhaps with respect to job retraining or labour force management that could be important.

Mr Sterling: Could I just ask a supplementary in that area before Mr Jamison goes, because it was dealing with manufacturing?

One of the tables that the Royal Bank has supplied us with in terms of graphs showed that in 1985, the end of 1985, the average hourly earnings in manufacturing were around $12 in Canada; in the United States it was around $13.50. Now in Canada we are up to $14.50 and the United States has dropped in real terms to about $12.50, so there is about a $2 spread whereby our manufacturing workers are getting paid more than American.

They said also that 42% of that $2 is attributable to the high dollar that we have, in terms of the high value of our dollar. Given that, is there any hope that we can regain back in the manufacturing sector, as Mr Phillips has asked you? Is that a significant problem?

I300

Mr Frank: The swings that you get with devaluation on currencies when you translate from one currency to another will make quite a difference. If you are talking about going from, say, 86 cents to 80 cents, that six cents is 8%, so that makes quite a difference.

There is another thing that I should say complicates these numbers and that is that in the United States there has been a bigger move, quite a substantially bigger move, to at-risk compensation. So within the manufacturing sector, the pay of people over the last 8 to 10 years has become more at risk than has been the case in Canada. For example, you will have more profit-sharing, more incentive pay, in their pay structure. So the base of pay is not moving up as rapidly, but you cannot conclude from that that their total compensation has not changed, which is the important point. That is a very substantive research issue. Our compensation research centre has done a little bit of work on that, and I am not really plugged into it well enough, but those differences there would be a lot narrower if you were to account for that one shift in cost.

There is also this whole issue of benefit costs in the total compensation package where we have quite a significant advantage in this country. So again, you have to really look at the total cost of labour to get at this issue well.

Mr Jamison: We have had a number of reports from various people, the manufacturers' association, the banks, and there is a significant thing that is going on, and I do not think you have really latched on to it, concerning this recession, and that is that approximately 50% of the layoffs that we are experiencing in this province in manufacturing at this point in time are in fact permanent layoffs. They are not layoffs related directly to the down cycle. When we talk about a rebound in the second quarter, my question is, where will that rebound take place if in fact 50% of the jobs that we are experiencing layoffs in are permanent? In my mind there is a tremendous amount of restructuring going on in the mid-sized manufacturing area at this point in time. Basically, I tend to disagree with your feeling about a second-quarter recovery.

I guess the other part of that equation that you have not touched at all on is the trade picture as related to manufacturing, the ability to rebound, free trade, trilateral, Mexico, that kind of thing staring us in the face and what economic impact those situations can have further on our small and mid-sized manufacturing base. If in fact you are correct—and I tend to disagree with you; I think the recession is going to run longer and deeper than you are indicating—at that point in time when we are really coming out of it, what effect could the trade picture have at that point?

Mr Frank: Let me take a stab at a couple of these things and then, Paul, you can help me out here. To be candid with you, we are getting a lot of feedback from people who say we are too optimistic about our outlook, and I am quite prepared to accept that. Your forecast would be that it might be in the third quarter that we will see growth, and I would say to you that is fine.

Now, if you ask what the impact of the FTA is on this and how much of that job loss that we have seen since the beginning of this recession is permanent or not permanent, I know you can look at some of those closures and attribute them to the FTA. I do not think anybody would deny that. Whether it has been a major factor is of course an empirical question and it is almost impossible to analyse or try to get a good grip on. I have read Maude Barlow's book. I look at all that stuff at the back that is there and by implication all those plant closings and so on are due to FTA. It is demonstrably not true.

The other side of the coin is that reasonable people would say there has been an effect from free trade. I have to go back a bit in time here, because when the conference board did its analysis of the free trade agreement, we came up with the smallest economic effect of the three or four major research institutions that looked at this, including the federal government. We said it is not going to have a major effect on employment over a decade; I think we had a couple of hundred thousand more people working. It was very small. The reason was that so much of what we produce is already traded on international markets at international prices without any tariffs. What we did say was that there would be a major adjustment challenge, as we put it, in footwear, clothing and food processing, no question about that; also in autos and parts, as I recall now too.

Again, when you try to quantify that and say how much, big, small, that is where you get into this judgement call. It is very difficult to do. Our view of it at the time, and I still feel this way, is that a lot of the debate now has confused this cyclical short-term crunch on inflation with high interest rates, which drive up the currency too high. They have confused the effects of that with what is happening in the structural side under free trade. So when you compound the free trade agreement and the adjustment going there with a currency moving up gradually to 86 and 87 cents, it is not surprising that manufacturing jobs are lost. Paul did say that we only had one quarter since, what was it, 1982, when manufacturing employment got back to the peak; it was in probably the second or first quarter of 1981. So it was a long process to get back and I would say to you that you have to anticipate that again. It is not going to snap back quickly.

Mr Jamison: My question really was if that had not been weighed into your effect, that I was able to pick up on. Again, I am sceptical of the rebound—

Mr Frank: That is fine.

Mr Jamison: —when you say it is going to happen. If we have high immigration and we have a high unemployment rate, again, I do not know if that equates to a rebound, in the same manner that you have spelled it out.

Ms M. Ward: I just have two quick questions. One, you talked about the price of oil and the effect that different prices might have. What other economic implications of the war do you see if, say, it extends for some time?

My other question is more a quick informational one. You were talking about the net population outflow of 10,000 in 1991. I may have just missed your complete statement, but is that net of immigration or just from other provinces?

Mr Darby: Just provincial, just net interprovincial.

Mr Frank: It is people moving to Ontario from another province, minus people moving from Ontario to another province.

Ms M. Ward: Not including immigration from outside Canada.

Mr Darby: That is right.

Mr Frank: Your population continues to grow.

Mr Darby: In terms of the impact of a longer war I think it only becomes significant in terms of government financing when and if they run out of their current stock of munitions. It is at that point that they have to face some serious questions about resupply. They are not in a situation where they have a lot of excess capacity. They have some excess capacity, but not a lot of excess capacity in the munitions industry. I am talking particularly about the United States now. Hence it is not clear that they are going to get much of a price break. In other words, I do not think it is going to be cheap. As well, they are not in a situation where they have a large surplus in their fiscal situation. The US is running a substantial deficit, as we all know. So financing at that point will become difficult in the United States.

I think we are looking at something, we are talking about a war which would be lasting on the order of a year or more before I think that becomes an important issue, but at that time I think, yes, there could be some severe strain on financial markets in North America, there could be real issues about financing the war. Where is the money going to come from? I think we could see some substantial increases in interest rates; there may have to be tax increases; they may have to consider some sorts of price controls at that time. This is not a cheap war. That is a real risk, that they will have some major financing difficulties in the United States if the war goes on long enough that they run out of their current supply of munitions.

If the war does not go on that long, they can spread it out, resupply over a number of years. There are no other real international threats, at least currently, on the horizon particularly with the cold war winding down, so they could take a fair number of years to rebuild their supply of munitions and the strain on their fiscal situation would not be nearly so severe. But if the war does go on long enough then I think we are looking at some substantial financial problems with respect to financing it.

In Canada, clearly the burden is not as severe because we are not financing as much of the war. I think the issues will still exist to some extent in Canada, but not nearly to the same extent. I think it might be fair to say that if the war went on for a long enough period of time, there are some sectors of the Canadian economy which might benefit. Those would include those supplying munitions to the US government as well as perhaps some of the primary sectors mining and nickel. I think there are, though, major issues with respect to the overall financial situation in the world economy if the war goes on for a long period of time because as I say, there is not a lot of excess capacity d it will put upward pressure on prices. If we remember back to the Vietnam war experience, that upward pressure on prices was, if you like, accommodated and ended up with the 1981-82 recession at least partly cause of that.

If they feel they do not want to accommodate that kind of pressure on supply which would result from a long war, then we are talking about generally higher worldwide interest rates. If the war goes on for a long period of time, I think it is a fairly good guess that interest rates worldwide would rise. That would clearly have some dampening effect on the world economy, including Canada's.

The Acting Chair (Mr Sutherland): Thank you very much for your presentation. It is very important to this committee to get that type of general forecasting information. We are very happy that you were able to come and share so much time. Our apologies for the delay in your presentation.

Our next presenter is here already. This committee was supposed to reconvene at 1:30. I am wondering if, with his permission, we could make that 1:45 to give some time. I would just ask that everyone try to be here promptly at a quarter to two. We will reconvene then.

The committee recessed at 1313.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1350 in committee room 2.

INFOMETRICA LTD

The Chair: I think we should begin the afternoon session. I would like to thank Mr McCracken for coming. He has graciously volunteered to make a presentation this afternoon. If you would like to begin.

Mr McCracken: I was most interested in your questions. What I would like to do is very quickly go through a handout there just so you know what is there and get a sense at least of where I am coming from. Then we can throw it open for questions. I know you are already running a bit late and you have a large stack of people seeking funds stacked up behind me. I am not seeking any funds, so we should give them full time.

What I would like to do is give you some sense of how we see the Canadian and Ontario economies evolving in the coming years. In particular, I will speak mainly to the environment that you are going to have to be dealing with in the context of your budget deliberations. Most of the emphasis will be on the national economy, but I am prepared to speak to some of the numbers on the provincial side as well.

Before we start, I think it would be good if we could share a common view about what is good economic performance—what is the target, if you will, in terms of the rate at which the economy should be expanding.

For the national economy, we have a concept called potential growth or potential of the economy, basically a number in terms of a growth rate that is consistent with the unemployment rate neither rising nor falling. If the economy is expanding at roughly 3% per year at the present time, we would expect to see, with very minor perturbations, an economy with a stable unemployment rate. The potential of the economy is much more arguable. It is, how far can you go in a sense of full employment and a stable unemployment rate? My view is that that is a number for the national economy more in the neighbourhood of 5% rather than the level of 8% that seems to be implicit in the actions of the federal government. Either one of those is, at this point in time, looking for a return to an economic growth rate of, let's say, 3%, which would be sufficient to keep the unemployment rate from rising further.

Why do we worry about that? If you start talking about economic outlooks in which the outlook is for 1% growth or zero, or negative, or even 2%, what you still face is an environment in which that unemployment rate will continue to rise. This notion of potential is essentially determined by two things: one, the growth of the labour force—in other words, how many new entrants, net, will be coming in—and two, the productivity growth of the economy that you are looking at.

It appears for Ontario that the potential growth rate is roughly of that same order of magnitude, roughly 3%. If anything, it may be slightly higher. Productivity growth in this province may be slightly higher than the national, and with the substantial increases in net immigration expected over the next few years, labour force growth in this province may be somewhat more rapid than in other regions. That is the target we are looking at, and this number is not fixed and immutable.

Back in the 1960s and early 1970s, potential growth rate for the Canadian economy was about 5%. We had very much more rapid labour force growth at that particular point in time, and a more rapid productivity growth. In the last half of the 1970s, this number was more on the order of 4% and in the 1980s moved down through 3.5% towards 3%, and when we got out into the period 2000 and 2010, basically the numbers look like they will be on the order of about 2.5% or 2%.

What of course interests you is, what is it now or over the next two, three, four, five years? It is 3%.

Before we get into the forecast, we should make clear as I am sure all the other forecasters who have come to you, that there is no such thing as a forecast of the economy without a wheelbarrow full of assumptions that come along with it. We make what are called conditional forecasts. At the present time a very key one is the assumption that people are making about the world oil price, and in that particular instance, we are assuming in the forecast that you see here that the world oil price will average roughly US$30 through 1991 and drop to $20 in 1992.

We have other cases. We have cases with lower prices and higher prices, but I have not yet been moved off the forecast which we prepared back in late November nationally, and on a provincial basis we are back still preparing the final parts of it.

All of us know the price today is down below $30, in the low 20s, but what we are in a sense suggesting to you is a period in which that price may bounce back before dropping. In 1992 we have the price dropping to $20. I would not, if I were you, get too excited about that. If the number is different from that, I can tell you roughly what it does so it is not as if we are not aware of the marginal effect of that. But I have been reluctant to jump on the bandwagon and assume $20 for 1991, or even $15 or $12 as some pundits would have you believe.

A second key assumption is that with the fiscal package that has been put in place in the US and the kind of world oil price scenario that we had, the US economy is in a recession from the fourth quarter of 1990, continuing through the second quarter of 1991, with the result that the US economy essentially does not grow at all in 1991; in fact, it slightly declines. In that environment, there is some easing of interest rates in the US, and that again, in 1992, with the cessation of war and a substantially lower price for oil, inflation eases and the real economy in the US expands on the order of three-plus per cent.

In describing the outlook in a very general sense, we would like to build it up in the form of a set of recessions or a set of factors.

Recession A started in April 1990 nationally, the last half of 1989 in Ontario manufacturing, and is in a sense the result of the high real interest rate, high exchange rate and the fiscal cutbacks at the federal level particularly that have been put in place. This particular recession was proceeding and was fairly mild, although occasioned by a rise in the unemployment rate and negative growth in the second and third quarters.

There was a recession B which started shortly after 2 August as a result of a sharply higher oil price. If you take that as being roughly a $10-oil-price shock, what that translated out to in the Canadian context was something very similar to a $6-billion tax increase which consumers and others would pay, plus roughly a $300-billion tax increase worldwide occasioned by a $10 oil price being applied to the 50 million barrels a day of consumption.

Sure enough, that weakened the US economy. Europe and Japan hurt our exports, hurt our trading activity internationally, so the combination of those two gave us recession B. That was on top of the recession that we had already in place.

There was a change of that particular recession as of roughly 17 January into, let's call it, B prime, which is a war, which in the first few hours pushed the oil price up to $40-plus. But the enthusiasm that was exhibited in the sense that this was going to be a quick one led to prices—I think the lowest they got was about $19, and now running around $21 or $22, which is however just in the first few days, so we ought not to get too excited or make too many guesses about how it will proceed.

The point of that one is it has taken that tax hike off in the world. It has taken it off in Canada, although there is a few months' lag before it comes through. But we have nevertheless created some new uncertainties out there in terms of both the duration and the possibility of other adverse effects downstream.

There are a few things that have not yet happened but which, in looking at the next few months, we ought to not forget about that could affect the outlook. We have not in this forecast inserted them, but there is the issue of, will GATT fail? And if it does, what would be the fallout from that and will there be an inability to reach a decision or remove to protectionism? As a trading nation, and one particularly with a lot of agricultural exports, that would be bad news. Then we have our own factor of political uncertainty in Canada regarding Quebec and the rest of Canada, which could be both this year and next a device for a shock to the system if the developments there are deemed to be pessimistic.

Okay, so we are sitting here; we have an outlook. I will summarize that quickly for you. The good news we are looking for, if we can see it, would be things like world oil prices declining, interest rates declining, both in nominal and real terms. Good news in some sense would be no increases in taxes or cutbacks in expenditure at the federal level, a recovery on the US side and some pickup following that on the demand for resources and basic industrial goods, all of which would be to Canada's benefit. When might that happen? No one knows, but I just described to you the conditions. I would think at this point that April, May, June of this year are likely to be the earliest, but there is no reason to think it is something automatic that is going to happen at that point in time as long we prolong the continued poor economic performance.

Just with reference to the charts, I have tried to give you through a sense of an arrow what is happening. In 1990 the economy declined or slowed down in growth, averaging only less than 1% in real growth. In 1991 we are anticipating another very substandard year, with negative growth overall, with a weak consumer, business construction falling, housing, government restraint continuing, exports weak with a weak external economy, inventories being snubbed in.

If oil prices went to $20, they would add about 1% growth in 1991 to the numbers you see there. That would be insufficient to overcome—it would basically turn it into a zero year or a slightly positive year but still one which is a recession by any stretch of the imagination. We do however in this scenario with lower oil prices, with a recovery of the U.S. economy, with declining interest rates, see a fairly sustained recovery in the 1992-95 period, again conditioned on the kinds of assumptions that we are making.

For the province of Ontario I have plotted for you the real growth that we are forecasting year by year, or just for the next five. We would go out to 2010 or 2020, if you wish, but I do not think anyone in this room has that long on the horizon, so I thought just four or five years might be an adequate thing for openers. Essentially, in 1990 the Ontario economy did worse than the national, in our view, whereas the national economy expanded a little less than 1%. Our calculations suggest the Ontario economy declined by about 0.6%. In 1991 we anticipate the economy will decline by about 1.5% in real terms, again somewhat more sharply than the national economy. But in the period 1992-95, the Ontario economy will expand above potential, will expand at a rate greater than the national economy. Those numbers in 1992 are 4.9%, 6.2%, 5.5% and 4% in 1995. That is not unusual, as you can look back to the last recession. I purposefully wanted you to see the 1982 recession in here. Again, Ontario dropped more than the national total, but in almost all of the years since then the Ontario economy has performed at or above that of the national economy.

Now inflation basically in 1990 was slightly down; 4.8% on a year-average basis, compared to 5% the year before. In 1991 we are suggesting this will go up substantially, something in the order of 7%. Again, if we take a lower oil price view, it averages $20 instead of $30, we would knock about one or one and a half percentage points off that, so you would be in the 5.5% to 6% range. But then you would not see as much improvement in inflation in 1992 if that occurred, because we do have the price dropping.

A big story in the next few months will be the GST. It is expected to push up all the measures of inflation. With the economy as slack as it is, there is I think a strong likelihood that it will be just the GST that you see, at least initially. As the year evolves, you should see inflation rates cooling quite substantially, the year-over-year down to 5% by October, inflation less than 4% in both 1992 and post-1993-95 period.

I am just hitting the major aggregates, just to give you a sense. The unemployment rate rose in 1990, averaging 8.1% a year as a whole but ending the year at 9.3% nationally. In 1991, that continues to rise, consistent with that slow or negative growth. We expect an average for the year of 1991 of 9.7%. That would imply greater than 10% likely in a number of the months. In 1992, the average is still above 9% as the overall economy expands only slightly above potential, and it is basically down to about 7% by 1995.

In the last recession, these next two charts, one shows you what happened in the 1982 recession and another one shows where we are going now in the 1990 recession. You can study those in more detail. The large number by each province is the total increase in the unemployment rate that occurred from when the unemployment rate first started rising to when it stopped rising. In the case of, for example, Canada, in July-August 1981, it was at 6.9%; ended up in December 1982 at 12.8%, for a rise of 5.9%. At the same time, Ontario went from 5.9% in August to about 12.1% in that same recession, for a rise of 6.2%.

Now, where are things so far in this one? I think that what is interesting, and the other point may be too, is some provinces had already started slipping before the official recession date or the national recession date, and some lagged, the unemployment rate continued to rise, post that period. In this one, the province that stands out like a sore thumb, both figuratively and literally, is Ontario, whose unemployment rate since June 1989 bottomed out at 4.7%, has been rising since that point in time and is now up to 7.8% in December.

Most of the other provinces joined in later, around the April start date of the recession. But there was already, if you will, a regional or a provincial recession or industrial recession that was showing up in rising unemployment rates in Ontario. So it is of a somewhat different pattern from what we have seen before.

If you plot the unemployment rate in 1981-95 in Ontario, again you can see the same pattern that I spoke of a moment ago, of the unemployment rate rising during the 1990-91 period and only slowly coming down post that period. The Ontario numbers here in 1989 are 5.1%; in 1990 6.3%; in 1991 8.3%; in 1992 8%; in 1993 7.1%; 6.2% and 5.7% in 1995; again, the unemployment rate in Ontario remaining below the national but nevertheless rising, not unlike it but in the recovery period perhaps dropping slightly more rapidly than the overall national rate.

Interest rates—again an important element in your pre-budget discussions—where are they going? We saw them rise in 1990, on average. It was a crazy year in many ways, with interest rates rising in the beginning of the year and more recently having come back down. The prime rate ended up at 12.75% at the year end, having peaked at 14.75%. In 1991, we see some further easing of interest rates, even with the goods and services tax and the oil price shock, primarily occasioned by the very weak economy and declining US interest rates. A prime of 11 or less by the end of the year is not unexpected. There are some optimists who think it may be down at 10 or even lower. In 1992, we see some further easing, particularly if the inflation rate does come out around 4% or less. A prime rate of 10 or less is possible in that environment. Over the 1993-95 period, we are suggesting some continuing easing in real and nominal rates, some stability returning to the system.

On any day-to-day or week-to-month basis, we caution you against trying to bet against the Bank of Canada in terms of the movements of interest rates. They are full of surprises.

Another key variable is the federal government balance, how it stacks up, because that may condition again the environment within which you are operating. In 1990 the deficit slipped somewhat from both the plan and the previous year. Basically, the slowing growth and higher interest rates that were in the February budget have caused them to raise their deficit forecast by some $2 billion.

In 1991, we suggest there will be a substantial further slipping of the federal balance with the startup costs of the goods and services tax and a weak economy. The costs of the Gulf war may or may not be significant. We can talk about that, if you want, in your question period. Lower interest rates, if they materialize, will help somewhat. Our estimate is roughly $8 billion higher than their target in the last budget, on a fiscal-year basis $27 billion, $28 billion or roughly $35 billion, compared to the fiscal year 1990-91 of about $5 billion.

In 1992, with improved economic growth and with lower interest rates, we see some turnaround in the deficit here, lowering by about $2 billion from the level achieved in 1991, and some further improvements as you move out.

The key and most important factor in what happens to the federal government balance will be a restoration of interest rates to more normal levels, real interest rates. We can talk again about that, if you wish, at greater length.

The exchange rate appreciated somewhat in 1990, averaging over 85 cents—about 85.6, I think, was the final number—as interest rates remained high relative to US rates. We are expecting some depreciation in 1991. But I must tell you that that is a tenuous forecast. We have been wrong there, I think, as much as we have been right. Again we see some further easing in 1992, 1993, 1995. If this does happen, it helps on the real growth side, it helps our exports. It gives you a bit more inflation, and that is the tradeoff, but it would be consistent with the story of some easing interest rates that I portrayed to you a few moments ago.

Very quickly, what are some of the short-term concerns that we have? Obviously, the recession itself: How long how bad? Will in fact this interest rate break continue? Everyone is so excited about interest rates or the bank rate being down below 11, the prime rate at 12 or declining. But I would suggest to you that, setting aside the goods and services tax effects for the moment, you are still looking at real interest rates in the Canadian economy in the order of bank prime 8%. In Treasury bills you are looking at something in the order of 6% to 7%, taking a 4% view of inflation.

When we look a little bit outside of the Canadian system, we see a US system in which the financial institution main in trouble, real estate projects are still in jeopardy, real estate loans are still problems. So we could get some nasty surprises in that dimension.

The goods and services tax is a reality. We are watching how it does work through the system. But clearly, in the first year in particular, it does hit the consumer; that has not been an issue of dispute. The overall economy was supposed to be roughly neutral. This depended on investment picking up in response to lower investment costs. We will be looking for that to occur.

Then, of course, we will all watch what is happening in the Middle East where things could go, it seems to me, either way, up with oil prices over $40 or down $15 or more. As I say, if those get pushed off the popular list of concerns, we ought not to forget the fallout potential from the constitutional debate or other actions in that area.

Let me try to take a quick whack at some considerations to prompt some questions in this whole area about whether any provincial fiscal action is desirable. I understand this is a pre-budget feeling out or setting up. The old adage in Canada has been primarily that any sort of contra-cyclical fiscal policy, that is, something trying to do something about a recession and a rise in unemployment, is the prerogative of the federal government; "purview" not in any constitutional sense, but that the feds are in some sense the right group to do it.

This has been taken on head-on in a recent article by Tom Courchene in the second volume of the C. D. Howe Institute's inflation study called Taking Aim. There is an extended section in there on provincial fiscal policy. Basically the point that he is making there—I think they all have some legitimacy—is that would be great if in fact the federal government were willing or capable of taking contra-cyclical fiscal policy, but what if it does not or cannot. In particular, with a high interest rate and a focus on inflation reduction as its overall objective, you run into the situation we are in currently where the federal government, at least up through 2 August, would have taken credit for the recession and the rise in unemployment rate as a deliberate policy to slow the economy down.

Tom Courchene argues that we ought to look again at the old adage and recognize that different parts of the country, particularly in the Canadian context, may be behaving quite differently. There may be relative price shocks that help one area versus another. For example, at the moment or up until 15 January, one would have said Alberta was given a psychological boost at least and certainly something in the order of $3 billion a year at annual rate on the higher oil price flowing into that economy, the private sector, another couple of billion into the Treasury. At the same time, Ontario was getting hit by overvalued exchange rates and by interest rate policy, two variables which Ontario was particularly sensitive to among the provinces. In that kind of an environment, what makes you think a national contra-cyclical policy would be appropriate? Should you not be tuning it in fact to the particular regions?

One of the other factors he raised is that the fiscal multipliers at the national level may be difficult to move around. There may be more opportunities for focusing particular expenditures, ones with higher domestic content, at the provincial level. Of the areas that you might want to stimulate for that purpose, the non-tradeable goods and services are again areas that perhaps are most directly in the bailiwick of the provincial governments. Interest rate policy is something which the feds basically have to keep interest rates in line between Canada and the world, although Tom realizes that the bank has not been quite doing that over the last several years, and he raises the hope that there might be a concerted action with some co-ordination with the federal counterpart.

In other words, if a province could stimulate and the federal government would not offset it at the same time, you might have a basis for a somewhat more tailored or more focused fiscal policy than we have. If you were to do that—these of course make sense for both the federal side and the provincial side—in the provincial context the kinds of things you can do are obvious: reducing various taxes, particularly sales tax, speeding up infrastructure spending—we have already seen some announcements of intent to do that by this government—fast-track expansion of social housing, starting up of planned hospital and school construction now, adjusting unindexed welfare payments.

In this particular environment we are in currently, that would go some way to offset the shocks from the oil price increases that are already in the system. Then there are other things, basically the criteria, something which is fast-acting, reversible and where you can minimize the leakages into imports.

1420

So let's do it, right? No questions. Well, there are constraints out there and those include what the fiscal position of the province is. Will there be offsetting federal moves? If there are, all you will have managed to do is twist the people in the provincial economy, one way by provincial policy and then the other way by federal policy. There may be constraints in terms of leakages, although again I suspect any leakage to other provinces of increased economic activity might well be welcomed. Then you may be constrained in terms of how many options of speedy things you have to do if you have already exhausted that list.

Let me stop there. I hope I have occasioned at least a couple of questions, and if not, we will get back on schedule real quick.

Mr Sutherland: You have presented all your figures here. I do not claim that my knowledge of economics is that great, but you seem optimistic that we are going to come out of the recession later this year. I look at what you forecast for 1991, 7% inflation, right? You also expect the federal deficit to be going up $8 billion and that leads you to believe, though, that at the same time the interest rates will come down towards 11%. I do not see how a 7% inflation rate and an $8-billion increase in the deficit, based on what the Bank of Canada has been doing, is going to come down. If that does not come down, I cannot see the Canadian dollar coming down significantly, which has an effect on the manufacturing sector which is supposed to drive our economy.

Mr McCracken: Should I explain it?

Mr Sutherland: Yes. Looking at that, it does not seem we are going to recover as quickly as what you said in your brief.

Mr McCracken: Okay. I purposefully chose to sort of put out that 7% number just hoping I would get a response like that. The consumer price index is a useful measure. Every month it is timely but it is a terrible measure of what is really happening out there in terms of inflationary forces in the economy. It includes all the indirect taxes, it includes tuition fees, it includes imported goods, and in the case of the goods and services tax, we know the whole effect of it is to concentrate the tax on the consumer. That is the whole purpose of the exercise. So we know that if we are going to look at any price, it is going to be the CPI that is likely to get the biggest hit from those kinds of things.

It is also important to distinguish between inflation—and perhaps I should have done so in my comments—meaning an ongoing process in which prices continue to move out at some phase, and one-time price shocks. Both the oil price and the GST should both be viewed as one-time shocks to the price level, not as inflation. In the case of the GST, while the consumption deflator or CPI will go up roughly 1.2% as a result of the GST alone, at the same time, in 1991, investment prices will be declining by 2%, machine and equipment prices declining by 6%, government investment by 1.8%, even government expenditures, the deflator will be going down slightly. Exports will be declining about three tenths of a point.

If you look at a broad measure of the price behaviour in the Canadian economy, the so-called GDP deflator or the national gross domestic product deflator, the total impact of the GST on that measure is only about one tenth of one per cent and that number for 1991 would be in the order more of 5% or less when the CPI is 7%. Same story if you look at the world oil price. While it might be adding somewhere between 1% and 3% to inflation in 1991 if it is at $30, if it reverses to $20 in 1992, you would be taking 1% to 3% in the other direction.

I think one has to distinguish those two components and I would suggest to you the Bank of Canada in a public statement has said it will. They will not be reacting to the oil price shock or the GST shock. They will be standing on guard for thee against any induced effects from those. But with a slack economy it is not clear that you are going to have large induced effects, so we would suggest that they will be reacting to something in the order of a 4% or 5% inflation environment, maybe even towards 3% and 4%, which is consistent with interest rates coming down.

In fact, if they were perhaps a bit more sensible, the rates would come down even a lot more because the level of real interest rates, that is, nominal interest rates less the rate of inflation, is still extremely high. It has been high for most of this period of expansion as they have tried to experiment with a new way of conducting monetary policies. So think about the 7%, but also do not forget about the 3% in terms of what is coming up.

Mr Sutherland: But do not worry about that deficit increase that you mentioned, because that seems significant in what has been talked about before about keeping the deficit under control so they do not have to put interest rates up.

Mr McCracken: I do not think they will have to put interest rates up because of the deficit. There is a debate in economics in terms of which way the arrows flow. I tell you with mathematical certainty that higher interest rates raise the deficit, the debt servicing costs. It is much more dubious about the arrow running the other way: large deficits in fact cause higher interest rates? That is particularly dubious in an international economy or open economy like the Canadian economy.

I would suggest to you most of the reason that the deficit will soar in Canada is because we will be growing 3% to 4% below potential growth. In that kind of an environment, you have no expectation other than a rise. Unemployment insurance contributions are fixed in 1991 and 1992 so that they will take the full heat on the unemployment insurance program and the federal deficit in the two years.

There are a lot of things that are working adversely, but again, one ought not panic on it, because if you can restore the economy back to growth to get that turnaround and you can keep those interest rates moving down, a lot of the heat will come off the public deficit.

I will try to make my other responses a little shorter. I think that is a good question.

Mr Christopherson: First off, I want to thank you for the presentation. I particularly like the format and the simplistic, if you will, way that you have laid out all the key issues.

Mr McCracken: Can we change that to say "simple and clear" as opposed to "simplistic"?

Mr Christopherson: Fair enough. Given Hansard accuracy, we will make sure we say the right thing.

I really was impressed. Many of the presentations have been as equally good in their calibre, but harder to distinguish the most key things being brought forward. I thoroughly enjoyed this.

I have just a couple of questions, both of which are on the third to last page. You said in your notes that the financial system is in deep trouble. I think you used the phrase that there could be some nasty surprises. I would be curious to know your opinion on what would happen if there were major bank failures. There are already some. Some are suggesting that the S and L is the tip of the iceberg vis-à-vis the entire financial situation in the state. If the banks start to tumble, how would that affect us and what should we watch for?

The other thing is under the last point on the possibility of $40 per barrel. It was suggested by a previous presenter—they did not use a $40 figure, mind you, but they suggested that probably what we would see is just, as they qualified the word "just," an extension of the recession for one or two more quarters and that there would be any real further deepening of the recession or any other impacts. I was rather surprised by that, but I would like our thoughts on whether you think that is "just" an extension that would happen, or are there other things that would happen if that turned out to be the reality.

Mr McCracken: On the US side, you can be schizophrenic. You can get very, very worried. When you look at the number of banks, as opposed to savings and loans, that are on the level 4 list, in trouble, when you see large institutions like the Bank of New England having to become the New Bank of New England, when you see some of the largest banks in the world posting large losses, in the case of First City or Citibank, you can become very concerned.

In the conduct of monetary policy in the US, we often think—and even in this country we often say that the first objective is to get inflation down da-da-da, but there is a page 1 and we ought to realize why the Federal Reserve system is what it is today and the pressures that put in place at the Bank of Canada. Basically, page 1 says, "You shall not let the financial institution in the system in the country come down around our ears," because we have had that before. We have had that in the US in the 1930s when the banks all had to be closed.

I think what you really want to think through, and put a very low probability on, is system-wide failure. So what then is the next step? The next step is one in which the Federal Reserve and the regulatory institutions take a heavier and heavier hand in the regulation of economic or financial institutions in the US; where there is probably a tendency to lower interest rates, thinking that that will reduce the cost of money to those institutions, allow them perhaps to spread their margins, which is what happened with most of the interest-rate declines in 1990—the borrowers did not see the lower rates, but the spreads of the banks were widened to keep them profitable, or to keep them at least above water—and there will be a focus on getting the economy moving.

Inevitably, when that happens, though, there are some secondary effects. Basically, financial institutions get tighter in terms of their credit-granting. They start getting credit-conscious. You start having other institutions getting in trouble, some non-financial corporations, where the banks throw up their hands and pull the plug or they cannot get the financing and therefore they go into bankruptcy.

I do not think it is going to get completely out of hand, but I would suggest to you that it is going to be a continued pressure. As a result, it makes one less optimistic about the US economy growing, but it probably makes you more optimistic about the kind of interest rate policy it will pursue. In other words, there will be a tendency to err on the downside to lower rates in the US environment. That is a positive item for us; at least it gives us more room in which we could move our interest rates down without any exchange rate consequences.

To the extent that these failures lead to problems on real estate loans, lead to problems of syndicates that the Canadian banks are involved in, it could cause them some problems in terms of larger losses. But again, I do not know of any bank in this country that is so involved in US real estate or so heavily involved in any one particular activity that it is going to have any destabilizing problems. Sure, they are going to lose some money, but it should not affect their decision process here. In fact, it might even remind them that there are some good opportunities here.

On the second point, the easiest way, I find, and it seemed to work pretty well in keeping my thinking sorted out during the first oil price shocks and all the oil price shocks, is to just think of it as a big tax increase. So for every US$10 the world oil price goes up we are consuming basically 50 million barrels a day. That is $500 million a day, so that runs out at about $200 billion a year that you would have for every $10 tax increase. In Canada we consume roughly 600 million barrels a year, so for every $10 that would be another $6-billion tax hike.

Whenever you raise taxes, the immediate question comes up, what do the people who get the money do with it, compared to what happened to the people who paid the tax? If we are paying the tax, we are going to cut back on our expenditures. What happens to the people who get it? If it is going to the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries and we are not respending it in Canada, then that is a leakage. We lose that. If it is going to Alberta Treasury and it is simply using it to retire debt and to stock up financial assets, there is no recycling going on. If it goes to the oil companies that are paying off loans and improving their balance sheets but not doing any investment, then there is no recycling in that area. If it is going to the federal government in higher corporate income taxes, and then they are using it to reduce the deficit, there is no recycling.

That is the worst case where you would get $6 billion. If it goes to $40 billion, it is another $6 billion on top of that. And it is not a one-timer; it is continuing as long as that price stays up there. So I do not see how people could argue, "Oh well, it is just another couple quarters of damage," because it is a permanent diversion of income. It is not going to be transitory unless you think the world is one in which oil prices now will stay at $30 or $40, in which case then you begin to see some recycling occurring out there.

You see the oil companies saying: "Let's go put some more holes in the ground. Let's look at secondary and tertiary recovery. Let's dust off some of these megaprojects and go with those." Or you see the Alberta government cutting other taxes out there, buying consumer goods, which has a shadow effect back here. Or you see the federal government saying, "With that source of income, I do not need to take as much out of your pocket over here." So it is recycling in some sense.

In the ultimate sense, if you could somehow ensure yourself that this tax increase would trigger twice as much spending over here, then you could get a positive effect out of it. But the betting at the moment is that any of these jumps in oil price would be viewed as transitory, the exception being, for example, that a significant part of the Saudi oilfields were taken out and taken out in a way where people say there is no way that is going to be coming back on stream for a number of years. Then I think you would see people focusing everywhere. Where can I get some oil? You would see Hibernia and you would see tarsands plants. It would be a rather macabre world in which to do that.

Mr Christopherson: What would be the effect on the economy of that say, $6 billion, if that is what went out to OPEC?

Mr McCracken: Well, $6 billion is roughly 1% of the economy, so you are basically sucking 1% out. That is the easiest way to think about it.

Mr Christopherson: And that would do what, though? In a recessionary time, that would have the effect of—

Mr McCracken: You have a 1% growth, an unemployment growth 0.5% or more as a result of that. So it is just like, it does not matter who puts the tax on.

Mr Turnbull: Mr McCracken, I would like to throw out your views on this question of debt. The provincial debt, during the last five years of the Liberal government, increased substantially. That was during a period of probably the best growth that Ontario has had in the last 50. It was not just a question of the debt load, it was actual increases in program spending where, as I believe, during that same period the federal government has been able to control program spending within the tax that it is gathering, but it has not been able to wrestle down the debt and therefore the cost of servicing it has increased that debt.

What is your view as to, I mean, if you were to advise all parties here on what we have to do and how urgent it is to start addressing the paydown of the debt. I do not think anybody here would suggest that this is the appropriate year to do it in, but there has to be a certain point in time when you as an economist would say that this is the appropriate direction for the government to go in. What sorts of benchmarks would you use as to when that battle would be appropriate?

Mr McCracken: Let me try to tackle that. First off, can we all assume we are not talking about waste in government expenditure, we are not talking about all of that stuff? We all, as a motherhood or fatherhood virtue, will go for more efficiency in government spending wherever we can get it. Let's put that canard aside, all right?

The issue then comes down first to, what is the social return that you get on the activities you undertake as a provincial government, and how do those compare to the financial cost of borrowing to finance that kind of an increase if you chose to finance at the margin, some of that through debt? That is the basic question.

Now if in fact, as they are all supposed to, your departments and the people coming to you soliciting funds, have done a proper benefit-cost study and have shown that their real rate of return exceeds the 10% real or the 8%, whatever the hurdle rate is in this province, and if you can borrow at 4% or 5% real, then what is the problem? There is none.

I am talking theory here now. The only still residual nagging problem that there may be is if you are in a world, as we unfortunately have been for most of the 1980s, where the absolute level of real interest rates exceeds the real growth of the economy.

Then the thing you know is that that debt-to-GDP ratio for the province, the ratio of your debt divided by the size of your economy, will continue to rise as long as that real interest rate exceeds the real growth, unless you are prepared to run a substantial so-called operating surplus or primary surplus. That is not theory, that is arithmetic.

The question mark even then is, so what? In other words, what happens with a rising debt-to-GDP ratio? There are conjectures that this could be a problem, although those conjectures have proven so far to be unsubstantiated because debt ratios have been rising for the corporate sector, for the government sectors, not just in Canada but in the US and elsewhere.

Certainly, we have historical periods in which the debt ratio was extremely high; coming out of the Second World War, over 100%, the federal debt-to-GDP ratio, double what it is today. But at that point in time our environment was one in which real interest rates were low, real growth was high and we found that that debt-to-GDP ratio essentially evaporated over time. We outgrew it. So you, it seems to me, have both a microproblem, ie, are our systems for making judgements about what we do on programs and on new capital expenditure such that we are assured we are getting good returns on those decisions relative to our borrowing costs?

Second, what kind of an environment are we going to be living in over the next decade in terms of real interest rates relative to the real growth of the economy? In other words, are they going to be greater than 3% real or not? If they are greater than 3% real, you should recognize that you will face rising debt-to-GDP ratios if you choose to not offset that with some kind of a primary surplus. You may or may not lose sleep over that. Certainly a lot of people lose sleep over it, but they do not do anything about it. We have had rising debt-to-GDP ratios in the US, Canada, Italy and in most other countries of the world. But that is really what it boils down to.

Now, when have I raised this notion federally with people, that the real rates return and what they do should exceed their real borrowing cost and that they are, of course, doing these proper benefit-cost studies, all I get is eyes rolling back into their heads and saying, "Gee, I wish we did have that information."

So if that is the problem, I mean, if you are not confident that the returns that are occurring out of your expenditure are greater than your borrowing cost, then you have a problem. But that is a management problem, it seems to me, about what you choose. You want to make that choice regardless of whether you are debt-financing it or not. I mean, there is no point in your going out and spending money on a program, even if you are running a surplus, if the return on that particular program from the societal viewpoint is lower than what return you would get if you left the funds out there to be used by people and not taken away from them in taxation or in future commitments through the debt.

So I am not trying to be simplistic on you, but it seems to me you can focus on a couple of problems. You may say as a strategy, if you think real interest rates are going to remain high for the decade, that we ought to be leaning towards something where we stabilize that debt growth or do not let it get too high. That might mean that you have to choose a mix where you are running an operating surplus or a primary surplus as you get out there.

Again, I think your comment was quite well taken. You want to choose that time carefully. It is a long-term choice that you are making and certainly, when you are operating as we are now in a recession economy, the last thing you want to do is to convince people that your actions are going to make it worse and longer, because that runs the danger of triggering a loss of consumer and business confidence, which could in fact deliver on a much worse outlook and choke off a lot of private decisions to spend or to invest.

Mrs Sullivan: I want to go back to your final two pages as I frame this question. It seems to us that as we have listened to presenters during this period, and from what we know about this recession, that there are two factors involved in this particular downturn in the economy. One of them is structural change, and the other is the recessionary factors which have been described in great detail. In the manufacturing sector we are probably looking at a sector which will never have a recovery in employment that we would have seen, say, before 1982 when there was a structural change following that. Probably manufacturing is as lean and mean as it will ever be.

I am interested in seeing some of the figures on our business investment growth and seeing that, although there is a decline in that area, there is still substantial business investment and in fact continuing emphasis on research and development. I was interested that you and the Conference Board both talked about, and this is the first time that I have heard it, a severe decline in manufacturing and machinery equipment. In the long run, if we are looking at injections of provincial dollars to jig the economy, to jig a recovery, if you like, I am wondering, given that the predictions of a short-term period for recovery, that we are talking now about another two quarters if in fact the injection of provincial funding is valid and valuable. Second, what sectors, given structural change in certain sectors, would that injection to rejig the economy, to reflate the economy, be most valuable in? In fact, what is the value, if any, of provincial jiggling?

Mr McCracken: Let's start with separating out recessions from structural change. Okay. First off we cannot, but the one thing we typically notice is that structural changes happen slowly. In fact, that is why we call them that. I would suggest to you, just to be a bit heretical, that the structural changes, for example the deregulation, the GST and yes, even the free trade agreement have little to do with the recession that the Canadian economy is currently in, or the Ontario economy.

Some sense of that you could get from asking what was the largest possible effect you might have gotten relative to prices or on tariff removal out of the free trade agreement, and compare that to the kinds of movements in the exchange rate that have occurred over the last couple of years, you would see that that is the dominant element more so than the other one. If you recall, on the unemployment rate side, we have the economy moving up to 8.3% with vigorous economic growth in 1992 through 1995, ie, above potential. Nevertheless the unemployment rate still only comes down to about 7% at the end of that period or 6%-something in the case of Ontario, still below where you were two years ago.

I do not think that somehow you have this little window of a month or two that you can help, and after that it is all roses. You could start now and spend money to get this economy moving and build your capital projects, and they will still be contributing to an improved economic outlook certainly over the next several years. And that is why I talked, when I first started, that this sort of 3% real is needed almost to stand still. Above that, we have to go and get the unemployment rate down. There is lots of room for the economy to move forward.

Where do you spend it? How do you spend it? You might well want to look at some of these structural changes that are occurring out there and ask the question, is there something we can do to make them work better? In other words, globalization is an issue. The free trade agreement is an issue. The GST is an issue—on and on and on. The answer is, sure, you can, and in particular the area that economists focus on often is infrastructure, for two reasons: First, it is a responsibility of government so you have your hands on that lever; second, infrastructure is something which helps the economy function better. It helps private productivity improve—not just nice to have, okay?

Take a simple example in this province, and some of you, I am sure, are closer to this issue than I am. I do not know if anyone here realizes that Ottawa is part of the problem. There are difficulties in moving people and goods and services in and out of this province. I am told that there are increasing backlogs at most bridges, that we may well find people locating elsewhere, like in Buffalo, not because of any great virtues of the city of Buffalo, but simply to be able to provide dependable supply to customers in the US from a warehouse located there. Why is that? We have choke points. The fact is that Ontario is an island when you get right down to it. What do you do about that? You build some bloody bridges. You improve the flow of traffic or you look at ways of otherwise decongesting it.

There is also a temptation to talk about physical infrastructure—roads, sewage treatment plants—but we ought to broaden our concept of infrastructure way beyond that, and of course two of the key areas are people, in the form of education and their health, and then research and development, or capital stock that we have in terms of intellectual activity. You have touched on both of those. I think those are key areas, and areas which not only have a benefit in some broad social sense, but also benefits to the individuals, benefits to the private decision process.

If you are asking where I would put my emphasis. It would be there. I must say that I do not share your pessimism about manufacturing. We expect a substantial bounce-back in manufacturing output in 1992, 1993 and 1994, and in fact so strong that in 1994 manufacturing employment will be back over the 1989 level. That is vigorous. But you are quite right that it has been dropping for a while and certainly we get down in 1991 to a level that is—

Mrs Sullivan: But with substantially fewer employers.

Mr McCracken: No, on the employment side I even catch up, but that takes vigorous growth and we have double-digit or 7% or 8% growth for two or three years after the recession.

One other point I would like to get on the record is something which I think confuses decision-making, at the federal level certainly, and it often causes some problems with other provinces. There are two ways you can think of things: One is that if Ontario grows that hurts other areas, or you can recognize the reality that if Ontario grows it is helpful to other provinces.

There was a lot of discussion, as you may recall, over the last four or five years about how we have to slow down Toronto or how we have to slow down Ontario to somehow benefit the rest of the country. That is hogwash. If you slow down Ontario or you slow down Toronto, you slow down the rest of the country and we are, I think, amply going to be demonstrating that again.

Mrs Sullivan: Take this quote and circulate it around the country.

Mr McCracken: But the flip side of that is that if in fact you can speed up Ontario, other regions will benefit as well. Conversely, if other regions stimulate as Quebec at the moment is starting to do in a couple of areas, there will also be a positive shadow effect back into Ontario. Keep that in mind in your activities, that if you can get this economy moving vigorously that will be not just to Ontario's benefit, but to all.

Mr Phillips: This is good news again. I think that when you are in the middle of a storm, you cannot see the end of it, but I think every economic forecaster—the three banks, yourself, the Conference Board of Canada—have all predicted a recovery in the mid to the latter part of this calendar year. I think you say that it will come towards the end of this calendar year.

Mr McCracken: I think trying to pick a month—we cannot even measure it that close. At the provincial level it is hopeless.

Mr Phillips: Right, but we are into that sort of range that we are only months away from—

Mr McCracken: Well, 1992 will be a good year compared to 1991, but 1991 is a terrible year; 1990 was a very bad year. You have had two very bad years where you have given up 4% growth in 1990 and you have given up another 4% growth over potential likely in 1991. That is 8% of a gap that you opened up in two years between where you wanted to be and where you are now, so if you want to get out of that hole you have to grow 3% to 4% a year, plus somewhere pick up that 8% growth—2% a year, 3% a year. You can have very, very vigorous growth and still not run into any brick walls out there. The hope is there, but do not let that be an excuse for saying, "Therefore, let's not do anything."

Mr Phillips: No, I understand that.

Mr McCracken: Okay, because that is a condition forecast, that you do not move in the wrong direction and that we do get a return on business investment, that business investment is not hit terribly bad, that it is helped by the GST, that they take advantage of that break, that we do get a turnaround on the US side, that we do get some sensible monitoring on fiscal policy management, and that will help you.

Mr Phillips: I really did not get my question out and am not sure I am going to. I will talk quickly. The ballparks answers that come out at the end of the year—this may be too difficult and if the other members do not want to hear it, fine, just in terms of—

Mr Stockwell: I do not want to hear it.

Mr Phillips: Okay. Your forecasting must take into account the impact of the GST and the free trade agreement. I do not want to get into a whole debate about good or bad, but I would like your opinion of whether for Ontario that is something that is going to be helpful to the economy.

Mr McCracken: No problem. There are published results on this. Let's just make it simple and go 10 years out. Think of it as a structural program. Ten years out both the goods and services tax and the free trade agreement will have been a positive thing for the Ontario economy and for the Canadian economy. It will be particularly a benefit for Ontario in both cases. Why? Because this is where most of the manufacturing is. This is the province in which most of the investment goods are made and so anything which is a positive effect for people's desired levels of investment can redound to this province, and that is the fundamental nature of both the GST and of the FTA. You do not have to believe it, but that is the result of quite a few studies that have been made on both the GST and the FTA by province, and are reproducible as opposed to the conjecture view.

Now run it back and say, "What about the first year, the second year?" By and large in both cases we get positive effects on the FTA, essentially wash effects in the case of the GST in the earlier period. The wash effects in the GST when you take it down to a provincial basis, are slightly positive for Ontario, slightly negative for some of the other regions, because again the items where the tax is coming off relatively, those things that paid a lot of manufacturer's sales tax, are more dominantly made in Ontario. The other manufactured products which are being taxed for the first time are dominantly being made in some of the other provinces, particularly Quebec and Manitoba.

Mr Phillips: That is with manufacturing job increases.

Mr McCracken: It is a small part of the total. That is the other thing I would like to leave with you, that the whole FTA effects on the province of Ontario over a 10-year period have been more than blown away in the last year or two through the kinds of swings in the economy.

at have occurred. The total impact on the provincial economy might be a level of income per person or GDP of 6% or 4%. I just mentioned We have opened up a gap of 6% in the case of manufacturing and an even larger gap over what we could have done, so the other thing, as a reminder, is to just keep your perspective, that the way we manage the macroeconomy can be a hell of a lot more important than these effects of some of these structural policies. On the other hand, getting 3% and another 1% or from the GST are all in a sense positive things to have going for you that will raise the real income levels per capita over the longer haul.

The Vice-Chair: I hope you liked the answer there, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I am just looking for the truth.

The Vice-Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee after the invitation we sent out to you and I think you have enlightened us quite a bit with your predictions.

Mr McCracken: My pleasure.

ONTARIO COUNCIL OF REGENTS FOR COLLEGES OF APPLIED ARTS AND TECHNOLOGY

The Vice-Chair: The Ontario Council of Regents for Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology, Mr Pascal. Sorry for the time delay there, but we have been running behind all day.

Mr Pascal: My congratulations to you for your sustenance in terms of not only the important content, but the intimate in the room is a major challenge for you I am sure.

Thank you very much for the opportunity to spend a few moments with you. I am here to talk a little bit about a success story, to talk a little bit about lifelong learning and to talk a little bit about renewal and institutional change in post-secondary education. I wonder if I have your permission not to, at any time during my remarks, ask for money. I wonder if that is appropriate.

Mrs Sullivan: Refreshing.

Mr Pascal: It may be novel.

Mr Phillips: You are going to a new job, though, on Monday, are you not?

Mr Pascal: On Friday, I am told, so I do not know how to spell swan song, but I am very pleased to talk a little bit about the colleges. If it is okay, I would really rather talk more philosophically than financially, because I see that as an important mission.

The first question I would like to ask—and I wonder procedurally, whether it is okay for me to ask questions of the committee—with your permission, how many members have been in an Ontario community college for more than an hour?

The Vice-Chair: Studying or just touring?

Mr Pascal: In conclusion, I want to thank the committee for—perhaps I do not need to continue. A picture and an experience of an hour or more is certainly worth a couple of thousand words.

The colleges over the first 25 years of their history have indeed been a success story, but it has been a success story that is not told as often as it needs to be. The colleges have been so busy responding to requests from so many different clients that they have had very little time to bask or even time to beg. If one wants to find out about the success of the colleges, one needs only to ask the thousands of graduates, both full and part-time. One could simply ask the experienced worker who is taking a robotics retraining course for a more secure future or one could talk to the owners of a mom-and-pop, family-run hotel or motel who need in-service training to remain competitive, or with their children who will take over the business over the next several years with the self-confidence typical of a graduate of one of our tourism and hospitality programs.

The Ontario colleges over their first 25 years have been both efficient and flexible in serving a very diverse group of clients: the chronically unemployed youth lacking successful work experience, single mothers who wish to become tool and die makers or computer-aided design technicians, and young men who wish to pursue a career in nursing.

When the Ministry of Labour wants its occupational health and safety inspectors trained it turns to one of our colleges. When the Ministry of Natural Resources wants the fish in our ponds and lakes to be mercury tested it turns to our natural resource experts in our colleges. When Science North was established, it was our technology experts from a local college who provided the upfront leadership and training to enable that enterprise to get off to a successful start. When the young and experienced with major special needs and a variety of handicaps present themselves, the colleges, all 23, seemed to have responded quite ably.

You all have received a summary of the Vision 2000 document. I did not, through the clerk, send you the complete report, although it is a user-friendly report that is short enough and easy enough to read that I commend the full report to you and would be pleased to provide members with the complete report. But more important than the 40 recommendations that you have noted in that report is the process itself. The process was the most important part of the product. It was an experiment in collaborative policy. When I use the word "collaborative," I am talking about shared power. I am talking about a process of inclusion in terms of involvement of all the stakeholders within the college system, together with our external stakeholders, and a process which included, as members of the committee know, a political inclusion in terms of members of all three parties through one interview process or another.

As a result of it, we have some new directions for the colleges which suggest again that the colleges are willing to not just ask for financial support, but simply the moral support required to get on with institutional renewal and institutional change. The colleges in Ontario and my college colleagues, the 15,000 individuals who work within the colleges, the 23 college presidents, the leaders of OPSEU, our provincial union, and so many other stakeholders are prepared to engage in a process of renewal because they all own the recommendations that you can read very easily in the draft summary.

There is a preparedness to do the right thing for the sake of Ontario's citizens in the name of taking lifelong learning, a phrase which shows up in the speeches of educators and others. That phrase has to become a tangible reality for so many Ontarians.

The directions that you have noted I will summarize very simply as the need for quality to be assured through province-wide standards, a major broadening of the curriculum so that our graduates are not only gainfully employed, but that successful employment becomes successful employability over the lifetime of the college system's graduates.

The college system has done a superb job with so many, but for so many the open door has been a revolving door. Our level of attrition is unacceptable. The amount of accessibility that we have enjoyed we think has been superb. The stakeholders in the system with whom we shared the Vision 2000 process tell us that the colleges need to be more accessible, and for those who come in, we have to ensure that they have reasonable opportunities for success, and for so many that has not been the case.

Finally, I notice that you have had discussions today with my colleagues from other parts of the education panel. You have talked to leaders from the school systems. You have talked to my friends and colleagues from the university system. My guess and my hope is that you have heard their interest in ensuring that our educational system becomes a seamless opportunity for lifelong learning. Right now there are so many systemic barriers in the way of having lifelong learning become that tangible reality to which I referred. The Vision 2000 report talks about the need for very strong linkages between the schools and the colleges and some enabling mechanisms to bring that about.

With respect to our post-secondary system, it is surprising to me, after 25 years, the isolationism that both sides of the post-secondary fence have enjoyed, if I can use that rather bizarre expression to describe it. That simply has to be part of the past. We have to ensure that in this province, a province where we talk often of developing our human resources, there are no systemic barriers to achieving full and equal credit for what people have done in learning institutions and in life's experience. The Vision 2000 report talks about methodologies for ensuring that happens.

My guess is, having looked at your schedule today, that you may have heard differences of opinion about topics such as university tuition from groups representing universities. Let me urge upon everyone who studies the issues of tuition and other issues to look at these issues in a holistic and integrated way, that you cannot look at university tuition and questions of accessibility without looking at what happens to college graduates in terms of being labour-market ready, in terms of their ability to go on to university and get full credit for what they have done.

To look at tuition policy in a narrow yes or no fashion, without looking at the colleges in relation to the universities and the enabling effect that colleges can have in terms of accessibility, I think would be a mistake.

I am sure, through your smiles and response to supposition, that you may have had differences of opinion from the same sector on issues like that, that there are ways of looking at issues such as tuition in a broader and more integrated fashion. That is one of the beauties of Vision 2000. All the stakeholders are part of it. There are directions in that report about what might happen with the issue of tuition.

In the name of lifelong learning, I would simply want to table at least my personal definition of it, because it is a phrase that is used a lot, as I indicated. I am not sure I ever pause enough to define what it is we mean by those things. For me, it means learning throughout one's life in order to accrue the positive intellectual, emotional, spiritual, financial and physical benefits which arise from an individual's constant quest for personal improvement. A learning society is one in which all of its members have access to the developmental benefits of lifelong learning and can look forward to the collective effects of a future which is more fulfilling, through greater justice, equity, health, safety and comfort.

In closing, I want to read from the letter I have written to my son. My guess is, during your discussions with other stakeholder groups, that you often have people come and read letters to members of their family. Here is another example. Last summer I was asked to give a keynote address at a conference of post-secondary educational leaders in San Francisco. At the time, I had hoped that my son would be able to join me in one of our annual Blue Jay following quests. We had in mind a coastal trip following my remarks. I was feeling rather blue the evening before my remarks that Jesse was unable to join me as a result of his 11th-hour decision to go to a leadership camp. I was asked to address this conference with respect to issues of leadership and education, so I wrote a letter to Jesse which I decided to make an open letter. It was the keynote that I gave on that occasion. I am waiting for an opportunity to give the one I did not give because I spent quite a bit of time on it. It had some interesting remarks that I will save for another time.

In this letter, I said a few of the following things. I do not burden you with the complete letter.

"Jesse, by the year 2000 you will have just celebrated your 27th birthday. Scary thought. The life decisions that you and your friends and your four billion peers around the world make between now and the turn of the century will determine whether the new millennium marks a new beginning with a chance or the beginning of the end of your dreams and mine. Don't worry. A few of my educational friends will assist, especially those involved with community colleges as we know them in North America.

"And Jesse, I don't know when I have been prouder of a parent than when you and I visited Durham College a few months ago in order for you to check out their student administration program. It was the first time that I had entered a college as a parent. It was a great day for me, I hope it was for you, but I don't think I told you I oving the experience was for me. Suddenly, our Vision 2000 project on the future of the community college system in Ontario took on a deeper, more personal meaning for me. One of my own kids was going to a community college. It felt great. My commitment to community college education was genuine. Did I have doubts? Not really, but feeling good in the gut was very comforting.

"You know, Jess, going to a community college is more than just entering a system of education. It's more like joining a movement, at least that's the way I would like you to see it. It's a progressive movement designed to put out beliefs about equity and fairness, to promote a lifetime of learning for all, to realize accessibility as an opportunity to succeed in reaching high standards.

"Education generally has an essential role to play in the development of a world which is peaceful, environmentally sound, equitable and economically viable. Education should help balance individual and community needs and foster personal initiative and co-operation within human relationships based on mutual respect.

"Education, in particular community college education, should ensure that people have the opportunity to develop the skills and knowledge they need to adapt to and make constructive contributions to the world in which they live. Education should enhance students' choices and opportunities and promote the development of individual potential. It should also assist learners in developing their commitment to social responsibility and care for the communities in which they live, and respect for cultural integrity and self-determination of those whose language and traditions may be different from their own.

"At the heart of this, Jesse, is the notion that leadership is a very collaborative process. Collaboration means sharing power and it means living the equity message.

"Jess, I know you've often discussed with me what you'll want to do when you grow up. There are exciting possibilities for you because you are blessed with many natural talents. But I am more concerned with what you will be, not just what you will do. Participating in the community college movement as a student should help you on both counts. Because I am a bit older, I have a clearer sense perhaps of what I would like to be if and when I ever grow up, and the community college movement we are soon to share will help in so many ways.

"Jesse, let's be less proud of what we already know and more invigorated by what we have yet to learn, because we want to be leaders. It's great to love humanity, but let's like people, finding value in their diversity of mind, experience and culture, because we're part of a movement.

"Let's learn to deal gracefully and securely with ambiguity and complexity, because we're leaders.

"As healthy, white, privileged men, let's judge our worth not by our ability to protect what we are or what we have but by a behavioural commitment to share power with those who remain unequal partners because of differences which shouldn't count when it comes to opportunities for comfort, dignity, safety, health and equality. And, Jesse, sharing power with unequal partners means giving up some power. You and I will do this because we are trying to be leaders who will lead with ideas, not the power embedded in position or office.

"And to paraphrase JFK (or Ted Sorenson, his speechwriter)"—Mr Chair, I apologize for the American reference; the setting was San Francisco—"let's ensure our college movement is informed by committed beliefs in human dignity as a source of purpose, in human liberty as a source of action, in the human heart as a source of compassion, in the human mind as a source of our invention and our ideas."

In closing I want to say simply that Vision 2000 has an agenda. It is an agenda that is owned because of the inclusive nature of the process. The college system is part of an educational panel that needs to be more integrated, more holistic in how it deals with some of the Vision statements arising from my public remarks to Jesse. Everyone who has a stake in our future, including members of your committee, needs to do everything he can and we can to develop a deeper understanding of what colleges have meant to the province of Ontario and, more importantly, what colleges can mean to realizing what I alluded to before; that is, a healthier and more comfortable, more equitable and just future. Thank you very much.

Mr Sutherland: I must say I do congratulate the former Minister of Colleges and Universities for the initiative with Vision 2000. It is a terrific document.

I just want to pick up on the articulation process and get a real sense from you as to how you feel that process is working in terms of transferability of credits from colleges to universities. I was wondering if you could also comment on what the ability is to move from college to college, because I know in the university system it is very poor. I wanted to get a sense of what it is in the college system.

Mr Pascal: Unfortunately, Mr Sutherland, as to the ability to move from institution to institution on the university side and the college side, I will tell you, through some interviews we did in Vision 2000, in some cases it is difficult to move from campus to campus within a large institution and get full credit for what you are doing in the same program. We have to ensure that when people have invested time and energy and financial resources in formal learning experiences, they get full credit for what they have done from institution to institution within the college side of the fence and certainly within the universities.

At present we have about 5% of the applicants to colleges coming from universities and about 2% of our graduates are going on to university from college. Many of the deals that students can get are based on their assertiveness. We should be designing equity based on some principles and procedures rather than whether someone is an assertive consumer or not. The mood of the receiving registrar will determine whether or not chemistry 101 at a particular university gets 0.63 credits at the sending institution, and vice versa. The same kind of thing does exist within our college system.

The good news is that in the last couple of years we do now have extant within the system about 72 degree-completion agreements between a college program and a university program, where the graduates of an early childhood education program at college A can go there and go on to university B and receive full credit and take one more year and get a degree, and vice versa. The program goes in both directions.

But we still have thousands and thousands of students who are not able to mix and match freely around the province. I will tell you one story to illustrate, I think, the intent of your question. A graduate from Fanshawe College in early childhood education—Fanshawe is in London—upon graduation wanted to return to her home town of Windsor, where St Clair College has a degree-completion arrangement with early childhood education at the University of Windsor. She asked if she could go immediately to the University of Windsor and avail herself of the same principles, and she was told: "We have a deal with St Clair but not with Fanshawe. You have to start over."

Let me simply say that while there is the beginning of some successful co-operation between our universities and our colleges, we have a long, long way to go until the issue of equitable access and mixing and matching the fine resources in both institutions is a reality.

Mr Fletcher: I was just going to comment on Vision 2000, and it was nice to see that my friend Doug Auld was at the top of the list when it came to some of the contributors. I do believe it is a very good document. It is a good document with a lot of good input. Where is it going? I guess it is along the same lines as what Kimble was asking. Where have we gone?

A lot of the recommendations, in fact all of the recommendations, are that the Ministry of Colleges and Universities "should," the college system "should," the provincial government "should." There is not a "will." There is not a commitment from any part of government or anyone else that they want to do something in there. I know it is just a vision.

Mr Pascal: Obviously we could not use "will," because we were simply—I should not say "simply." We were about 2,500 stakeholders who got together and got to "yes" with respect to major directions and a vision. But the good news is, because it was inclusive, both politically and in terms of our colleagues in ministries, not just MCU but in the Ministry of Skills Development and members of other government ministries, there is broad ownership, I believe, at this time in terms of the will that is required.

I cannot say the following will happen on some dimensions, because it is my minister. I have a minister. I report to Dr Allen, and I am very comfortable with the kind of research that he and his ministry have done in terms of what should or should not happen and when these things should happen. But while I am optimistic that you will all see tangible evidence that the will is there, the good news is that there are a lot of recommendations in Vision 2000 that have already given impetus for further dialogue and for action independent of what government decides to do. For example, there are already some very informal discussions at a very high level between college leaders and university leaders to talk about the concept of the institute without walls, the institute without walls being a no bricks-and-mortar opportunity to ensure that there is going to be that equity. Whether university X or Y decides to look at the future or a rear-view mirror would matter not.

In that context there is an awful lot of very constructive dialogue taking place. Your friend and colleague Doug Auld is among those who are involved in that. Because of the process, I am quite confident that the agenda is owned by all. I am comfortable that the government is very comfortable with the directions, and what remains I think is the manner in which things will be implemented, and the timing. But that is not my job, to make those announcements or to even handicap when they might be made.

Mr Fletcher: One supplementary: I notice the other part, as far as this document is concerned—I mean, ownership was taken over by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, but there is never a dollar figure, a numerical figure, put to some of the funding or some of the programs. What does it cost, the long-term costs of what plan to implement? I know it is difficult to do that in a crystal ball sort of way, but we do have to look at the reality of the money we are working with.

Mr Pascal: That is a very important question and obviously an apt question coming from this committee in particular, and that is why it is easy for me today to cease and desist from asking for money and from encouraging government to set aside X dollars for Vision 2000. There is a very strong tendency, when we are trying to craft public policy around the cornerstone of doing the right thing, to think about the manner in which—you know, Rome burning right now, etc, and we wanted to ensure that in spite of the fact that there are colleges right now which are well constrained by resources, we freed ourselves of asking questions about financing division. We wanted to make sure that this document, this process, was clearly setting out the direction of the system and the government in the proper direction in terms of our colleges and education generally.

With all that said, however, your question remains an important one, and right now there is a process of determining priorities in terms of direction and costs. This is more a function, I think, of the bureaucracy in the Ministry of Colleges and Universities in this instance.

What is important to say, however, is that many of the recommendations do not require large amounts of money. I am glad Mr Fletcher raised the question. Developing a mechanism for ensuring province-wide standards will cost a lot of money. It will cost a very small amount of money, if anything, in terms of redirecting funds.

The lifelong learning implications of Mr Sutherland's question will not require money. What is required is educational leaders on both sides of the post-secondary fence begin looking at the future in new ways in terms of commitment to lifelong learning. So many of the key recommendations do not require infusion of large amounts of money. Some of them do. I do not want to mislead you some of them do.

Mr Phillips: That may have answered my question, which is, we heard this morning quite an impassioned plea from the universities and I do not want the colleges shortchanged. It may be from the next group that is coming here that we may hear the financial requirements. You have brought the strategic framework.

Just while I have the floor, I wish you the best of luck on the new job, by the way. It is a fascinating and important job.

Mr Pascal: Thank you for that and, hopefully, the collaboration that I have alluded to will stand us all in good stead in terms of other things ahead, both for me and for you.

Mr Chair: I am not unaware of the fact that I am being followed by Mr Trump, who represents the council of presidents through the Association of Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology. He and I do have each other's phone numbers on our speed dial and, as a result, my guess is he may provide Mr Phillips—

Mr Phillips: Is this a tag team?

Mr Pascal: No, it is not terribly well rehearsed. We are not as good at rehearsing some of these things as our university brothers and sisters are, but my guess is my colleague Mr Trump will probably get closer to, I think, the kind of tangible expectations that members of the committee may have, and you should hear that message, but I thought my plea today ought to be a bit vision-directed and philosophical.

I do believe, in answer to the question of Mr Fletcher, that much of what has to happen will require simply will and vision rather than money. However, Mr Trump may allude to the fact that although 2,500 colleagues and 15,000 others are very enthusiastic about the directions of Vision 2000, maybe they need to be a little less numb with respect to the current state of affairs to proceed down the path of renewal.

But what is important is that commitment to change is very much there on the college side. I will not allude to whether or not my colleagues on the university side are committed to doing many new things in many new directions. I remain a university professor as well, at least for the next year and a half days, and so I have a tremendous respect for what our universities do for society at large.

My plea is that we learn how to do it together more effectively and that the social and emotional disease that I refer to as hardening of the categories in our province, where there is too much that belongs to person X or person Y or group A or group B, that is something we deal with in new ways, because I cannot think of a major social or economic issue facing the province of Ontario that can be pursued meaningfully without stakeholder groups coming together. In the context of which I speak, of course, I am talking about educational leaders from the schools and universities and of course, last but not least, from Ontario's colleges.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation.

ASSOCIATION OF COLLEGES OF APPLIED ARTS AND TECHNOLOGY

The Chair: Our next presentation is by Chris Trump from the Association of Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology. If anybody can tell us where the state of the art is going, it should be you.

Mr Trump: Let us try. I do not think I can get you back on schedule, but I will try.

The Chair: Just as a personal aside, I was present when you announced the experiment in a spaceship, the bread or yeast experiment. What happened to that?

Mr Trump: The bread in space? Sadly, the explosion of the shuttle intervened and the Getaway Special program of NASA is in as dire a strait as some other elements of the program. We have done the right things for the participants, I believe, but having been away from Spar now for a year and a half, I cannot say whether they invited them, as I suggested, to a shuttle launch to at the least partake a little bit in the space program. I believe the Ontario Science Centre had an exhibit of how the oven would have worked, but at least in this century it is not going up.

The Chair: It was a fascinating afternoon to be there when that was announced.

Mr Trump: Yes, it was great fun. I often believe that the space program gives the chance to a lot of people who are not scientists and technicians to participate in something that has bigger meaning.

Anyway, in my new role as executive director of the colleges of applied arts and technology of Ontario, I want to present to you—I will leave you a two-pager, but I would rather just speak to it—picking up where Charles left off on Vision 2000.

I was privileged to be part of the steering committee, which did indeed include members from the academic community, secondary, university, colleges, business and industry, president of IBM, labour, Jim Turk, Ontario Federation of Labour. It was an interesting series of sessions through some 18 months. If it is not quite as visionary as we would like, that is what you get when you have committees at work. If you want a visionary, send someone up on a mountain for 40 days and you will get an even more unworkable plan.

Vision 2000 has 40 recommendations. The presidents chose three of them to address: improved access, increased success in programs and academic mobility, which has a great deal to do with standards and accreditation. Three Mondays ago, we had the most interesting session ever in the history of the colleges. Around the table at the association gathered all of the constituent groups: full-time and part-time students, folks from community industrial training committees, the Ontario Public Service Employees Union, faculty, staff, administrators, presidents and governors.

The issue was, what will we tell the minister, Richard Allen, is our intention for the colleges over the next five years in terms of what we want to do? In other words, putting not only meaning and substance to the vision with milestones that are measurable, but also the costs that are associated with it.

I am pleased to report that at the end of that session we had agreement. The students felt that the physical plant at the colleges was abysmal and that a great deal more should be spent on capital improvement. The present administrative staff felt that the principal issue was how badly the administrators were treated by the college administration presidents. Fair game. I hope they tell that to Minister Allen.

But the essentials, improved access, that is, running programs in the evening that are the mirror image of those in the days, recognizing the fact that you have working mothers who need their children cared for while they are in school, all of these are things that can be quantified. There is a backlog at Cambrian College of 200 special-needs applicants who cannot be accommodated because there is no room.

Suppose we start with each college and begin to say, "What is your backlog and over the next years how will we open the doors wider?" Once you have said that, then you come to the point of, "Well, it's one thing to admit you, but suppose you flounder, find you are in over your head and quit?" The attrition rate in some technology programs is 40%. We should also establish milestones that improve retention, that is, reduce the attrition rate. This will require improved counselling, remedial instruction, and again that is a long-term objective to improve the role of the colleges.

The final one—and Charles gave the example of the early childhood education student from Fanshawe who went to Windsor and the University of Windsor said: "We have an articulation program with St Clair. You don't count." I would not necessarily knock the University of Windsor, because the colleges are woefully deficient in the area of standards and accreditation. I was pleased that when Premier Bob Rae spoke to the presidents a week after the election, at which point he said he was no more surprised than they were that he was there, he mentioned standards twice in his 20-minute remarks. I was pleased to hear that.

I was pleased to hear that OPSEU has that as number one on its list. We must have standards, because what in the world is your education worth if it cannot be measured and found to be in congruence at least within the college? We have the example of one major college which shall remain nameless that has five early childhood education programs and there is no interchangeability between them.

We have the example of a Loyalist student who after her first year went to Humber and was told, "Go back to the point of beginning in early childhood education." Fortunately Doug Auld and Squee Gordon talked about it and the case was straightened out, but what kind of a system makes a presidential case out of the efforts of an individual to move from one institution to another, to say nothing of moving from a college to a university or, God forbid, moving to another province?

We are working on that. It is something that requires a great deal of leadership within the colleges, because there are many who just love to carry on the way they are doing, taking refuge in the notion, "We are community colleges." Right, but in Ontario they are first and foremost colleges of applied arts and technology, often programs that should, in terms of outcomes, have individuals, men and women, who are competitive in a global marketplace. So that is the long-range plan, which we hope Monday next to present to Minister Allen in a two-hour session.

For the immediate, I have to tell you our backs are to the wall. I know the universities have told you this too and have documented it in greater degree than we have, because the Council of Ontario Universities has a 26-person staff. We have a four-person staff, but we try. Thanks to some very serious work done by the folks at Georgian College under the aegis of Doug Light, we have determined that next year a 12% increase in the funding base from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities is required to accommodate the 5% enrolment increase, the first in five years, that we endured this fall.

The retention rates which we have experienced now where people are no longer leaving but staying on, we give us a base increase, we anticipate, next fall of 3% and an anticipated increase of yet another 5%, if not more. That will permit us to offer the level of programs that we have at the moment. Should the increase slip to 10%, we will have to tighten belts, which means that things that we are doing now will have to be truncated.

Should the allotments slip below 10%, then the word is fiscally mandated enrolment caps. We will have to do it on a selective basis, particularly in Metropolitan colleges—I am talking about Toronto, which is where 60% of the college enrolment is in the province. It will have to be instituted. That is the unvarnished exposition. It is documented. I have the two-pager to leave with you. Should you want the documentation, I will be delighted to bring it, but as I wrote to the Treasurer, I did not want to belabour the point with still more reams of paper. I am sure you have been buried in paper a lot.

To close on a brighter note, I keep reading all the time of what is wrong with Canada, what is wrong with Ontario. I would like to submit that there are things that do not cost a lot of money, as Charles said, that give great hope for the future.

I am speaking of a movement and Charles spoke of a movement, the community college movement. This one is called Skills Canada. Its genesis was at Georgian College in Barrie, a small town in Ontario. A dynamic dean of technology there, William Leslie, said: "What if we young people in high schools and in colleges, regardless of their vocational and professional aspirations, and brought them together in clubs? Work hard, play hard, pursue what it is you are interested in, have conferences."

I was at one that they hosted in Bolton. The vice-president of Dofasco was there. The young people introduced him and thanked him; the vice-president of the SkyDome did the same thing. It develops communication skills at the same time. There are now 2,000 enrolled, 100 high schools and 9 colleges. We want to make that all 23 colleges before this year is out. The objective by 1995 is 50,000 youngsters throughout Canada, something that started here in Ontario.

What gives me the greatest hope is that for the first time ever last summer, an Ontario team which represented Canada, there being only Ontarians aboard, of 37 young people went to Tulsa for the North American Summer Olympics in competition with 4,000 Americans. Only our state garnered more medals than Ontario and that was California. We had a bronze, three silvers and two golds. The gold medals were won respectively by a Fanshawe student and a Milton high school student. The Fanshawe student was an apprentice in precision machining, the high school student in the culinary arts.

This to me is one way in which the colleges can make a mark, to put the imprimatur of dignity and the worth of all things that human beings do. If we move in the areas of access, success in programs, standards in accreditation, we will come closer by the turn of the century to having that seamless web that Charles spoke about of life-long learning or long-term training.

Anyway, end of speech. I brought copies of the article. The Financial Post has written a little bit on Skills Canada, and here is our two-pager on our needs. I will be delighted to leave that with you.

Mrs Sullivan: Your presentation was very articulate without a note, and we appreciate too the length of time that it took so that we can all have an opportunity to ask questions of you.

I am interested in your funding base increase request, 2%. I think that would probably add under $1 million to our budget. Is that right?

Mr Trump: It is a bit more than that. The funding is in the order of $750 million, so you are looking at a bit more than $1 million. In fact, $1 million is what, little more than 1%?

Mrs Sullivan: Ten million.

Mr Trump: Of $750 million, you are looking at $75 million just at 10%.

Mrs Sullivan: Good. Thank you. I just do not have those figures.

Mr Trump: It is almost like a Monopoly game when you get to that ethereal reach.

Mrs Sullivan: In that funding base, have you included increased emphasis on the access programs? I have Sheridan College in my riding. There has been great emphasis, for instance, on expanding night and after-work opportunities for people who are moving from one career to another or from one business to another, one kind of work to another, who have other pressures than the 19-year-old student has, whether family pressures or credit crunch pressures. What of your funding base would include increased emphasis on attracting the older student?

Mr Trump: I could not answer that at the moment. In other words, what we are doing literally is coming here at the eleventh and a half hour, inasmuch as the allotments normally are announced in November. What we are really steering towards, after the emergency of 1992, which is a crunch year—as I said, our backs are to the wall—is the minister's commitment.

The question was asked, "What in fact are you doing to put Vision 2000 into place?" Well, it cannot be done by just talking about it or getting on a soap box. It needs commitment from on high, saying: "You have made sense. Now begin to position some milestones and we will measure you on how you reach them." At Seneca College, they have a dean assigned to educational effectiveness. Tony Tilly's sole role is to open wider the doors and ensure that those admitted are accommodated in a way that ensures success in the programs. Whether it is at Sioux College or whether it is at Mohawk College, where George Lueddeke is in charge of the program, they are just champing at the bit: "Give us the go-ahead" and "How can we expand?"

But at the moment, their resources are finite and it is really a combination I think of your own efforts, through the minister—I might add too that 51% of the colleges' activities are non-Ministry of Colleges and Universities. That is more than half at this juncture. So we are also working with Labour and Employment and Immigration. I just learned the other day that Marion Boyd's ministry, Education, gives $100 million to the colleges. So when you get through an aggregate, you have quite a purse to fund the activities of the colleges.

By identifying this area in particular, the access, the success in programs, we believe we have something that can say, "We are moving from point A to point B and beyond."

Mrs Sullivan: You talked about some of the links between the high schools and colleges, and the major question of delivery of some of the technical and technological training has been a question in the past. To a certain extent, it was addressed in the Vision 2000 report. Have the community colleges as a group talked about the question of student assistance programs to ensure that the access is not limited to certain socioeconomic levels?

Mr Trump: I would hate to be facile, but I think it is almost a given. I think the colleges are the institutions that do have their doors open by far wider.

Mrs Sullivan: But in terms, for instance, of the Ontario student assistance plan, the loan and grants programs, do the colleges have a position on where they should go, how those programs should change, what new funding would be required for them?

Mr Trump: If they have, I have not heard about it. It is almost a case of when it does not show up at the association, at the council of presidents, it means it is in reasonably good shape. We had a bit of a kerfuffle last year because they moved the whole operation from Toronto to Thunder Bay, but as we have discovered now, it is working even better after this year of ripples than it was previously.

I would say, just as a given, that our students are accommodated at least as well as university students in terms of where is the wherewithal: a combination of loan programs, part-time work, scheduling to fit the needs of the student.

Mr Sutherland: I was wondering if you could give a brief comment on how colleges are handling the issue of the learning-disabled. I know I had one constituent approach me about his son, who is very capable—I think he might have been in an apprenticeship or technical program—who could do the actual work technically and pass it, but had trouble doing the written work because he was learning-disabled. There was really no one there, no counselling or tutorial support to help that person through. He himself can be a very competent individual, doing his specific tasks, but cannot get the certificate to go into the employment area.

Mr Trump: I think that too is an area that we have no statistics on at the moment. I get little anecdotal reports of, "If we could only, then we could help someone like that." I know Fleming College in Peterborough has instituted a program where, within the first week of enrolment, every student has a counselling session. That just psychologically sets the stage to say, "We won't let you sink."

But the ideal in my view, and I look to the States for that, is what Miami-Dade does—85,000 students in the college system down there around Miami and every one of them tracked. You cannot hiccup or get the flu without it showing up, and when the water level gets to chin-high, you are in for a counselling session with a remedial teacher assigned to you. A good move on the part of Florida, because if you think it is expensive to invest in that, look at the cost later on when you have a human being who is not employed.

We have much to do and when we say, "Success in programs," it rolls off the tongue easily. Let's get each college to say, "What in fact will you do?," presuming, and I am presuming, that the minister, Mr Allen, will say, "These three areas, go for it," and we will then give the assignment to each college, "Let's see what you can do, learn from those who have already done more than others and put a program into place." It is probably more a promise than it is real at the moment.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Vice-Chair: Next is the Ontario Public School Teachers' Federation. We have Mr Martin, president. Would you mind introducing your colleague.

Mr Martin: It is a pleasure to be here and appearing before you today. I am Bill Martin, president of the Ontario Public School Teachers' Federation. With me is Gene Lewis, the first vice-president, and there is a possibility that our general secretary, David Lennox, will also be with us this afternoon.

As most of you probably know, OPSTF is one of the five affiliates of the Ontario Teachers' Federation. We have a membership of 23,000 members comprised of statutory and voluntary teachers, occasional teachers and educational support personnel. In the brief we would like to discuss with you this afternoon, there are three major areas that we are looking into: the level of provincial support, the inadequacies of elementary grants and the need to stabilize child care in the province of Ontario.

We understand the realities of a recession. We believe, however, that an investment in elementary education and child care services should be an integral part of the government strategy for dealing with the recession and for the fostering of economic recovery.

The first area I would like to address is the provincial share of educational finance for elementary and secondary schools. Pages 2 to 4 of our brief review the current status of the provincial share of educational costs and outline the reasons why it is important to address the increasing burden of education costs born by the property taxpayer. While the governing party is on record for its commitment to restoring the provincial share to 60% and the Minister of Education has ensured us her ministry is prepared to review the full structure of financing education, these long-term commitments and The Treasurer must now take interim steps to address the issue.

I would ask you to turn to the graph on page 3 in your brief. It clearly shows that while the actual provincial expenditures have increased each year, the provincial share of educational costs has consistently declined since 1970 when provincial revenues covered 61.3% of the total cost of elementary and secondary education. As you can see from the graph, the provincial funding reached its lowest point—

The Vice-Chair: Could you just hold on for a second. We are just trying to find your brief.

Mr Martin: We are on page 3. The figure of 61.3% refers to the public and separate school funding. If we take that away and just look at public school funding, at public school boards of education, it is even more alarming, currently being funded at less than 30%. The Treasurer has not announced transfer payments to school boards and in today's Globe and Mail the Minister of Education was quoted as saying that figures would not be released until mid-February. It is impossible for boards, as a result, to speculate to what extent the municipalities will have to once again raise property taxes to pay for educational costs.

The bottom line is this: Per-pupil expenditure ceilings in both the elementary and secondary panels must be increased to better reflect the real costs of education.

On page 4 the submission refers specifically to the elementary situation. Particular attention must be paid to eliminating the inequities in funding between elementary and secondary panels, a position supported by the Ontario New Democratic Party policy paper going to its upcoming convention. I quote from the paper, A New Democratic Party Philosophy of Elementary and Secondary Education. It is on page 4.

"The early years of every child's education are particularly profoundly important and an educational system designed to meet the needs of New Democrats would give both recognition to and adequate funding for this reality. As just one element of providing funding to school boards for primary education, we would eliminate the inequitable differences that currently exist between per-pupil grants for elementary and secondary panels."

That is taken from this document. I do not know if you have it but if you have not, we can get it for you.

Mr Phillips: You should have that.

Mrs Sullivan: Some do, some don't.

Mr Martin: If you turn to page 7, the table provides the history of the gap since 1970. If you look at the information on the graph you can see very quickly that applying slightly higher percentage increases will not address the current problem.

In December a memorandum was sent to the director of education. In the memorandum the Ministry education advised that the 1990 grant ceilings would be increased by $50 for elementary pupils and $25 for the secondary pupils.

The memorandum stated—see page 8—“The purpose of this adjustment is to improve equity in the grants plan and reduce the gap in funding between elementary and secondary levels. The Ministry of Education is committed to high quality education with particular emphasis on the early school years.”

This approach to the grants plan is a welcome change in government policy and we would urge the minister to further address the equity issue when the general legislative grants for school boards are determined later this year.

When you look at the gap, back to the figures on page 6, currently existing at $930, that is the difference in funding for education allotted to a child at an elementary level and to the child at a secondary level. We believe the only way that gap will be reduced is by putting additional monies, significant dollars, at the elementary level in order to bring the funding closer together.

Class size reduction is also supported by the education policy document that will be presented to the NDP convention. It states this on class sizes:

“Smaller class sizes are particularly important in the early childhood years...Smaller class sizes obviously offer the advantage of providing more individual attention and adequate supervision. They also facilitate recognition of learning problems, and make it easier for children with mental or physical disabilities or those with behavioural problems to receive an equal education.”

Over the years, we do not believe that elementary funding has reflected the changes in elementary education. We have been at this table for a number of years and each time we were told that we had to go out and negotiate changes in our collective agreements. Well, the elementary teachers are now better qualified. The average years of experience has increased. The teacher-pupil ratio has been lowered and preparation time has been increased throughout the province of Ontario. But even with these increases, the grants have not reflected these changes. The gap continues to grow.

The additional funding would allow for smaller class sizes. It would enable elementary schools to staff resource libraries. In the late 1970s, we heard of Partners in Action as a resource for activity-based learning. Unfortunately we do not have the resources to put resource teachers in libraries in our schools in Ontario, yet it would allow for more important, specialized teachers in physical education, music, art and other technical studies. It would also provide funding for adequate textbooks and learning materials and would provide guidance personnel, a much-needed resource in our elementary schools.

If you look directly at the class sizes, on page 9, an emphasis on elementary education should be part of this government's attempt to address the needs of those most disadvantaged by the recession. In a brief presented last month to the House of Commons subcommittee on poverty, the Canadian Teachers' Federation stated:

“We were able to identify health, learning and behavioural related characteristics associated with child poverty, both from the researcher's perspective and from the experience of classroom teachers. A survey of projects in Canada and the US demonstrates, again, that early and sustained interventions with children will provide greater returns in human as well as economic terms.”

The recent comprehensive provincial review of children's services, Children First, also points clearly to the need for early identification of children's problems: “We now know a great deal more than we once did about the conditions that imperil healthy child development. We also know that problems that occur in childhood can impair adult life and that the beginnings of many lifelong problems lie in childhood.”

Early identification of children's learning and emotional problems is also important in terms of cost-effectiveness. It is a lot less expensive to remedy these problems during the early school years than to wait until the high school years.

The final area I will speak to is the support for child care services. Child care is an important economic and social support to working families. Child care becomes even more important during a recession when families are stressed and when a second income is even more crucial.

Pages 10 to 12 outline some of the key problems facing child care programs and the need for immediate and long-term measures to deal with them.

As a founding member of the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care, we support the coalition's new funding proposal and its call for additional child care subsidies and program spaces. The proposal for funding is briefly outlined on page 11 of our submission.

To conclude, OPSTF recognizes that the province is in the midst of a recession and that the Treasurer faces some difficult decisions. We would urge the government not to apply too narrowly its mandate to assist those individuals most vulnerable to the effects of an economic downturn. An elementary school system which is sufficiently staffed and supported to provide for early identification and early remedial attention is vital for responding to the needs of our most vulnerable children and for long-term investment of our human resources and future workforce.

Likewise, it would be shortsighted not to move to stabilize and expand existing child care services so as to provide an essential support to working families and quality care for young children.

We leave your committee with four recommendations which are found on page 13:

1. That the Ontario government's strategy for addressing the needs of those citizens most disadvantaged by the current recession include significantly increasing support for elementary education and child care services;
2. That the elementary and secondary per-pupil expenditure ceilings be increased so as to ensure an improvement in the provincial share of education costs;
3. That in fulfilling the government's commitment to improve the provincial share of education costs, the Treasurer provide sufficient funds to the Ministry of Education so as to reduce the differential in per-pupil grants between the elementary and secondary panel and maintain the current class size reduction in grades 1 and 2;

4. That the Treasurer provide funding to the Ministry of Community and Social Services to create an additional 10,000 child care subsidies and an additional 10,000 child care spaces in the province.

I will take any questions.

Mr Stockwell: Briefly, they are going to give you the same song and dance or dog-and-pony show they have given everybody: "we are in tough times through a recession" and so on and so forth. They are probably not going to tell you that in this party's Agenda for People, which you quoted in here, they admitted in August that we were in a recession. They knew full well we were in a recession, yet they still made these promises.

The question I have which will cut right to the heart of the issues is—which I find almost disgraceful—that they would make the comment that they are going to return funding to 60% levels, and you are talking about $7 billion or $8 billion, knowing full well they could not do it. Did you honestly believe that when they said it? Did you believe they were going to do it?

Mr Martin: I believe, in speaking with the Minister of Education, that there will be a move back towards 60%. That is something we have not heard by parties in the Ontario government for a long time. I do not believe that commitment will take place overnight. However, I would hope for and strongly encourage the release of moneys to education in the spring, that the downward trends that have continued since 1975 will be reversed and start moving at least in that direction.

Mr Stockwell: That is a good answer, but it was not an answer to my question. The question was, did you believe it when they said in the Agenda for People that they were going to return the funding levels to 60%? Did you believe in fact they could do that, that they are capable of that?

Mr Martin: I believe this government is capable of moving anywhere it wants if it sets its priorities, and I believe education is the priority that should be set.

Mr Stockwell: Okay, so really you thought that could be done.

Mr Martin: And I would hope that at the end of the five years I will be proved right.

Mr Stockwell: Fine and dandy. For your sake, I hope you are proved right as well. I do not think it will be, but I hope you are proved right.

The next question is, what about the makeup of the 60% and how you see that, the guidelines of exactly how much, where, and is it strictly—if I look at your figure 2, the underfunding, page 7, you talk about the gap from the 1970s. Is that where you see the increase being made up? Is it the gap that we are talking about?

Mr Martin: I believe the funding has to cover two areas. Obviously the number one area is the overall expenditure on education. The grant ceilings at both secondary and elementary levels are unrealistic. Boards of education are spending millions of dollars above those rates which have been set by the government. That is number one. E also, when we are doing that, we have to address the separation of this double standard that we have in our educational systems on how much we pay for an elementary child to be educated and how much we pay for a secondary child to be educated. Yes, there is going to have to be money to reduce the gap.

Mr Stockwell: So you see it as a two-front attack?

Mr Martin: But also as the gap is being reduced there would not expect that to be at the expense of the needs of our secondary colleagues and the secondary system.

Mr Stockwell: Right, so you are not robbing Peter to pay Paul. It is new money.

Mr Martin: It is new money, and as one goes up one will hopefully climb a little higher.

Mr Stockwell: Good luck.

Mr Phillips: I think the leadership of the Ontario Teachers' Federation very much agreed with the 60% and I am personally on the hook for it, because certainly, as I have said to most education groups, I think that if there was an issue that impacted me it was education.

Certainly the teachers in my area may like me personally, but they sure did not like the fact that we would fund 60% and they had a commitment from the NDP that it would fund the 60%. I think the teachers' leadership clearly believed it and in fact passed a resolution supporting the NDP and mustered a lot of financial resources behind it, as well as helping organizationally. If there was an issue that the leadership of the educational community got behind, it was the 60%. I think the NDP was very clear on it.

My question really is, were you as surprised as I was to find that the definition the minister has for the 60% includes teachers' pensions and capital, and that the minister is planning to cap the spending on education provincially to control the 60%? It was quite a shock to me yesterday to hear that, because that was totally contrary to what I thought the commitment was. I was wondering if your organization was as surprised to hear those three things. It includes capital, it includes your pensions and there will be a cap on the per-pupil spending determined by the province.

Mr Martin: I will start the answer off and my colleague to my right will conclude. When we say 60%, we are talking about operating expenses of the board. We are not referring to our superannuation and we are not referring to capital expenditures by the boards, so are we surprised that the minister mentioned that in her statement? I guess you could say yes, and we would have to disagree with her statement. If we go back to 1975, when the level was 60%, I believe—and I will turn to David—the "operating" was basically operating expenses.

Mr Phillips: No capital, no pension.

Mr Martin: No capital, no pension. So if we are going to move to 1991, we had better add on what percentage was with capital and superannuation in 1991 and make sure that we are playing with the same figure in 1991. David might want to add to that.

Mr Lennox: I can add two or three things to it. First all, back in 1975 there probably was very little capital money available because of the declining enrolment situation. So that will not be a major part of it, but pensions certainly were a major part and they were not included in the 60%.

This concept was perpetuated by a former Treasurer, when he conjured up this idea that the 60% is 60% of what? I think we have to go back and make sure that we have everything on a level playing field. The Minister of Education, through her bureaucrats to this committee, perpetuated what a former Treasurer had stated, and that was that we are going to put in the pension money, we are going to put in the capital money and we are going to get that for 60%.

Mr Phillips: She said she ran on that. That was her campaign platform, that included—

Mrs Sullivan: She said that was her understanding and she answered directly.

Mr Lennox: That may be, and I am not going to challenge that here. The aspect, as far as I am concerned, is that the 60% has become a very symbolic number. Somebody has to ask the honest question: 60% of what? Then you have to go back and ask a more honest question: How much does it cost to educate a child in the province of Ontario? I believe the Fair Tax Commission will not address this. I believe it has such a huge mandate that the education section will not get the profile it deserves and requires.

I believe that until we get the recommendation from the select committee which asks for a task force studying financing of education and asks the fundamental question, how much does it cost to educate an elementary child and secondary school child and a community college student and a university student, we can play at all sorts of games in this province, but we will never come home to answer that question. The 60% will be symbolic. We will play these games called "60% of what, and what's included in it?" And Mr Stockwell's "Good luck to you."

I think it is incumbent upon the government to set up a task force to study financing of education as immediately as it can, so that we do not get to the fourth year and it says, "Oh, now we are going to set up a task force." I am looking for within the next six months.

Mr Phillips: It is clear in your brief what your definition was. I was in many staff rooms having to debate the issue with other parties' members. So it is very, very clear in my mind, and I think there will be some very interesting debates in staff rooms over the next few months.

Mr Fletcher: I am just going back to what the Minister of Education said yesterday, and perhaps Mr Stockwell is not here when she was saying it. I am not sure if he is there now. I am certain that the 60% figure was there, and I know that during the campaign we did say over a five-year period and that is what you are looking for, over a five-year period. We do understand it is not an overnight thing, as you said in your brief.

Mr Martin: That is correct.

Mr Fletcher: What would you consider to be a first move towards the 60% over a five-year period?

Mr Martin: That is a good point. I think what I mentioned at the outset is that we continually see the line dipping. If this year we even saw it rise, we know we are heading in the right direction. I have heard figures of 10% to 15% in other briefs. I believe it would be a very positive reaction if the gap started to close at the elementary and secondary level, that the one-two funding that was promoted through the previous government was maintained and probably extended and that the overall expenditures, or the ordinary expenditures to a school board, in fact, showed less of a responsibility to the local taxpayer as what currently stands in this province.

Mr Fletcher: I tend to agree.

Mr Sutherland: I want to ask you a rather blunt question because it seems to be popping up among some of the property tax coalitions that exist within this province, and that is the question of teachers' salaries. I think in my board 75% of the cost of the education is teachers' salaries. We got from the Ministry of Education that on average it is 63% of the total cost of education. Many of these property tax coalitions are saying, "If you're going to look at cost, you have to look at where the largest area is," and they are looking at instructional salaries. And in some cases they have called for zero increases in all areas of public sector further increases, or no more than inflation. What do you say to those people when they suggest that the prime area of looking at controlling costs is teachers' salaries?

Mr Martin: I think the first thing I would talk in terms of is the qualifications that the teaching force currently has in the province of Ontario. Elementary and secondary teachers are probably the best trained here in Ontario over anywhere in Canada, the number of people now who have master's degrees in education, early childhood certification, special education certificates, computer knowledge etc. When I look at the number of years it takes for a teacher to become qualified—three years of university, usually an honours degree after that plus a year at the faculty of education—it is not something where you just leave high school and become a teacher. There is a lot of growth involved.

As far as I am concerned, when I look at the qualifications, when I look at the number of hours that teachers put into their profession and the job they are doing in Ontario, the actual costs of those salaries are quite within reason. When you compare it to other professions, I think it clearly shows that teachers are not overpaid in Ontario.

Mr Lennox: May I expand on that just for a second? I have talked to several taxpayers with that attitude and I commented to them quite frankly about two things. One is that they are frustrated because of the burden on the local property assessment, which is a regressive tax. They are frustrated on that because of the downloading of the provincial government to the local taxpayer. They are using anybody who comes out of the public purse—teachers are a good example—as a scapegoat for their frustration. While you talk about zero-based increase for teachers, I think we are taking the brunt of something we do not deserve.

The second aspect of it is, having been an elementary school teacher and an elementary school principal for a number of years, I found this philosophy between elementary teaching salaries and secondary teaching salaries to be very interesting. With the very high number of elementary teachers with their degrees and with their master's degrees, with the reduction of class size in the elementary schools, which has created the need for more teachers, that was denied for years and years in elementary education, right up until 1980 when To Herald a Child was produced.

I think between 1980 and 1990 we saw a great deal more influence and impact upon the elementary education reduction of class size and this has caused some of it as well. All of that, or the vast majority of that, has been translated on to the local taxpayers' back and it is time we stopped that so we can give them some relief.

Mrs Cunningham: Welcome. It is good to see you again. I thought you did a very good job of quoting the NDP policy, but it was not alone, you know. The policy statements with regard to class size and increased funding were probably part of the mandate of many elections over the years. In chatting with some people who have been involved almost as long as you have, they tell me about the meaningless use of the words 60%, because it is 60% of what?

I would encourage you to expand upon page 2 of your brief, given the announcement yesterday, and explain exactly what you mean by way of a footnote today, so that we can get it into the Hansard. You say the 60% target for the provincial share has become a symbolic one in the education community. Given that the minister was, I think, throwing a few other things in yesterday which many of us will not complain about—having the other things thrown in—as long as people clearly understand what the 60% is, I think quite frankly what we are looking for is for the province to pay 60% of the operating costs eventually, down the road, if it is at all possible. That is my understanding of your position. If it is, I would just like you to verify it, because that is not what we are hearing in the halls of this Legislative Building today.

Mr Martin: It is our position that the government would pay 60% of the operating costs.

Mrs Cunningham: Based, I assume, on the research that you people have done in the operating base funding for 1973.

Mr Lennox: The answer is yes. The second answer is, we would be quite prepared to provide some supplementary information on that and develop some questions that would raise the interest level in the Legislature once it resumes.

Mrs Cunningham: I am assuming you are aware of the trustees' position earlier today when they asked for a concurrent committee to take a look at education financing. I am also assuming that in your presentation this afternoon that is what you want as well. Given that the Fair Tax Commission is looking at expenditures, I think, across the government and the subcommittee will be looking at other ministries—at the subcommittee, my understanding is that education will be part of it and that we will be looking at other ministries—you are asking for some concurrent discussions with regard to funding education, to build on, suppose, what we heard in 1985 with the Macdonald commission, and probably take in some new demands that all know about. Could you clearly tell me what your view of that model is?

Mr Martin: I believe the model that we would find most favourable to is recommendation 3 from the select committee on education, which dealt with all partners in education getting together and finding out exactly what that true cost is. I do not have the exact wording, but it is on record in Hansard already a number of times to that recommendation that was put forth by the select committee and put it into action.

Mrs Sullivan: In her responses to questions yesterday the minister made it very clear that she would be looking not only at including capital and at including teachers' pensions, but also including the cap, as she was defining what 60% of the funding of education meant. You have indicated that you believe the 60% refers to operating costs. Your figures in your presentation speak about spending $789.99 per pupil over the grant ceiling. I gather that that is for the public boards. The Ministry of Education figures show a spending of $1,106 for all boards.

Do you see in the 60% operating funding a position where there ought to be a cap, or should all of the funding be subject to the 60%, the operating expenses?

Mr Martin: If I can talk first of all in terms of where our figure came from and where the $1,000 came from. I did the grade 5 math question, where we added up overexpenditures of every board across the province, divided by 70 or 150, whatever the case was, and that is how we got our $700. If you prorated them or weighted them, as they have in the ministry, we would concur with the minister that it would be approximately $1,000-per-pupil. So we are in agreement with that.

The second part of your question dealt with, how far is this 60% and where does it cap? I believe the cap is determined when we investigate exactly what we should be paying for in education. There are frills to education.

Mrs Sullivan: But your position now is that 60% of operating expenses, whether approved or unapproved, ought to be covered by the province. Is that your position now?

Mr Martin: Approved costs, operating costs.

Mrs Sullivan: Operating costs and approved costs are not the same thing.

Mr Lennox: You are correct.

Mrs Sullivan: You said "operating."

Mr Lennox: Yes. The operating costs—the first thing that you have to do is start looking at more real ceilings, and then you cannot analyse that until you look at what the cost of education is. We know that whatever we have, there will always be boards determined to spend above that amount of money. If you have 60% of operating costs on a more realistic ceiling, that is a good place to start, but the total costs, you will never end up giving all 200 and some boards in the province of Ontario giving every cent paid on average of 60%, because of the necessity for special programs in any given area.

So I think the problem, when we hold this discussion on the 60% situation, is that we have to go back to the basics, that the ceilings were unrealistic. So we cannot even identify 60% of approved or operating. We have to turn and say, what are the operating costs of a board? Then we turn and say, okay, what is 60% of that? And we say that is realistic; now what is that on average?

Then what are the programs we want to operate in Ontario? If we want heritage languages, let's put those in the operating costs. If we want this for special education, fine. If we want this for guidance, fine. That is why I said the 60% is symbolic right now, because we have all sorts of the puzzle out there that we have to sit down and analyse and people have been avoiding it now for a decade, focused on several other important things in financing education along the way, the Bill 30 funding and the pooling and so forth, but have not gone back to ask some very fundamental questions on financing education.

I know I have slightly evaded your question. It is because I do not have a good answer, because until we start addressing the realistic ceilings there is not a good answer.

Mrs Sullivan: But what I do hear you saying is 60% total operating, because the boards will determine the needs of the individual communities.

Mr Lennox: They will, but there will be boards that, no matter what you set that at, will increase their level of costs and the government must be accountable at some decision on the cap. You cannot have open-ended funding, I guess is the answer. You are going to have to have some level of grant ceiling out there. That is an understandable amount on average to educate a pupil in the province of Ontario.

Mr Phillips: I think it is very clear in the breakdown. The ministry figures are 41%—that is what you said in your document—and commitments to go to 60%.

Mr Lennox: That is right.

Mr Martin: That is correct.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for your brief this afternoon. Good luck in your deliberations. We cannot wait until February.

ONTARIO SECONDARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation; Mr French, if you would introduce your companion to the committee.

Mr French: I am Larry French, legislative researcher. With me is Neil Walker, my esteemed colleague, executive assistant for communications. We are the B team. The A team is back at the ranch. It has an important pre-assembly meeting and the president sent his best regards and is sorry he cannot be here to deliver this brief himself.

We will try to keep it brisk. It has been a long day for you guys. I sympathize with what you are going through. I would just like to mention that we do represent 42,000 teachers and workers in education, professional and non-professional employees. We will do it a little differently. Neil will read the recommendations of the appropriate sections first from the compendium and then I will speak briefly to each of the recommendations.

Mr Walker: Thank you, Larry. Take a look please on page 4. There is a compendium of recommendations 1 through 3:

"1. That the Treasurer reiterate in his budget statement the commitment of his government to raise the provincial share of education costs to 60% over five years and to outline the concrete steps he intends to take to implement this commitment.

"2. That the provincial share not be restricted to 'approved' costs, that it exclude payments for capital and the teachers' superannuation fund, that it be so defined publicly and that it not be changed unilaterally.

"3. That the transfer payments to school boards be increased by a minimum of 11% for 1991."

1630

Mr French: Everything flows a little bit from the previous discussion, as you can realize. We, as educators, like the NDP's Agenda for People, especially the 60% funding. We have talked that over with Mr Phillips.

We mention in appendix A the OTF news release at the time of the leaders' debate, endorsing Bob Rae's position and asking the leaders of the other parties to join up. We call on the Treasurer to do the same, to define the 60% accurately, the way we have just outlined, and to outline the steps he plans on taking towards meeting that commitment.

We think there is a series of steps that the government has got to take to move towards meeting that commitment, even though it does not happen overnight. There has been a lot of support in the community for it. The Macdonald commission has recommended it. I think there is a consensus in the New Democratic Party that it is out of kilter. At one point it recommended 80% funding from the province, 20% local. Certainly from the public school community and the separate school community, we think the 60% barometer, no matter how we define it, is about right. There is community support for it.

We have mentioned the Environics poll during the election campaign or just after, that 75% of those surveyed supported a move to an increased share by the province. It is a problem that is coming to the attention of the taxpayer locally.

On graph figure 1 on page 7 we show you the impact of the withdrawal of the provincial share. Public local education used to get 13% of the budget share; now it gets about 5.3%. That is a dramatic decrease in funding priority. If you look on page 8 you will see the dramatic decline that my colleagues from OPSTF referred to. This one is public secondary education. It goes from the high-water mark of 59% down to 26% this year. That is the lowest since 1944. In 1944 the province funded at 13% because of difficulties we can all relate to. We have added for your delectation our election time underfunding kit, the media kit we gave out.

Mr Phillips: It looks familiar.

Mr French: It got a lot of attention, as you can well imagine, during the election campaign. One of the things we do point out there is that in comparison with competing jurisdictions like the United States neighbouring states and the other provinces of Canada, our expenditure per pupil, even though it does seem high, is not totally competitive. Other provinces are doing better than us.

We also point out that the effort in Ontario—and I think this is a key part of the whole discussion—is the lowest in the country. The per capita effort directed to local education is the lowest in the country, except for British Columbia. There is a little bit of room to muscle in and to beef up the commitment to education, we feel.

As a starting point, we endorse OPSBA's position that the transfer payments issued should go up by 11%, and if the mill rates across the province were 11% last year, we estimate that would immediately keep them at 5% this year.

There are a lot of tax revolts brewing out there. You folks with local connections know that, in the Hamilton area, London area, eastern Ontario. I think your brothers and sisters in local government need a little help. They would certainly appreciate it in this election year, if you could help them.

Mr Walker: Recommendation 4: "That Bills 64 and 65 be amended to mandate the delivery of adequate compensation to public boards for any revenue losses incurred through the imposition of the pooling of commercial and industrial assessment, and that the finance branch of the Ministry of Education be directed to develop and publish a method of calculation of such losses based on the actual revenue transfers from public to separate boards and the concomitant funding shortfall suffered by the former."

Mr French: We are talking of sort of a spillover of separate school funding. During the debate on Bill 64, which some people will remember, the NDP, supported by the Conservatives, wanted an amendment to the bill that would guarantee the compensation to public boards. The government was not keen on that approach. I guess they felt it would tie their hands a little bit too much.

We calculate that it is a significant revenue loss to public boards this year. The estimate that was made in the Ontario Public Education Network study was a $12-million loss. That rises in escalating steps to $116 million annual loss to public boards by the sixth year of implementation. This is too much to ignore, and this is taking into account already the government compensation package.

The new OPEN study will be announced very soon. After one year's experience we are keen to see it. We are sure it will verify the truth of what we outline right here. If there is not enough compensation offered to public boards, local public taxpayers through their local mill rate will be supporting or subsidizing separate education. We do not think this was the intent of Bill 30.

Mr Walker: I am going to quote recommendation and 6 on page 4: "That special funding assistance be offered public boards struggling with the aftermath of separate school extension to permit them to offer a via program to those students and parents committed to non-denominational education" and "That an English first-language grant modelled on the French first-language grant be offered to boards having a minority English-language section."

Mr French: The single-school communities where separate school funding has been implemented are having a rough time in some areas of the province, areas that I have brought to your attention. We have talked to the minister about Rayside-Balfour having a very difficult time because of a competing separate school that is drawing away its enrolment base. It basically needs help, a separate French-language school that served the community for a long time. It needs more help than the Sudbury board can give it. It needs provincial help. Essex county is erupting. Right now there are stormy meetings down at the board. There is an imminent transfer of a couple of schools from single-school communities that Bill 30 was supposed to protect.

These parents in the public school community, as you can imagine, are in a very difficult situation. We feel that the responsibility for Bill 30 and solving the problems created by Bill 30 is not the public board's problem. It is mainly the problem of the provincial Legislature. All three parties support Bill 30, and we feel it is up to the province to fund it adequately to make sure that the single-school communities are not threatened.

Prescott-Russell is a very special case. It lost all its French-language high schools during an en bloc transfer and was left with a burden of debt that is significant and a capital commitment that has never been delivered upon. We call on the government to recognize those difficulties. It is also almost unique in that it is English-minority language. It has a very small base from English-speaking pupils, and we recognized that in the French first-language grant. We feel this board needs an English first-language grant to help keep it viable.

Mr Walker: Recommendation 7: "That the design of the per pupil ordinary expenditure ceiling elementary and secondary be rigorously linked to the program costs of each panel, that they be raised to realistic levels to reflect these respective costs, and that the grant to adult continuing education be raised to reflect real program costs."

Mr French: This is a very delicate area of the budget. Where are my colleagues? I guess they have decided not to be bored with it. The ministry memo B-11 did focus attention wonderfully, let me tell you. It is the one OPS referred to, a top-up of grants, $50 elementary, $50 secondary, to close the gap. We have done a lot of listening on the close-the-gap argument. We have been told by a lot of people that it makes sense to fund elementary students at the same level as secondary students, that one student is worth as much as another. Quite a few MPPs have told that.

We felt that we should take a look at that assumption cause it does not deserve to go unexamined. We agree every child is worth another, every student is worth another, but some cost more to educate than others. We draw the analogy of the family with children to nourish and to love. It costs more to provide the necessities of life to a teenager—all parents would agree, I think—rather than to a child who is of elementary age. In the same way, without arguing in any way, it costs more to educate a secondary pupil than it does an elementary. This is what we call the stubborn and irrefragable reality of educational funding.

Mr Stockwell: Irrefragable?

Mr French: Irrefragable, right. We took that from the Vietnam war. The levels at which the per-pupil expenditures are designed recognize this. There is a reason why the secondary ceiling is higher than the elementary; it costs more to educate these pupils.

40

As to the local mill rate and the local share, we referred to the tyranny of the local mill rate. None of these boards spend unless they absolutely have to spend, especially if you are over the ceiling level. Former trustees will recognize this, because it is total local dollars, no grant ingredient whatsoever.

On page 15, we have tracked for you the growth in over-the-ceiling expenditure, and it is nearly twice as high as the secondary level. As the grant rises, the over-the-ceiling expenditure at the secondary level rises almost twice as quickly as at the elementary level. If you look at the graph on page 15, you will see that the secondary over-the-ceiling overshadows significantly the elementary over-the-ceiling. That has been a constant pattern. Board expenditure patterns bear that out. They spend what they are forced to spend, and the secondary panel, separate and public both, spend more than elementary.

We do not say that we should keep the elementary grant down and the secondary up. We would like both ceilings to go to realistic levels that are program oriented. We look at the program, we decide how much it is going to cost to educate everybody and we design a realistic ceiling at that respect.

At the same time, we think we should look at adult education. A large part of our population and a large part of our immigrant population are adults. Their grant is only about half what it costs to educate them. It should be realistic, as the government was told a few years ago.

Mr Walker: Recommendation 8: "That a major increase in the allocation to school capital projects be made both new and repairs and renovations accounts to begin close the capital needs deficit."

Mr French: We will just steer you very quickly through the deficit. In 1989, the deficit between allocation and requests was $941 million, about $1 billion; this is public and separate. In 1990, it has risen to about $1.5 billion, and unless the government addresses this very quickly, there will be no solution.

Now the good part of the brief.

Mr Walker: Recommendation 9: "That the Treasurer implement as quickly as is feasible the progressive taxation policies included in the Agenda for People."

Mr French: We have referred to the fact that the Ontario effort to education is not as great as that of most other provinces. We support the Agenda for People approach to progressive taxation. We think that is the way to go.

There is a misprint on page 18 in our policy. The last word of our policy about federal and provincial taxation policies should be the word "taxation," not the word "income"—"an equitable distribution of taxation." A significant difference there. If you could change that, that would be great.

We suggest that these taxes would be supported by the public. I think the NDP garnered support for them during the election campaign. We suggest that the government consider a new tax, a leaving the province tax, that is sort of like a death tax only it is triggered by exodus, so that those companies that have profited from the infrastructure in Ontario return something to Ontario when they leave. It seems that a lot of them are leaving at the moment.

Mr Walker: The final two recommendations: "10. That the Treasurer and the Minister of Education investigate the creation of unified school boards which will ensure continued provision of educational services including those offered on an open-access non-denominational basis by public school boards, and those required by the Constitution of Canada for francophone and Roman Catholic citizens of Ontario."

"11. That the Treasurer offer incentive grants to any boards willing to achieve economies through an integrated or co-operative approach to the delivery of educational services and program."

Mr French: We feel that it is time to consider, in the light of the pressure on all our fiscal resources in the province, that the unified school board would reduce wasteful duplication, as we see it. We mention some of the things that occur. One of the things that is difficult to justify, but it is a fact of life, is the assessment bounty hunting. Both systems now are defending their taxation base with very aggressive taxation search-recruitment programs and assessment defensive mechanisms. It does not make sense. That does not contribute much to what happens in the classroom.

We must say that several public boards have extended a hand to their coterminous boards, but it has not been really picked up. I do not think there is enough encouragement given by the province for them to do so. We suggest to the Treasurer that he facilitate this by making it worth everybody's while. In the short term, it might cost a little investment but in the long term, there would be a lot of payoff.

Transportation: for example, if you structured the grant so that each coterminous board offers an independent transportation system, it might be funded—it is funded fairly rigidly—70%. However, if 75% of their pupils are on a shared system, you could bump that share up to 80% and take some of the local burden off, but the total package, we are convinced, would cost much less. Harry Bowes knows what is happening in York county. The Auditor General pointed out that there is about $1 million in overexpenditure in the separate board transportation budget. There are ways of making enormous savings through this approach.

Finally, we too have a task force on the funding of education and delivery of services and the president has set it up. We refer to it at the bottom of page 20 and we will be ready to collaborate with the government whenever it is ready to receive input from groups like ours. We are eager to participate.

We mentioned that we are taking a very good look at Children First's recommendations. At this point we support co-ordination of services but not the creation of a new superministry, which we think would be costly.

We urge the committee to see educational expenditure as a needed investment in Ontario's future. Thanks again for your attention.

Mr Sutherland: My question is on recommendation 3. When OPSBA was in here earlier today, it recommended the same amount, a minimum of 11%. When they were here, I asked them what type of impact they felt that would have on property taxes. I did not really get an answer from them that they could give a definite amount. I would like to know, since you have the same figure, how did you come to the 11% figure and what impact do you figure it would have on property taxes in the upcoming year?

Mr French: This would change the chemistry of the transfer and of the local and the provincial share. In the last couple of years, the mill rates across the province—and this is fairly rough—rose by about 11%. If their spending patterns stay the same, in other words, no big, new ingredients that we cannot anticipate, but they were going to do roughly what they were going to do before and the 11% on the basic transfer grant was there, probably they would only need about a 5% to 6% increase. It would make a major—

Mr Sutherland: So basically an inflationary at the property tax level?

Mr French: It would be inflation plus 11%, a significant help to these local boards. Oh, I see, an inflationary rate for the mill rate.

Mr Sutherland: For the property tax owner.

Mr French: Right. Absolutely.

Mr Sutherland: I would be interested in having you answer some time the other question I asked the public school board, but maybe I will ask you that separately and let someone else in.

Mr Cousens: I want to congratulate the federation on an excellent presentation. I think that you have, as usual, put together an excellent document and I will be going back and looking at it further. I sincerely hope that your time is not wasted. It was not wasted in August when you were making presentations to the different politicians. Everybody was listening to you then.

I just want to know whether or not you had any commitments from the present government, which did not think it was going to be the government then, on what would do on some of the recommendations when we were all talking about them in such a friendly way back several months ago. Do you have any evidence that they would have been supportive and co-operative? What feelings do you have or proof that we could use in the House of Commons committee just to remind them of commitments that were made?

Mr French: Election campaigns are very enormous sensitive times and everybody is listening a little harder than they do normally. That is absolutely true.

Mr Cousens: I can tell you, we are always listening.

Mr French: Good.

Mr Stockwell: And they are always promising.

Mr French: Right on. We were very supportive of the NDP commitment to the 60% funding. I am sure it was sincere. We accepted that it was sincere and that a vote would be found to make it happen and we did not anticipate that the New Democratic Party would form the government. We were in the same position as everybody else. However, we welcomed that commitment and we are sure the government is going to take it very seriously.

Mr Cousens: Did they make any other commitments on your recommendations prior to election?

Mr French: No, actually we had been discussing a lot of curriculum-related matters with the New Democratic Party. Basically, we were happy with its commitment to the 60% funding and that was the major area of our discussion prior to the election, the streaming, destreaming.

Mr Phillips: I am interested very much in the 60%. As you know, Neil, in Scarborough that was a big issue with all of my friends, who really hammered our point pretty heavily on it.

Mr Cousens: So they should have.

Mr Phillips: He drops in for about 10 minutes, yes, and then leaves.

In the press release that the Ontario Teachers' Federation put out I think it was quite clear, because you mentioned the 41% funding, which is the ministry figure operating, and the NDP commitment of 60% funding. The minister yesterday said that she campaigned on the basis of the 60% including pensions and capital. That was the time, because I have debated the detail of that often with OSSTF. The leadership was very much involved in this. Was it the understanding of the president and leadership of OSSTF that was what she was campaigning on, or did you have some assurances that 60% did include the pensions and the capital?

Mr French: I think the Agenda for People mentioned the 60% without going into the specifics. However, the understanding was that everybody understood that it was the 60% that had been defined in 1975, the high-water mark, and that the benchmark had moved down to 41% and that it was going to move back up to 60%. If we define it the way the minister seems to be defining it now, and we have already communicated with her that we disagree with this definition, then rather than the 41% are right now, it is a 57% share. There is about a 17% or % difference in those figures.

Mr Phillips: Never flew when we tried it.

Mr French: Therefore, in terms of 1970, what Dave Innox was talking about, probably it would have meant at the high-water mark was about 67%, 68% in those years. So we would have to redefine everything in order to track it and to maintain consistency in the tracking. That is why we asked the Treasurer: "Define it, please, and stick to the definition. Then we do not have to worry about what the definition is. We do not have to debate that one. It's debate the amount."

Mr Phillips: Were he to do so, he would impose a much-needed measure of integrity on our discussion. I think that is an important line.

Mr Fletcher: I just want to say that I liked your presentation. I think your brief was very good and I agree with many of your recommendations, especially the one when it comes to co-operation between the school boards, with different systems, the separate and the public system. I think it is about time that began. I know it is something I believe in and I know there are many others in our caucus who believe in that also, so maybe we will start moving in that direction.

It is funny hearing OSSTF defend some of the practices of the school board, especially when you have negotiated with school boards. But some of the spending habits of the school boards, as you say, they are trying to defend their tax base and they are vigorously promoting their boards' advertising and spending on big budget items such as community relations and things like that. If some of these areas were eliminated from the school boards' budgets and they stopped what I call wasteful spending—because I was a trustee and I did vote against budgets that I thought were excessive—that in itself would go a long way towards lessening the impact on the local taxpayer. Perhaps if it started at that level also, then we as a government could probably move in a little more. I think it has to work in both areas. I think local boards also have to be accountable. Do you think local school boards should be made accountable by the Ministry of Education?

Mr French: Yes, the select committee looked at that very strenuously for a year. I think they are relatively accountable right now. The province is the senior level of government and the province can really dictate the terms under which a school board will operate and I think the accountability from the point of view of the province is in how much it gives, and the programs it dictates too, I must admit. But the real tyranny, as we refer to it, is the accountability to the local taxpayer that the board must meet. I do not think any board is irresponsible in this respect. It does what it has to do and tries to be as efficient as it possibly can. I am sure of that.

Mr Fletcher: Thank you for your political answer.

Mr Cousens: A number of your statements were political too.

Mr Fletcher: Yes, but I am paid for it.

Mr Stockwell: Actually, I think more than yourselves are confused with the Minister of Education's comments on interpretation of the 60%. If that was her interpretation, she did not tell her leader, because the Premier certainly did not interpret it that way during the election. I know full well, according to the information Mr Phillips has given, it is the same position that was put forward by the NDP candidate in my riding and the ridings around. The only one who appears to be confused is the Minister of Education, and that is really important because she is the Minister of Education.

The other point that I wanted to address is the 11% to 5%. It is true that if you get 11%, your school portion of your local tax bill is going to be—potentially you are looking at a 5% increase in the mill rate. But again, it does not reflect directly that your taxes are only going to go up 5%. You have to include the region and the local councils and so on and so forth. I want to leave the message very clearly that simply 11% does not guarantee a 5% hike, everything else being considered.

Mr Sutherland: Should be the education portion.

Mr Stockwell: Just the education portion.

Mr French: That is what they are referring to.

Mr Stockwell: There are a lot of sections; in Metro it adds up to about half your tax bill.

Mr French: I am sorry, the education portion.

Mrs Cunningham: I will just underline for you to maybe revisit your definition of the provincial share and your concerns about it, as with the former government, and how closely your concerns match what was stated yesterday. I am just drawing that to your attention.

The question I would like to ask you now is a process question. You have I think some interesting solutions and ideas for the government to consider as it takes a look at a tremendous responsibility in the funding of education. To be specific, you talk about progressive taxation policies, which I may or may not disagree with; I have not given it a lot of thought. It is the first time I have seen anything like that in a brief of this type, but that is interesting.

The unified school board: I certainly have had some experience with school boards and have always recommended the sharing of services and cutting down costs to taxpayers. So I think you have some interesting advice.

How do you best see your advice being dealt with in a public forum? I would like you to respond to how you see the Fair Tax Commission working, and the subcommittee, and respond to the recommendations that we have had, both from the public school teachers, elementary, and from the school boards earlier today.

Mr French: Actually, we were very encouraged by the response we got on Bill 12, where amendments that you brought forward were accepted by the government. We thought it was very helpful, a good signal. We are ready to participate in that public process.

I mentioned that we do have a task force at our office which is looking at these things. Our educational finance committee is looking at them. We have one of the best persons in the province, John McEwen, working with us. We are going to define what we think a board should be spending and we are going to attempt to get a definition of what the 60% means in real terms for the province and then what is the local burden, no matter what it might be, and if Toronto decides to do a little better, great. That is beyond the 60% commitment.

We are drafting that material right now. We will be ready to plug it right into the Fair Tax Commission, plus the ministry's interministerial review of educational finance. We consider ourselves to be one of the stakeholders in the process and we will mention to the minister that we think we can help in this area.

We are meeting with the minister later in February and we will outline these procedures. We are getting government help to come to speak to us as we define what we are trying to do, our task force on education finance. Yesterday, Colin Maloney spoke to us about Children First. It helped a great deal in focusing where we fit in the services to children and we will be continuing in that sort of global, holistic look at the delivery of education and other services to the children and the youth of our province.

Mrs Cunningham: To be specific, the other two groups have asked for concurrent discussions around a funding model for education, both elementary and secondary, in Ontario, to begin immediately, given that their observation and concern was that the subcommittee to the Fair Tax Commission would not only include education funding but funding for other ministries' programs as well. It felt that it was too much work, it would take too long, and they were asking for concurrent discussions in another arena for education financing. It is not new. No one has come to grips with it.

You refer to the Macdonald commission. I would not want to tell you how many others I have been involved in over the years. So do you concur with their recommendation and would you be part of those discussions?

Mr French: I think we would. I would have to get clearance from the A-team.

Mrs Cunningham: You are in a worse position than I, and I am elected. I could say on behalf of my colleague Mr Cousens and I right now that we would approve of that.

Mr French: We would be very glad to participate. We are offering our services, you might say. We think there should be a secondary representative on the new, reconstituted Premier's Council on the Economy and Quality of Life. That would be helpful since so much of what we are doing is involved with training. We are eager to participate in that process.

Mrs Cunningham: Do not take my last comment seriously. I think you have made a considerable contribution to good policy decisions in Ontario over the years and we thank you for it very much. Again, we see a very positive brief today.

The Chair: Thank you for coming.

YORK REGION BOARD OF EDUCATION

The Chair: Our next presentation is the York Region Board of Education.

Mr Bowes: We did not want to impress you with numbers but we hope to impress you with quality. I am Harry Bowes, chair of the York Region Board of Education, trustee for Whitchurch-Stouffville, which is a suburb of Claremont; Joanna French, vice-chair of the board; Wakeling, chairman of the government relations committee, and we have with us our resident expert who will bring the chair up when we have finished the presentation. Bob Cressman, our director of education.

I would like to say at the outset that this brief has the support of the Growth Boards Coalition. Unfortunately, I delivered these briefs to Mr Decker on Thursday afternoon—have they got the briefs?—and we had a meeting of the Growth Boards Coalition on Thursday night. They unanimously supported this and asked me to let you know that. Otherwise, the brief would have been like this with the names of the boards on it.

The Growth Boards Coalition, of course, consists of eight large boards in the greater Toronto area: the York Region Board of Education, the Dufferin-Peel Roman Catholic Separate School Board, the Halton public and Catholic separate school boards, the Durham public and Catholic separate school boards and the York Region public and Catholic school boards.

These boards represent about 400,000 students, 90% of which are in temporary accommodation. I think we are probably one of the few groups that are presenting to you in this session representing so many public and Catholic students together.

We also have the support of some of our local councils which have passed motions supporting us—the City of Vaughan, Whitchurch-Stouffville; you may have seen some of the local papers that have publicized that quite a bit—supporting us and OPSBA on the 60% solution. And we have letters here. You remember last Thursday the Increasing Taxes group was here and we have letters from that HIT group supporting us as well.

The Minister of Education, the Honourable Marc Lalonde, has told us that she wants solutions, not complaints. In my closing statements, we will have four recommendations that you have in the presentation, plus two personal solutions of my own that I will present.

It is a great pleasure to be here and represent the fastest-growing school board in Ontario and probably in the nation. Our board has more than a passing interest in the support given by the government of Ontario to the education of our greatest resource, our young people. Our interest in the government's progress to establish its annual budget is heightened by the fact that previous budgets in which support for education waned, and in the instance of the York Region Board of Education, the support has almost disappeared. We are down now to less than 14% provincial support.

It is our intention to leave you today with only two recommendations—plus, as I said, two of my own which will include later—albeit four of great significance. In support to our proposals, we wish to identify first for you number of salient facts that have given cause to the circumstances in which we today find ourselves as a corporate entity attempting to provide excellence and educational opportunity and outcome for 63,000 students in 111 schools in the region of York.

Despite the numbers in this presentation being our own, the York region board's, the principles in this presentation are fully supported by the growth boards. I move it over now to Sue Wakeling.

Ms Wakeling: A glance at the provincial scene readily identifies some interesting and discouraging facts about the manner in which the succession of provincial budgets has receded from the strong support experienced by Ontario's school systems in the 1960s and the 1970s.

In 1975 Ontario allocated a little over 15% of the province's budget to support elementary and secondary education in the public and separate school systems, but by 1988 this allocation had decreased to just over 10%. That is almost one third. That was in spite of the announcements that there were going to be additional stresses to us because of the extended funding to Catholic schools. Educators and trustees have been alarmed and discouraged by the continuing decline of provincial dollars that come our way. We cannot keep doing all this with the money going down. The piece of the pie is getting smaller.

The decline in the education share of provincial resources has translated into a horrendous shift of fiscal responsibility at the board level. In 1975 the Minister of Education, through the general legislative grants, provided support to elementary and secondary education at 61%. In 1990 that rate has declined to 40.8%, and we all know who is paid for the extra costs: us, the tenants and the property owners. We paid that.

A major instrument utilized in the general legislative grants to lower the Ministry of Education's support to boards was the adoption of unrealistic grant ceilings on a family basis. No school system in Ontario can begin to provide equal education opportunities and outcome for the students outlined in the general legislative grants. They are just not realistic. Expenditures above the grant ceilings are commonly $1,000 per student.

10 When you examine the capital asset needs of Ontario's school systems, the picture is equally disturbing. Growth boards are struggling to build new pupil places and portables continue to mount. In York region we have over 1,000 portables. That is the equivalent of 50 temporary schools to accommodate the influx of students to the boards.

The need for renovation and alterations to our older facilities to upgrade the roofing and the heating and the plumbing systems, as well as to meet the fire marshal's requirements and program improvements, does not stop and it is not addressed in those costs. We have one school now that will cost us more to renovate and to fix than it would to build from the ground up because it is in such poor shape. That is one school I know of because it is in poor shape. There are other schools that are equally in the same shape.

A number of years ago, school boards led by York Region Board of Education proposed lot levies for growth projects. The Legislative Assembly, after much consultation, agreed and Bill 20 was approved. We still wait. We have not heard what has happened since the new government has taken over with lot levies and that would help us.

Finally, on the provincial scene, it is less than reassuring to be informed by Statistics Canada that Ontario ranked second to last among the 10 provinces with respect to total spending on elementary and secondary education as a percentage of personal income, and the lack of reassurance turns to bewilderment when one considers that we rank first among Canadian provinces in terms of financial ability to support education. We just need to go back for a bigger piece of a pie.

Mrs French: I imagine you are weary after a long day of listening to people asking you for money and coming up with solutions. We can sympathize. We were at a board meeting last night until 1 o'clock and we all feel a little world-weary ourselves. We will try and be succinct about what we ask. We will try and give you a snapshot of our particular situations of growth boards. The stresses that all school boards experience are exasperated by our growth.

First, we will address grant rates, which is always very exciting. In 1975 our elementary grant rates of ordinary expenditures were 51%. By 1990 they had dropped to 22.5%. In secondary they dropped from 57% to 5%. Capital expenditures showed much the same trend. In 1975 we had 68.2% of our capital expenditures supported. Now it is 28.2% at elementary and at secondary it went from 72% to 28%. In 15 years we have seen a considerable diminishment of support.

In that same 15 years our board has grown exponentially in population. I do not know whether you have included in your presentations the graphs that we had. Perhaps you want to have a quick look at the graph. It is the straight line that goes up in five years from 48,000 to 63,000 new pupil places. That really sums up a lot of our problems.

The grant rates applicable to the recognized ordinary ceilings raise minimal dollars in comparison to the total operating costs when actual expenditures are tallied. Currently the York Region Board of Education expenditure per elementary pupil is $1,059 over ceiling, and per secondary student it is $1,647 in excess. The excess is paid entirely from local tax base.

We showed these graphs to the Growth Boards Coalition. The one that particularly struck a chord was the one called "Revenue Sources" which shows that the level of government support has remained almost exactly the same for five years. In fact it declined somewhat from the 1988 level. However, the cost to the taxpayer and the growth of our budget have been steadily rising. In 1985, 24% of our budget was offset by government grants. That has dropped to 14% and the local taxpayer is now asked to pay nearly 80% of our day-to-day operating costs and capital grants.

We receive almost no grants for secondary schools, as you can see by the 5.9% and for current construction of $100 million worth of new schools. We are building four secondary and eight elementary schools at this time. We are very fortunate, I should say, to be building those. What people do not realize is that despite the fact that we have money granted to us, the majority of the cost is paid by the local taxpayer, approximately 75%. So if you build a high school for $17 million or $18 million, a good percentage of that, about $12 million, comes out of the local taxpayer. You can imagine when you have 12 schools, what an impact that has on your tax situation.

The five-year forecast for new schools for our board totals $185 million with a further $29 million needed for renovations and alternations as referenced. At the current grant rates we have no option but to mortgage the futures of our young residents, thereby increasing the total costs several fold due to interest charges. This was a sore point with the growth coalition. The interest costs are carefully scrutinized by our board because interest paid means less money for classroom benefits. The ministry currently pays us 28% on new projects in instalments spread over three years. In some ways that was an advantage because we knew for three years where we were going to get our allotments. However, it has meant bridge financing for most school boards. As a result we pay approximately $3 million in bridge financing costs. That is 1% on our mill rate. In these days 1% means a lot.

The board is forced to assume costs from provincial and federal mandates. I am sure you have had this hammered home to you with rather monotonous regularity in the last couple of days. These programs are charged to the school system operations, are legislated or regulated upon us, sometimes with some financing but generally with no support.

What is also interesting is that there has been a difference in the way the grants are structured in such a way that this first covering page illustrates to you the decline, not only of the grants, but the fact that the actual general grant has gone from $1,064, and then there is a part of the grant that is for special use only and there is no option but to use it for the various mandates, such as English as a second language, textbooks, class sizes, etc. That gives us even less room in which to manoeuvre through the pitfalls of our financing.

I am going to give you a rather depressing list of some of the things that we have to improve in our budget. When you explain this to the taxpayers, they are not really terribly impressed with our rationale. They say we are passing the buck. English as a second language is certainly an element for us. We are receiving a large number of immigrants. There is $2.75 million we have to allot to deal with that and it is growing daily. Even in this time of recession, we have a large number of immigrants coming into the southern part, particularly, of York region.

The day care operations cost us $250,000 and health tax $2.6 million. Pay equity: We were one of the leaders in school boards in pay equity, and as a result I think we have very good labour relations with our various bargaining units. However, it does cost us $3.2 million a year to continue that. Health and safety and asbestos: In fact, last night our board approved a new health and safety officer. Asbestos has been an issue of great interest and alarm in York region. We have a lot of schools that are old. We spent $1.5 million just removing asbestos in the last year. The expectation is that as time goes on and the schools have to be repaired or renovated that cost will continue to rise.

GST is, we think, about $3.2 million, although I have expectations that it may be slightly higher than that. I always find it myself a bit of a shock when I get the total. As you perhaps know, junior kindergarten is something we have as yet implemented. Perhaps now you see our predicament of space and dollars, you can understand why we are baulking at this. For us to implement junior kindergarten, staffing would cost $12 million and the actual accommodation—which would be portables—and renovations to our schools would be $19 million. I have real concerns about the actual probability of happening in some of my schools which have 19, 20 or more portables on site. There is no room left for another school and sometimes it just seems like a physical impossibility. Class size reduction has also created a need for portables and that will cost of $3.9 million.

If you add those all together, you will understand that the recent tax increases could amount to $26.15 million which translates into 8% on the mill rate. That is not what the taxpayers are asking us for. Most of them are asking for inflation, 4% or 5%. That creates real difficulty, as you know; you heard Halt Increasing Taxes. They want to stay on the line and we are really attempting to do that but it is very difficult.

In like fashion to your consultation process, we are currently receiving briefs from taxpayers. We have a special committee which now receives briefs from the public. We are most conscientious about our expenditures as evidenced by the Ministry of Education records comparing our school systems. As a large board, we rank second or third lowest in per-pupil cost and yet we have growth problems not experienced by many with which we are comparable. In light of that, I guess we are saying we are a really financially responsible board. We are not in debt and we try not to go into debt, but we do have a growing and demanding school system and we do need some assistance.

Mr Bowes: York Region Board of Education recommends that the 1991 budget for the province of Ontario be established to effect the following in the name of education:

1. Increase the 1991 grants to elementary and secondary education by 11% or $500 million as proposed by the Ontario Public School Boards' Association.

There is no more to be said on that. You have heard that many times over the past week. Another one you have heard a lot about, and we support OSSTF and the other presenters who have stated that they know exactly what the 6% solution is.

2. Initiate a multi-year plan to establish realistic pupil expenditure ceilings and to progressively return education funding to a 60% level of provincial support.

3. Initiate a multi-year plan for funding the growth of non-growth capital projects of Ontario's school systems with a 1991 allocation of $500 million.

The next three, we hope, may be some solutions to the problem of revenue and cash flow.

4. Review and reaffirm government support to Bill—education development charges—and move immediately to permit school boards to enact bylaws in order to collect levies.

I am sure you might have a lot of questions on that cause the director is the foremost expert on educational development charges in Ontario.

These two are personal ones. These came up when I made a presentation to the select committee on educational funding. Because I had a friend who was a pharmacist, these health care costs came up so I am going to have to mention it because I think it is interesting.

Sue Wakeling has mentioned on pages 1 and 2 the increase for education in the provincial budget from 15.1 per cent in 1975 to 10.4% in 1988. As a pharmacist, I started pharmacy apprenticeship in 1940, and that is over 49 years in the health services field; also a member of a hospital board for 17 years. Also, for a number of years I have had this little blue card which is very good, but I have never had it so good over the past years. Mind you, I have not to get a new one; this is signed by Peterson. I have never had it so good since becoming a senior citizen, retired from pharmacy, and looking back over 50 years in the health services field I have seen the abuses in the health care system.

In 10 years, health care spending has moved up from 15% of provincial revenues to 34%. Meanwhile education has dropped from 15%. There has been a threefold increase in the Ministry of Health expenditures in 10 years. I was heartened by the Honourable Evelyn Gigantes's statement today that they are cracking down on payments for health care, but I was saddened by the fact that she was not considering user fees.

Being in the business that long, in the pharmacy business and having dozens and dozens of physician friends, the user fee in my opinion, while it may be heresy for some of the members of Parliament, is the way to go for this government to save money and increase revenues. The Ministry of Health's budget is the one that is out of control.

On 6 September the taxpayers made their feelings known. Property taxes are out of control. It is time to change the educational source. The sixth recommendation that funding the educational source has to change away from property tax, whether it is income tax or whatever form. We would be pleased on behalf of the Growth Boards Coalition to be a part of what I understand are going to be two commissions running concurrently, the Fair Tax Commission and the commission on educational reform. We would be willing to make presentations to those commissions.

We thank you on behalf of the 20 trustees of the York Region Board of Education for your time and patience and respectfully request your consideration of our recommendations. I am going to ask Sue to go back and maybe Bob Cressman will come up. I am sure he will be able to answer some questions.

Mr Cousens: On behalf of my community, the region of York, and as a former trustee on this board and chairman of this board, I want to congratulate and thank Chairman Bowes and trustees for taking the time to bring this forward, recommendation 1.

I have always had trouble and continue to have trouble in finding the difference between the high-growth boards and the low-growth boards. What really grieves me as much as anything is, why is there not a bigger membership of the high-growth boards? It is unfortunate that you are not able to have a stronger coalition of boards across the province to agree with what you have got, because what you are talking about is a difference in the design of education within high-growth boards for the children there versus those in non-high-growth boards.

What I see as a problem is that unless the ministry gives a special emphasis to the high-growth boards, and it has not, we are going to continue to have the battles that are going on. It weakens your presentation by virtue of the fact there is not a larger list of names on it.

Mr Bowes: One of the problems, Mr Cousens, is that one of the other high-growth boards is Carleton. They are so far away. They agree with us but it is a long way for Carleton to come. They are probably the only high-growth board in eastern Ontario. They just cannot come down here to York region for a meeting. Simcoe is sympathetic to us, but they are a big, wide, spread-out board and it is difficult for them. This is on top of hundreds and hundreds—you know how many meetings we have in there, about fourfold since when you were a trustee. Simcoe has trouble.

Diane Williams, Scarborough board, is interested, with the growth in north Scarborough, in what we do and supports us but we can only do so much as individual boards in getting together.

Mr Cousens: Mr Chairman, I do not want to take longer because you have been going longer than I have in this committee, all day. The differences between the high-growth boards and the other boards is something—I would like to see the differences. I can see the problems you are expressing that affect our area, but also I start seeing other areas having junior kindergartens and I see other areas having other services, so that you are really talking about distinctive differences between the high-growth boards and the non. Maybe that is something we should begin to see, because there is discrimination going on between both systems.

Mr Bowes: I do not want to take a lot of your time at this time of night, but these are some of the extras on opening a new school: inadequate funding for furniture and equipment, inadequate library and no funding for inventory of supplies to start up. Our growth requires us to buy new textbooks for that growth and that is approximately four times as much as cyclical replacement of current textbooks.

The principal is hired several months in advance of the school opening—in fact more than several months—and has to be paid. Caretaking staff are phased in at the school well before the opening. All these are extra costs. Secretarial staff are in place before the opening. Overcrowding in holding schools and two new school openings create a need for extra staff. I do not know how many portables we had at Westminster and the crowding there—we got flak from the local residents in Vaughan. When the school is being built, we are busing the pupils to the holding schools. There is just a horrendous amount of busing, costing us about $45 million now.

The local share of new schools and portables, as Joanna mentioned, is being added to the requirement for local taxpayers. The major point is that we are having to bear the cost of the opening of new facilities while the grants we receive for the new pupils are required to cover the cost of educating these students in the present facilities. I think the director could go on and on about the problems we have in growth.

Mr Cressman: In short, it is $1 million more than approved grants presently allocate to equipment in secondary schools. We have four going right now.

Mr Cousens: Is that a secondary school?

Mr Cressman: A secondary school.

Mr Sutherland: I have two questions, one short and one just on your comment about English as a second language. That is the board's contribution? Are there not federal funds for that?

Mr Cressman: That is the York board's cost after grant.

Mr Sutherland: Thank you. Then let's get into this issue of lot levies, since Mr Bowes has got into that. Sorry, just before we do that, Mr Bowes, your comment about user fees: The only thing I would suggest is to get a copy of the transcript of when the minister and the deputy minister were here, because they discussed that issue.

Mr Bowes: The Minister of Health? I have read it, and that is why I say I was heartened by it. She is going to try to get some money from the foreign costs, from the people who go to Florida and send their bills back.

Mr Sutherland: There still seems to be some controversy about the lot levies. There is still a sense among some circles that whether there are lot levies or whatever, that is still a municipal burden, that the property owners are going to have to pay that in the cost of their houses at some point or other. I was wondering if you could comment on the issue as to how you see lot levies as maybe different from regular downloading.

Mr Cressman: Let me recount to you a telephone conversation in June 1989 between me and a taxpayer who had just received his bill wherein we had increased by an average of 16.7% all mill rates in the region. His municipality happened to come in at about 21%, and the man was understandably upset.

When I explained to him where the major costs were in the budget—they were in growth, new schools, provisional staff, etc—and about the underfunding, he said, "You mean to tell me that I am paying for the new schools being built along Steeles Avenue and up the Yonge Street corridor?" I said, "Yes, this is a regional school board; therefore the costs are absorbed by the region and the taxes allocated according to assessment." He said: "That's not fair. I'm living in a neighbourhood where we have a six-year-old school that is 38 years of age. My kids went to that school and now my grandchildren go to that school. We paid for that school, and now I am paying for what is happening down there? We don't have a gym and we don't have a library at our school." I said, "Yes, we are working on that." That is the kind of situation we are in.

There are 450,000 people in York region, but you have to remember that during the growth spurt, 300,000 were original residents. Two thirds of them are saying: "What's going on here? Why am I being soaked for all these new schools that are being built for people coming from outside the York region from outside the region and in many cases from outside the nation?" They get some upset about it.

So there is another side to the coin that says that you should pay something here if they move in. A lot of levies, $4,000 or $5,000 attached on a $250,000 home, ladies and gentlemen, is neither here nor there. We all know that. In fact, we know that has no impact whatsoever on the sales of houses because the developers will charge what the marketplace will bear. We know that too.

Mr Sutherland: Do you see that application applied throughout the entire province rather than just in York region?

Mr Cressman: Only in areas where the growth is significant. Don's question about the difference between boards—there are boards that are growing in the province by 500 a year and they have total enrolment of 15,000. That means nothing. They have got six schools that are just sitting empty. That is not an issue. Their issue is renovations and repairs to older schools.

We are talking about growing by 4,000 students a year in some years. Even right now, in a year of recession as deep as it is, we will grow this year by 2,500 students. We know where they will be? They will be living three or four families to a home. We get the revenue and taxes from one residence, but we have three and four families living in that home, as many as eight and 10 children coming out of one house. We have to provide education and new schools, new classrooms and teachers for that.

In areas where the growth is high, the lot levies will be of great assistance to us. In areas where the growth is minimal, I would admit with you that it will not be as important to them as the grants they would get for renovations and alterations. I know because I was a director on that situation in another board.

Mr Phillips: First, I do appreciate the presentation. Some other members earlier said that you are only one group speaking for the trustees, but I like to see a variety of groups before us. I know how tough it is in your area because it is very difficult to manage growth when you get very upset. I used to be a trustee in the north of Simcoe borough. I think over my tenure we built in my area at least 30 schools. I went through all of that. You go through that every day and I appreciate it.

I think the 60% funding commitment, if they move it, will help you. I will set aside the user fee area, by y, because I realize it was probably an unexpected recommendation from you.

Mr Bowes: It came out of the select committee. They told me about how we are going to get money and I thought that up.

Mr Phillips: But on the capital side, this group's recommendation for an incremental $500 million in capital—number that I have in my mind is that pre-1985, the vital budget was $70 million or so. In the last four or five years for the province, it has been running at about $100 million.

Mr Cressman: It was $338 million last year.

Mr Phillips: Yes, that commitment, I think, is through 1993 at $300 million. But your recommendation is for an incremental $500 million each year on top of that?

Mr Cressman: No, that is changing the $338 million to $838 million, which is a very simple mathematical calculation. It gives you a 10-year plan, because you have a $1-billion budget ahead of you.

Mr Phillips: So you moved from $300 million to $800 million?

Mr Cressman: Yes, that is the recommendation.

Mr Phillips: Each year for 10 years?

Mr Cressman: Yes. That gives you a 10-year plan. That is probably longer than people like to see, but at least it is a plan that would see an end in sight.

Mr Phillips: I think another group made a recommendation to us earlier for the capital spending programs, the kind of antirecession stuff. I think the group was saying that maybe part of that could go to the $700 million that has been announced. I understand now; from $300 million to $1,000 million a year.

Mr Bowes: Yes.

Mrs Sullivan: I am interested in your look at the long-term projections. Halton has also gone through a growth area, but not growing nearly as quickly as York, long-term infrastructure planning where the school boards and the municipalities have come together and looked down the road at what their needs would be in terms of demographic change. This is a comment, not a question really. One of the things that they looked at very seriously was the change in demographics over that same period of time. They were looking at 20 years, and therefore the change in capital need, as much as it could be predicted, over that period of time.

I do not know if you are finding this, but in our area the first heavy need is at the elementary level with second- and third-grade schools not requiring proportionately as many pupil spaces in the beginning. But latterly the emphasis is going to be on the secondary level where the costs are significantly higher for pupil spaces in terms of construction. That was factored into their process. Of course, the whole project was done to spring additional funding. They will be likely to do the new government about it again. I suggest that you do too.

Mr Cressman: To use this here as an example, we had 12,700 more students this September than the previous September, which was down 1,300 from the year before, when we had a pupil growth of 4,000, and 3,800 the year before that. Of that 2,700, 1,500 were elementary, 1,200 were secondary, so you are right. At the moment there is a greater increase in elementary, but you have to remember that that wave moves on through. Therefore the impact does come in the secondary panel later and the cost in the secondary school today is roughly $20 million. The cost in elementary is $6.5 million to $7 million, not counting land.

Mr Sutherland: Can I just get you to clarify what size of schools you are talking about at $20 million?

Mr Cressman: We build our secondary schools for $14 million and our elementary for $6 million.

Mr Bowes: I might say that on Thursday night we had quite a long discussion on this with the Growth Boards Coalition. I would like to read this paragraph again:

"Interest costs are scrutinized carefully by our board because interest paid means less money for classroom benefits to the students. The ministry currently pays us 25% of new projects in instalments spread over several years. As a result, we annually pay approximately $3 million in bridge financing costs, 1% of the mill rate." They were really concerned and wanted us to use that part about the interest cost that boards have to pay. That ties in with recommendation 3 on the $500 million.

The Chair: One of the groups that came to make a presentation here suggested that one of the costs that could be reduced is if, as the municipalities get 5% of the developed land, school boards would also be allocated a percentage of the land. Do you concur with that? Would you support that?

Mr Cressman: That would certainly decrease our costs. It would not solve the problem, however. At the moment, for the last decade, I have done all the negotiating personally for our board with the big guns, the Marco Muzzos and the Alfredo de Gasperises and so on, and I can tell you that the land prices have escalated considerably. The negotiations become more and more difficult between those gentlemen and me each year and sometimes end up in legal confrontation to solve our problems.

That is fine, but you have to remember that at the present time on an elementary school project of, let's say, $8 million, you are looking at perhaps $1.5 million in land and $6.5 million in building. If and when the economy returns to full bloom and we go back to this business of $500,000 an acre that they would like to see paid, then you are talking—

Mr Sutherland: Is that $500,000 an acre?

Mr Cressman: That is often where they start. They used to start at $750,000 and I beat them down to the point where they now start at $500,000 and I will start at $50,000. You know the old game in negotiations. You play from there.

Mr Bowes: Industrial land there is $1 million an acre.

Mr Cressman: That means I would predict that in a few years your average elementary school will run you $4 million or $5 million for land and perhaps $7 million or $8 million for the building. If that component of land were removed, that would take out a considerable portion, but there is still a very expensive building to go up, particularly in secondary schools, where the percentage is out of whack again, building to property. It would help, but it is not the total answer.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee I would like to thank you for your presentation.

Mr Bowes: Thank you, Mr Wiseman and fellow MPPs. It might help us to get a few more schools. You may even help to get a new school in Uxbridge.

Mr Phillips: You are shooting for the whole works.

The Chair: Before the committee adjourns, there is one item of business.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I appreciate that. I spoke last night to a group of credit union directors and managers and asked them if their provincial organization had made any presentation to us and they had not. They expressed an interest. I asked them to follow up on it because there may be an opening. We did the same thing for the bankers' association. I understand they will phone this morning and that they are pencilled in but I wanted to formally, for the record, put a motion forward that indeed they are invited and they constitute part of the agenda.

The Chair: We do have a half-hour slot. Is it the consensus of the committee to include them?

Mr Christopherson: Monday at 10:30, I think, is the time.

The Chair: Is that acceptable? Okay, Monday morning, 10:30.

Mr Christopherson: Thank you, Mr Chair and members of the committee.

The Chair: This committee stands adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The committee adjourned at 1744.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 30 January 1991

The committee met at 1012 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: I would like to begin this morning's hearings with the Ontario Chamber of Commerce: Don Eastman, chairman of the economic policy committee; Art Nithard, member of the economic policy committee, and Jim Corcoran, president. Welcome. If you would begin, please.

Mr Corcoran: Thank you, Mr Chair. Can we assume that we have a half-hour beginning now?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Corcoran: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. It is our honour and pleasure again this year to be speaking to this committee. We represent an organization of business with 60,000 members across the province of all sizes of business entities, all sectors and all geographies. As an organization, we certainly applaud the whole process that we see under way, including this repeated theme of consultation. I would just comment on consultation, that that is provided that it is consultation at the policy formulation and implementation design stage and not just advising us about implementation plans.

The presentation we would like to make this morning breaks into two parts. The first part will be presented by Don Eastman, who is the chairman of our economic policy committee. The major points we would like to make are that the business community needs confidence builders at this point in time, not more burdens, and therefore a major point is no new taxes. The second point is that we feel that the public sector can lead by example in terms of wage settlements that should be no greater than the rate of inflation. We have comments to make on the fiscal stimulation policy and the harmonization of the PST and GST.

The second part of our presentation this morning is a theme that we have presented before. It has to do with the consistency of accounting of government books. Art Nithard, who is also a member of the economic policy committee, will handle that portion of the presentation.

Mr Eastman: At this point, as we enter 1991, Ontario finds itself in the midst of a serious recession. The coming budget should have two major objectives. First of all, end the recession and restore a positive, dynamic provincial economy that provides productive employment opportunities for our citizens, income for people who enjoy the goods and services of our market economy and tax revenue to support the important services provided by the public sector. The second major objective should be to alleviate the personal hardship being imposed by the recession without damaging the prospects for economic recovery.

Let me stop here to assure you that under the current circumstances the chamber will not be calling for a balanced budget this year.

In order to cure the recession, it is first critically important to understand what caused it. There is a great temptation to run out and treat symptoms. We would remind you of the medical dictum, primum non nocere, above all, do no harm. The current recession has been caused by deliberate policy on the part of the Bank of Canada. It purposefully set out to increase interest rates and artificially increased the value of the Canadian dollar in order to increase unemployment.

While we may think that policy is wrongheaded and misguided, the Bank of Canada is not being malevolent. One of the major responsibilities of the bank is to maintain the purchasing value of the dollar by controlling, if not eliminating, inflation. Its only tool for doing this is to restrain economic activity by increasing interest rates and the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar. The current recession is the bank's response to a disturbing increase in inflationary pressures. Both the consumer price index and the wage settlements began what the bank considered to be a dangerous escalation.

In order for Ontario to play its part in restoring the economy, it needs to reduce the inflationary pressures in the province and permit a growth-oriented monetary policy. It also needs to rebuild business confidence that Ontario is a good place to be in business. It has been frequently observed that this is a made-in-Canada recession. It has also been a made-for-Ontario recession. The growing inflation problem that the bank is trying to cure has been centred primarily on Ontario.

The recession that the bank has created has had a direct and immediate impact on the market economy. Unfortunately, its impact on the public sector tends to be minor and slow. In the market economy, companies are disappearing and downsizing. Bankruptcies have become distressingly common. Many private sector employees now find themselves without jobs. Unemployment is rising and so is the load on the province's social services. As a result, spending requirements are rising at the same time that tax revenue is shrinking. While the market economy is bleeding, the public sector is largely continuing as though the party was in full swing.

The public sector has been a major part of our inflation problem. We have seen tax increases that have been a major component of the consumer price index increases. We have also had significant legislated cost increases that have impacted on business and then flowed through the consumer price index. We have also had public sector wage settlements that have tended to significantly exceed market sector increases.

At this point in time, we desperately need the provincial government to stop being part of the inflation problem and become part of the solution. One of the problem areas has been public sector wage settlements. They are high-profile settlements that have a double impact: They provide a target for private sector employees and they also increase government costs and result in higher taxation needs. How do you tell steelworkers that due to economic conditions, ie, negative profitability, that they have to accept less than the teachers' increase or put their job at risk? And this just after they get their tax bill for much higher education costs.

Most provincial tax initiatives and legislated cost increases flow through the cost of goods and services to ultimately show up as increases in the consumer price index. The provincial government has taken the lead in protecting the public service employees from its higher taxes, pay equalization costs and the costs of its higher environmental and workplace safety standards by indexing its wages and pensions to the consumer price index. The province needs to stop exempting public service employees from paying their fair share of Ontario's social programs.

The inflation bias that underlies our economy has been terribly destructive at a human level. Currently, we appear to need a substantial cushion of unemployment in order to control inflation. That is tragic both for those who lose their jobs and for those economically disadvantaged who are less employable. Following its long march back from the 1982 recession, the economy was finally beginning to provide opportunities for those people in 1989. They now, in 1991, find a large and growing barrier of employable unemployed standing between them and their reasonable job expectations.

In addition to this province's responsibility in reducing inflation to permit a growth-oriented monetary policy, Ontario needs to look carefully at business confidence. In order to be positive, dynamic and self-sustaining, economic recovery must be driven by the market economy.

The business community's confidence in this province has been shaken and eroded by a variety of legislative initiatives, tax increases and new taxes. Business costs have been seriously increased in what has appeared to be an arbitrary and capricious manner. That erosion preceded the current government, but I think I can fairly say that last fall's election has not exactly eliminated business concerns.

The initiatives that the government has taken since the election have generally not been helpful. We have seen trailer-length legislation, extended parental leave, rent control legislation, pre-emptive cancellation of the Hamilton expressway. None of these actions has shown much sensitivity to the impact on business nor to a consultative process that would have permitted an expression of business concerns.

Business confidence may not appear to be particularly relevant to the pre-budget process. However, until the market economy recovers, the province is going to find itself seriously short of taxation revenue. Anything that slows the economic recovery will exacerbate the revenue problem.

In the area of taxation, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce welcomes the creation of the Fair Tax Commission. However, we are apprehensive about the potential make-up of the commission and its terms of reference. We are looking for a commission that has the ability and mandate to look past the point of tax collection to understand who ultimately pays our various taxes and is sensitive to the impact of taxes on economic activity.

The truly regressive taxes are those taxes and government actions that increase costs and reduce productive employment without providing balancing benefits. In terms of unnecessary costs, one of the most regressive taxes we have right now is the provincial sales tax. Whether we like the federal goods and services tax or not, it is now a fact of life. By integrating the provincial sales tax and the federal GST, we could save substantial business compliance costs and government administration costs. The total effective tax load would be reduced with no loss to government revenue, and in fact government funds available for productive social spending would be increased to the extent that government administrative costs are reduced.

In the area of fiscal stimulation, the Treasurer has announced a $700-million spending program to help stimulate the provincial economy. In a normal business cycle recession, this would be an appropriate response. With a monetary policy recession, it is counterproductive. Until the Bank of Canada fundamentally alters its current policy, stimulative spending by this government is like trying to fill a bathtub with a teaspoon while the Bank of Canada has the plug pulled.

The Treasurer has identified the economic infrastructure of the province as a priority. We agree with that assessment, but the first thing we have to do is to get the plug back in the tub. Until then, government spending does not stimulate anything, it simply squeezes out personal and business spending.

In the meantime, rising obligations under existing social programs and reduced taxation revenue threaten to produce an ugly deficit even without the benefit of new spending initiatives. Extreme caution in spending is required or we will quickly create a deficit hole so deep that it will appear to be insurmountable.

We are never keen about new taxes or tax increases. They would be particularly harmful in the current environment and should be avoided. I think we would be doing our members in the chamber a disservice if we did not remind you that we have consistently recommended that the province run surpluses and pay down its debt in good years so that it could be more responsive to social needs during tough economic times. We wish that advice had been heeded.

I would like it turn it over to Art on the accountability essay.

Mr Smithard: Thank you, Don. Good morning everyone. In the chamber's presentation prior to the preparation of the 1990-91 Ontario provincial budget, I stressed the importance of the province adopting the recommendations of the Canadian Institute of Chartered accountants public sector accounting and auditing committee.

The CICA has conducted a vigorous study of government financial reporting practices and has brought forward a series of recommendations designed to make government financial statements more understandable and useful to the readers. We feel that it is essential that the province of Ontario take action to implement these recommendations. Incomplete or misunderstood financial information can lead to inappropriate economic decisions both by elected representatives and by the public at large.

The government of Ontario is extremely thorough in its approach to the establishment and maintenance of financial standards for the thousands of public companies that operate in the province. Last year, the Ministry of Financial Institutions spent $35.6 million to ensure that Ontario investors were protected by rules and regulations that recognize the complexity of modern business undertakings.

It is ironic that the government itself struggles with an accounting approach and financial reporting practices that could be more suitable to the 1890s than the 1990s. These problems were highlighted during the recent election when no one seemed to know if we were headed for a surplus or deficit.

The financial operations of an enterprise the size of the government of Ontario are extremely complex. It is accurate to say that the government is the largest enterprise in the province and therefore should be a leader in implementing accounting processes and financial reporting practices to ensure that its citizens are well informed. The most important of the required changes can be summarized as follows:

The need for consolidated financial statements: At present the province produces financial statements for what it describes as government operations. This is a ubiquitous label and is not to be confused with all of the operations that the government and its commissions are involved in. In a more fundamental sense, it does not represent all of the operations that are undertaken on behalf of the citizens of the province and for which the citizens have a financial responsibility.

The most striking example of this problem relates to the determination of how much the taxpayers really owe. Last year's budget forecast an accumulated deficit of approximately $39 billion for government operations. However, the outstanding value of province of Ontario bonds is substantially more than that.

These bonds are sold on the basis of the government's ability to raise money through taxation and represent the extent to which the taxpayers are in debt to holders of provincial bonds. Even this total does not include the unfunded liabilities of pension funds and the Workers' Compensation Board, which would appear to add an additional $7.5 billion to the total. Consolidated financial statements are required if we are to be in a position to understand our debt position.

The adoption of a more modern approach to financial management would lead to a better understanding of the many assets that make up the infrastructure of the province. The maintenance of these assets and their replacement and modernization have a great bearing on Ontario's ability to maintain its productive capacity. This requirement goes far beyond the simple recording of assets and accumulated depreciation on a balance sheet.

It is significant to note that the province of Alberta continues to make progress with the presentation of consolidated financial statements for that province. In addition, the state of New York continues to extend its reporting of the state's fixed-asset base.

Another requirement that should be given serious consideration in the preparation of the government's budget and in its financial reporting is to more clearly delineate between fixed-program spending and those items for which the government has some degree of spending flexibility. At this time, it appears that fixed-spending programs such as health, social services, education, together with interest payments on public debt, account for 79% of all spending. In addition, a significant portion of the remaining 21% of government spending relates to long-term commitments in the form of wages to employees and the cost of essential government services. The end result of this situation is that the government has very little room to manoeuvre and virtually no financial ability to undertake spending programs.

A clearer statement of the government's financial position through the use of consolidated financial statements, coupled with a more precise statement of its spending commitments and flexibilities, would lead to a better-informed decision-making process. Such a process would also produce a more stable base of information for making longer-term financial forecasts prior to undertaking new spending commitments.

We recognize that these requirements cannot all be achieved in this budget, but we urge the government to end the delay of its predecessors and make progress towards implementing a more modern and sophisticated form of financial management on behalf of the taxpayers of Ontario.

Mr Sterling: I am really happy that you have raised the whole idea of the financial accountability of governments and also the agencies of the government, in that the transfer—I do not know what it is but somewhere between 73%, 74%, 75% of the money goes to other agencies to spend the money on our behalf.

I asked the Treasurer, when he appeared in front of this committee the very first day of our hearings, if he would agree to sit down with the Provincial Auditor and set forth a method of reporting to the public on his expenditures and on his revenue, etc. He agreed to do that and I hope that is going to be one of the recommendations of this committee.

Having served the longest in the Legislature of any of the members of this committee, having served as a minister of the crown and having watched in opposition, it is my conclusion after 13 years as a member of the Ontario Legislature that accountability does not serve the sitting government. In other words, there is no desire on the part of those in power, normally, to be accountable in a clear and simple fashion for the people to understand. Many of the actions of government lead to dispersing the responsibility so that the public cannot really understand what is going on.

During the last administration we had an example of preflowing of money, some $400 million one year and I think $350 million another year, where the Treasurer inflated his deficit during non-election years and then brought that money back into the election year so he could declare that he had balanced the budget when we were facing an election. I think that is nothing more than political opportunism in terms of not declaring to people when in fact you had done better, and only developing the books so that you could present a political statement rather than an accountable statement.

I hope one of the recommendations of this committee will be that the Treasurer and interested parties—and perhaps this will be something for our committee to consider after we have finished the pre-budget consultations—set down in black and white what is fair to both sides in terms of reporting and how often those reports should be made and how timely, because right now we are having trouble getting the Treasurer to give us our third-quarter statement of what has happened. There seems to be no question that we are in a real spin in terms of the overall deficit, but he is stalling in producing that information. We are going to try to get it out of him, I believe, tomorrow.

In terms of the financial reporting, one of the things that has concerned me is that we have hospitals and school boards that are spending more money on our behalf than some provincial governments. Does your concern go to those agencies as well?

Mr Smithard: The recommendations CICA has put forward primarily focus on the operations of the provincial government, and they would clearly show the transfers the government makes to other agencies, either municipalities or the hospital system. Again, there is a follow-on piece by CICA that will be making recommendations for municipal governments.

I think one of the real difficulties in looking at government accounting and financial practices is that there is really not much cohesion between the federal, the provincial and the municipal levels of government. Practices are quite different and it is very difficult to track things through the entire process. I think traceability and accountability is something that needs to be improved, particularly when you consider the size of transfer payments that take place in the Canadian economy.

Mr Sterling: Could I ask you a specific question about the $700 million the Treasurer has talked about in terms of stimulating? I understood at first that you were saying he should not spend this money, but on the second part I was not certain whether you were softening that stance. In that it is estimated that somewhere in the neighbourhood of $40 million of the $700 million would be spent in this fiscal year—that means before 31 March—and that economists have come in front of this committee and said that we are likely to pull out of this recession in the third quarter, it seems to me that by the time that $700 million is in fact in action in terms of providing employment, etc, we are already going to be on the uphill climb towards economic recovery. Are you saying to the Treasurer that it is better to keep the deficit down than spending the $700 million?

Mr Eastman: There are a couple of points tied together. First, I guess we are not opposing spending $700 million per se. I think what have been identified are some legitimate areas where the money should be spent but it is a mistake to believe that this somehow stimulates the economy, because you have in the current circumstances the Bank of Canada with strict control of the money supply. That means it is really controlling in terms of the amount of money that can be spent; not who spends but how much will be spent. So to the extent that the province decides to spend more, it means that somebody else spends less, because of the way the monetary policy has been exercised.

It is important that you cannot stimulate a fiscal policy unless it is accommodated by the bank, and this will be. When the bank does ease off, I think you will find that there will be a lot of personal and business spending ready to come in. In the business spending there are some other concerns, but I think the first thing is that you have to ease the monetary policies.

In terms of when we might expect an economic recovery, which was the related issue you had in that, we sincerely hope we are going to see a fundamental recovery under way by the third quarter. So far, that is in a sense more of a wish than a forecast, because at this point we still have not seen what I would term any fundamental easing of the monetary policies that got us into this situation. You have seen a drop in interest rates, but if you look at the value of the Canadian dollar, it has really changed very little. One of the reasons it has changed very little is partly because of the petrodollar influence but, more important, because we are still maintaining a better-than-4 basis-points short-term interest rate spread with US rates. That is not easing at all, in my book.

So I think the jury is still out as to whether we will have a third-quarter recovery and how strong it is. I certainly hope we are going to see it.

Mr Sterling: You mentioned that you were concerned about the high wage settlements in the public sector. Are you in favour of price and wage controls in the public sector at this time?

Mr Eastman: In the private sector, wages and prices are controlled by the market.

Mr Sterling: I said public sector.

Mr Eastman: Yes, I know. In the public sector there is no effective similar control, and you have to have some other form of control instead. I hear a lot of people are excited about wage and price controls for the public sector. The alternative is for it to be uncontrolled, and that is not acceptable. The only question is: How do you control it and how do you really create a fair situation so that you do not have negotiations taking place in isolation and separate from that which really are not rooted in economic reality?

Mr Jamison: You did not really deal with my question within your report, and it seems to be a significant problem at this time: cross-border shopping. I am interested in your thoughts on that. The other point is that it is interesting that you have almost great concern over how the Fair Tax Commission would be structured. I would be interested in finding out how you felt it should be structured specifically, and the cross-border shopping impact at this time on the economy.

Mr Eastman: Cross-border shopping is a very messy, complicated topic. There are a number of things impacting on cross-border shopping. Currently it represents a growing loss of taxation revenue for the province. How much that is, I am not sure. I think one of the things that would assist with the cross-border shopping problem would be the integration of the GST and the provincial sales tax, because currently you have the problem that the provincial sales tax is effectively not collected on goods coming in from the United States. If you roll in the provincial sales tax and fully integrate it with the GST, you then have a mechanism whereby that will be collected at the border. That is only part of the problem; it is not all of it, but it does catch part of the problem.

There is a whole bunch of other issues there, including the Sunday shopping part of it. The extent to which you have the flow-through of a lot of other business costs in the U.S. has meant that when people are looking at prices on the other side of the border, Canadian prices really do not look all that attractive, even after you have blacked out some of the more obvious tax impact. So that one is a messy issue and deserves a lot of attention.

Mr Jamison: I thought that many of your members across the province would be within range of that cross-border shopping situation, and I thought you might have more to say on that in your report. I was fairly surprised that you had not.

Mr Eastman: We will have some further material coming on. That is an active topic of research for us currently.

The Chair: We have a presentation at 11 o'clock this morning from the Border Communities Task Force on Cross Border Shopping.

Mr Jamison: The second part of my question was that you showed some concern about the Fair Tax Commission and how it should be structured. I would be interested in finding out how you feel that tax commission should be structured, as you zeroed in on the structure of the committee.

Mr Eastman: Again, the word here is "apprehension," not "opposition." I think the concept is a great one. We are concerned that when we see the makeup of the committee we can be comfortable. We have a sense that that committee, because of its makeup, has the capability of having an objective look at the whole taxation issue and has the depth of understanding not just to look at it superficially but to really look at it through the whole set of underlying causes.

Mr Jamison: You have no specific recommendations?

Mr Eastman: Not at this point.

Mr Sutherland: We have heard in the last few days from the public school boards, we have heard from the colleges, we have heard from the universities. Every one of those groups or their representatives who have been in have called for significant increases in educational funding through the entire system. You have commented in your report about where you think deficits should be, financing and that. Even in this time of recession and with a deficit, would it be your advice that if you were thinking about spending more money, increasing the deficit, education would be the area to do it, in terms of those colleges, universities, public and high schools and skills development?

Mr Eastman: I have some concerns about education. I think education is critically important, probably our most important public asset, our most important public investment. If I look back and I see what has happened to the rapid progress of technology over the past two decades, it has primarily been in information technology. Our ability to process and manage information has increased incredibly, both in what we are able to do and the cost-effectiveness with which we are able to do it. When I look at that, it means it should have been able to translate into an education system that is able to do quite a bit better than it has, using less funds than it has. I think there is a tremendous opportunity for the education system to be much more effective in producing an output and using less funds to do it.

Having said that, I think post-secondary education has been a bit starved for funds. If you look at where the funds have been going and where the funding problem has been in terms of absorbing money, it is the elementary and secondary school level.

Mr Phillips: Just a comment, and then a couple of questions. One is that in your document, on page 5 at the bottom, you say, "...if we did not remind you that we have consistently recommended that the province run surpluses and pay down its debt in good years.... We wish that advice had been heeded." I guess you may not be familiar with the numbers. We did heed the advice and I would be happy to sit down with the chamber, because four or five years ago the deficit was running at $2.6 billion on a budget of maybe $26 billion. Each year it went down. There was a surplus last year, as you probably know. I think any reasonable person would say that this year, without the recession, there would have been a substantial surplus.

I do not want your members being unfamiliar with those numbers, because our reputation is at stake. I just assure you that the advice was heeded—heeded by taking the taxes up, okay? I recognize that—none the less, a surplus, paying down the accumulated deficit, and I think anyone would acknowledge that this year we would have had a substantial surplus had we not had the recession.

But my question really is twofold. As one of the members said, we have had now five different economic forecasters here, three banks and the conference board and Infometrica, and they are all predicting that in the mid to late calendar year, this calendar year, Ontario will pull out of the recession and then see some substantial economic growth next year and from there on. I know you have partially answered it, but because there is a bit of art and a bit of science in this thing, I would be interested in how your members see and therefore how the chamber sees the economic future of Ontario unfolding.

My second is a little more detailed. I agree with you that there are a number of unfunded liabilities around that are not on the books, whether they be pensions or workers' compensation, but also I think we look at capital in a different way from the private sector. We pay capital out of current; we do not amortize or depreciate our capital. I think the Treasurer has signalled that he may be looking at a different way of funding capital. I was wondering if you had any advice for the committee in terms of whether we should be trying to put a figure on the capital assets there and funding some form of depreciation. I think you are looking at it in quite a different light. So those are my two questions and my comment. I would be happy to sit down with whoever in the chamber prepares the numbers to make our case.

Mr Smithard: I will take the last question first, because that is the easy one, dealing with capital and the treatment of it. Today in the provincial accounting process everything is handled on a cash basis. Normally in business and in provinces and states that have introduced capital accounting, the entities have segregated their expenditures between current expenses, things that will be consumed this year, and things that will have a value into the future.

The state of New York, which undertook a very lengthy study of this, started in 1981 with its study. They started phasing in their investments in 1987 and that is continuing to this time. What they attempted to do was to identify those investments that the state or the province make which are really important to the future of the enterprise. I think that if you do that and if you establish a depreciation study base as to how long these assets are going to last, how much money you have to put into them to keep them operational and how much money it is going to take to replace them when the assets are worn out, this is vital to the wellbeing and the ongoing success of the province.

We urge you to move in that direction as quickly as possible. It is not something that can be done overnight. It would probably take 10 years if you started today. It is a big job. We are not talking about counting statues on the lawn at Queen's Park; we are talking about the important assets that the province has that make up the productive infrastructure of the province.

Mr Phillips: They do, eventually, depreciation—

Mr Smithard: They are starting into that, and I believe that they have completed depreciation studies on things like computer equipment and motor vehicles, sort of medium-term assets. They have not, to the best of my knowledge, been able to complete depreciation studies on things like highways and bridges, but I believe it is the intention to do that.

Mr Corcoran: Let me comment on your comment and the second question. Our position with the Treasurer for at least the last three years was that prudent business do not plan on the basis of a continued projection of growth market. I understand from your footnote that had not been for the recession, but that was our whole point that in times of economic prosperity that is exactly the time to be paying down.

Mr Phillips: That is why we went to a surplus.

Mr Corcoran: On the second point, if you were to speaking to business people outside of Ontario, they would be saying, "Oh, you mean Ontario's recession?" For people throughout Ontario, business people throughout Ontario, we have been made aware of the optimistic view of third-quarter recovery by the Treasurer and by financial institutions. But I would think most prudent business people that we speak to are not making decisions based on third- or fourth-quarter recovery in terms of a decision that will only have to last for three to six months. They are making decisions that will last for the long term.

The good news of that is that if there is a recovery in the third quarter, all companies, the majority of companies will have a lower fixed-cost base and will be well positioned for recovery. I do not see anybody making decisions on an assumption that there will be a recovery in the third quarter at this point.

Mr Phillips: Do you survey your members at all? I am just wondering if there is any tracking that is done in terms of—

Mr Corcoran: We have not made a statistical survey but we do have a quarterly board meeting. We have had at least three or four passes at them with what we would call our Ontario recession.

Mrs Sullivan: I think the comments you have put forward on the accounting methods are very interesting, and Mr Phillips really asked a question that I was very interested in on the capital side, but I also wanted to go back to some of the matters you have raised in the fiscal stimulation section of your brief. One of the things you mentioned that the government should exercise extreme caution on spending. Of course, spending includes not only actual dollars put out but forgone income as well.

The federal chamber has taken the position that incentives to business should stop and that you can do very well on your own, thank you very much. I would like your comments on that, given, for instance, the recent initiatives which in fact have been welcomed, particularly by the manufacturing sector in terms of the Ontario current adjustment moving to 30%, an initiative which was taken by the previous government and which this government has indicated it was going to continue.

Mr Eastman: I think one of the important aspects is that one is the issue of tax stability, because many of the manufacturing industries have done their planning based on that commitment. It was then quite appropriate that it should be followed through with on the capital cost allowance.

The Chair: Excuse me, could you move forward and speak a little bit more into the mike? They are having trouble back there with the recorder.

Mr Eastman: Sorry. I think the capital cost allowance is one of these items that should be properly addressed by the Fair Tax Commission, because one of the problems we have is that we wind up with the conception that somehow this is one of your taxation expenses, forgone revenue.

In fact, one of the problems we have with corporate income tax is that because there is no assessment of the impact of inflation, the full amount that is available for capital cost depreciation winds up being substantially less than the real amount that should be available. In a sense you have two offsetting factors going on there. So I think that in terms of your attitudes you have two biases, and it is appropriate that that should be addressed by the Fair Tax Commission.

Mrs Sullivan: Okay. Well, in that case the Ontario current cost adjustment moved from 15% to 30% as of 1 January. This should have been of significant benefit, I think something of the value of $150 million or something. Does the Ontario chamber hold the national chamber's position? Do you concur with that point of view?

Mr Eastman: In terms of generally eliminating the direct subsidies assistance business, yes, we do.

Mrs Sullivan: How can you apply that concept then, when we are very clearly looking in order to be competitive over the next period of time, with massive needs in research and development, which clearly will not be done by business alone? How can you bring those positions together when on the one hand we know there is going to have to be immense co-operation between government and business? Is business prepared to carry that load on its own?

Mr Smithard: I can give some insight into that in the sense that many businesses make substantial contributions in the R and D area. I am with Bell Canada, and the Bell Northern Research consortium puts a tremendous contribution into research and development in a very strategically important area to Canada. I think there are other firms that also invest heavily in research and development.

One of the problems we have in terms of measuring that is that the definition relates to the tax law. In other words, the definition of research and development is not sort of defined by people who are interested in research and development per se; it is really defined under the tax law, and you get a lot of strange things caught up in it as a result of that. That is a difficulty that we have, and in part it gets tied up in the tax credit process. I think your point is well founded, and that is that the government does need to continue to give good recognition to R and D tax credits.

Mr B. Ward: Just a quick question before I make a comment. I have just gotten back from Cornwall after the last couple of days on a skills development issue with the Minister of Skills Development. In talking to the people in Cornwall about the economic conditions that exist there, talking with my colleagues from Windsor, from the Sault—I know what is going on in Brantford; my colleague Norm Jamison is suffering some tough times in Simcoe—the feeling I get is that our provincial economy is undergoing a fundamental restructuring.

In the recession of 1981-83 we were reducing the manufacturing base in size, but with new economic growth would bring back the labour force if not to the same employment levels, even more so. What is happening now, in my opinion, is that the restructuring that is occurring is in our manufacturing base, that the plants that are laying off, closing up, are gone for ever. They are relocating or centralizing their operations for whatever reason, but they are gone for ever. I would just like a comment from the chamber's perspective, if that is its view on what is going on in this recession for the province of Ontario.

The second point I would like to get their opinion on is on page 4. They mention under "Business Confidence" that "In order to be positive, dynamic and self-sustaining, economic recovery must be driven by the market economy." I was just wondering, from your point of view, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, everything being equal and if we heed your advice, how do you envision the market forces leading to economic recovery? I am assuming by market economy you are talking about it being driven by the private sector rather than the public sector.

I can relate to the very severe depression we had in the 1930s where every year the business leaders were saying that recovery was just around the corner—"Allow the private enterprise system to do its job and the pressure will be over"—yet year after year after year it continued. I was just wondering how you envision our recovery to occur if it is driven by the private sector.

I wonder if you can comment on those two. First of all, in your opinion are we undergoing a fundamental restructuring of our economy in the province? Second, how do you envision the private sector leading us out of this recession?

Mr Eastman: Clearly there is some fundamental restructuring taking place. The timing of the recession is really tragic because it is occurring at the same time that people are looking at the restructuring that would be appropriate under the free trade agreement. To try to do that in a circumstance where the Canadian dollar is artificially held at 86 cents and where you have a general depression of business confidence in this province at the same time, that does tend to steer some decisions elsewhere. That will be permanent. That reinforces the need to get out of this recession as quickly as possible.

In terms of the role of the market economy, it was serving this country and this province extremely well in terms of driving the whole economy up until the time that the Bank of Canada said: "Hey, the party's got out of hand. We have to stop it." When the Bank of Canada does make a fundamental change in policy with competitive interest rates and the lower value of the Canadian dollar, and if at that point you have a continuing problem with the lack of investment and activity from the market economy, that needs to be addressed then, but at this point I do not have any real concerns that we will not see a recovery once we can get monetary policies in place.

Mr B. Ward: You are fairly confident that once the Bank of Canada eases the monetary restrictions we are under with the high-interest-rate, high-dollar concept, the private sector will be able to lead us into recovery provided everyone gets his economic house in order, so to speak, in your opinion?

Mr Eastman: I do not think there is any doubt about that at all as long as there is, in conjunction with that, a restoration of business confidence that this is in fact a good province to be in business for a variety of reasons.

Mr Christopherson: I realize the lateness of the time. I had a number of questions, some have been asked; I will just ask one very quick question if I can. Most of the people coming before us over the last couple of weeks have been indicating with a fair bit of confidence that effective the beginning of the third quarter of this year we should start to pull slowly but steadily out of the recession. I would just ask if the Ontario chamber is also of the opinion that that is what is going to happen. Is it your sense that your membership is planning to respond with that kind of timetable in mind?

Mr Eastman: I think there is a tendency, once you are in any recession or boom, for people to believe that it will continue for ever. If you were to go out and ask our membership right now, I am not sure that you would find a great many of them, particularly in the smaller businesses, who really do see that upturn coming. When you start talking to the large businesses, those that can have their own economic staff, etc, then you do have a view that yes, recessions are temporary things and you come up the other side of them.

A concern I have is that most of those forecasts for a third-quarter recovery are econometric-model forecasts. There are some things that are fundamentally different about this recession, including the fact that there is some restructuring taking place.

At this point we still have, in my view, an adverse monetary policy. There is normally a fairly significant lead time between the time you have a change in monetary policy and the response in the market economy. You have some things like housing starts that can respond fairly quickly; car sales can respond fairly quickly; with business investment, depending on its size and nature, the lead time on that can be from six months to 18 months, two years.

In a sense, if you want a third-quarter recovery, you virtually have to have almost an immediate change in the current monetary policy. If that happens, then I would be comfortable that we would see it happen.

Mr Christopherson: Good. Thank you for your presentation and your brief; we appreciate it.

The Chair: On behalf of the committee I would like to thank you for making your presentation today and thank you for coming.

ADJUST ONTARIO

The Chair: Our next committee hearing is Adjust Ontario; Marnie Hayes, Fiona Knight and Richard Yampolsky.

Ms Hayes: Good morning, Mr Chair and members of the committee. I would like to thank you for the opportunity to appear before you this morning on behalf of Adjust Ontario.

My name is Marnie Hayes, as mentioned, and I am a community and legal worker with Metro Tenants Legal Services. With me are Richard Yampolsky, who is the executive director of FoodShare, and Fiona Knight, who is the program director with FoodShare.

Some of you may be wondering what Adjust Ontario is. It is an organization, a sort of network of social service and community agency groups, that came together about June 1990 with a list of demands to alleviate poverty in Ontario.

We believe that the root causes of poverty must be looked at in order to alleviate poverty, and that there is a whole package of reforms that must take place in order that poverty is no longer in our midst. For example, there is no point in increasing the minimum wage while at the same time having incredibly high prices for rental housing. Therefore, there is a whole package that we would like to present to you this morning which includes an increase in the minimum wage, an increase in social assistance rates, an increase in child care rates, an increase in non-profit housing and mandatory employment equity legislation which includes funding for public education.

We believe that the time of recession is not a time to hold back on public policy, social and anti-poverty initiatives, but it is a time to go ahead because now is the time when homelessness, poverty and hunger are at their height. To quote the NDP's Agenda for People, which was a platform election package, now is the time that "families no longer have to choose between paying the rent or eating."

With respect to housing, we believe that the lack of decent, affordable housing is one of the two primary causes of poverty in Ontario, concurring with the Transition report of the Social Assistance Review Committee.

Currently there are about half a million tenant households that spend more than 30% of their income on rent and there are over 190,000 people in Ontario who are forced to rely on food banks to eat. It is estimated that the average food bank user spends approximately 70% of their income on rent. In the Liberal government report, More Than Just a Roof, for the International Year of Shelter for the Homeless, it was estimated that families that spend more than 50% of their income on housing are at risk of becoming homeless should their economic circumstances take a turn for the worse.

Currently the public housing waiting lists have grown to 44,700 people in 1990, which is an increase of more than 60% since 1987. In Metro Toronto alone it is estimated that there are approximately 20,000 people who are homeless.

The need is clear. The number of non-profit housing units has to be increased in Ontario. We consider housing to be a right, like education and health care, and it is the responsibility, in this case of the Ontario government, to provide affordable housing for its citizens. The question is, how should that housing be provided and where should the government allot the funds to create more affordable housing? We say that co-operative housing and non-profit housing are the most viable solution because non-profit housing is affordable housing that remains affordable over time, unlike housing in the private market which is subject to inflation and speculation.

Housing production is good during a time of recession because it creates employment. Each new housing unit that is created creates 2.2 person-years of employment, giving living wage jobs and at the same time much-needed housing.

It is true that it is very expensive to provide programs for co-operative and non-profit housing, but we ask this committee to be in agreement with the 1990 report of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, which recognized that non-profit and co-operative housing are important elements in addressing the issue of affordable housing.

We are going to move on to the issue of social assistance and minimum wage.

Mr Yampolsky: With regard to social assistance, since their inception Ontario's social assistance programs have always been predicated on the notion that some people were or are more deserving than others. We have seen over the years the development of benefit rates that differed for employable people, families with children and disabled persons. Not only has this meant that tens of thousands of people have been forced to live in poverty, but the general population, through this segmentation that has taken place, has been made to believe that there really is a hierarchy of deservedness among those people who constitute the poor. Disabled people are more deserving than employable people, and everybody knows that children, the innocent victims, are the most deserving of all. What we have really done is that rather than look at the whole issue of poverty, we have segmented or segregated the various aspects of poverty.

Benefit rate structures have never had any bearing on the reality of what it takes to maintain oneself and one's family in dignity. The theory behind keeping social assistance benefits low has been and still is to this day to create a disincentive for people who rely on social assistance and to make income from paid work more attractive. As we found from the statistics released by the Social Assistance Review Committee, only 9.5% of people in, I think it was July 1988, were actually employable. So we are looking at about 45,000 people who were recipients at that time—I presume now the numbers are higher—beneficiaries of social assistance, who were actually employable. About 90% were actually sole-support parents. Children made up 41% of this, yet we were punishing them at the same time.

This whole theory I was just talking about around the disincentives also does not address the reality of those people who are simply unable to work. Single parents who can neither secure nor afford child care or who choose to remain at home with their children are penalized and forced to live in poverty because of these choices and because of the lack of available support programs. Disabled persons, many of whom are unable to work, are also forced to live in poverty.

I do not think anybody in this room could really disagree that benefit rates are woefully low, given the low-income cutoffs established by Statistics Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as various social planning councils across the country. Social assistance recipients in Ontario still fare no better than 55% to 74% of these standards.

With the release of the Transitions report by the committee in September 1988 the details really did come to the fore, and I am not going to bother going through all of them. But the minor tinkering with the implementation of Transitions by the previous government and since October 1990, I guess, has really meant that the clear vision still exists for Transitions. I was before this committee a little over two years ago as well, talking around the implementation of Transitions and the need to act on it.

What we are really beginning to see is that while the vision still exists and while there are many of us who still use it as a very clear vision to really address systemic poverty issues in the province, the political will is still lacking. To date, only 25 of 66 recommendations contained in phase 1 of Transitions, in the very staging program, have been implemented in any way, shape or form. To give credit where credit is due, the current Minister of Community and Social Services has asked—they are supposed to be reporting back either today or tomorrow—about the non-legislative aspects of Transitions that could be implemented, and to her credit has requested that the non-legislative side be fast-tracked.

In April 1990 the standing committee on social development of the Legislature had a series of hearings on food banks, and the report back from that recommended the provincial government “implement the balance of the social assistance rate increases called for in the first two stages of the SARC reforms (including two years of indexing).” We have yet to see this.

We know the cost of maintaining approximately 10% of the provincial population in poverty is increasing. Increases in health care costs and judicial and social services can all be attributed to increases in poverty levels, and yet we continue to advocate that, by eliminating the number of people in poverty, we will obviously see a corresponding decrease in expenditures in other areas.

The recession is not the time to stop social assistance reforms. This period should see an unprecedented increase in social assistance payments. This should not merely be because of an increase in welfare case loads, as we are seeing in every municipality across this province, but must instead also dramatically see increases in the level of benefits paid to people in need.

I believe it was Mr Ward who was talking about the actual restructuring that is taking place. The comment around my workplace is that we are now no longer talking about the haves and the have-nots, but we are talking about a new category and that is the used-to-haves: "I used to have a job. I used to have a house." In many cases it is "I used to have a family" and "I used to have support." We really are seeing a very different sense of restructuring that is taking place right now, and without both financial and social supports there are an awful lot of people who are going to fall between the cracks.

The other part we have really begun to notice in terms of people who are in need of social supports is that in the early 1980s it really was to a large extent a blue collar recession. It was an industrial base that was eroded, again with high hopes that it would come back. We were talking about layoffs. We are now no longer talking about layoffs; we are talking about job loss, jobs that are not coming back. What we are beginning to find from people who are contacting us for assistance is that they had been until recently at least middle-income, middle-management men and women who had what they presumed to be safe, secure jobs or career paths that they were really looking at. It is a very different sense of the economy right now, and without the social and financial supports for these people we are dooming an even greater number of people.

The previous presenters were talking about the third quarter of this period, being the recession, seeing the upturn in the recession. We had been talking for a year and a half before everybody finally admitted that there was a recession, that we were in the midst of a recession. We do not see this recession ending for at least two years.

We tend to be at the cutting edge, for lack of a better phrase, of where the social supports are needed for both people on social assistance and the working poor. We tend to get the calls from people needing assistance. We were getting an awful lot of calls starting at the beginning of last year, and they really starting picking up probably in May and June of this past year. We do not see this relenting at all. Generally if there begins to be an upturn, we will see the demand for our services decreasing. In fact what we are seeing right now is an ever-increasing number.

I would also like, before passing it on, to just touch briefly on the issue of the minimum wage. No one, I do not think, in this room could argue that the minimum wage has not lost its purchasing power since the mid-1970s. During this period, the provincial workforce has increased and the economy has grown dramatically, but wage rates have ostensibly fallen. Currently the purchasing power of the minimum wage is approximately 80% of what it was in 1975. I think everybody is fully cognizant of the growth of the working poor in Ontario.

As the workforce has grown, so too has the percentage of absolute numbers of working people who constitute this new buzz-word of the late 1980s called the working poor. In the past few years the number of people requiring assistance who constitute the working poor has increased dramatically. We are now looking at approximately 18% of people who need assistance every month from emergency food programs across Metro Toronto, and we correlate across the province as well, who constitute people who are classified as the working poor.

The current government in both its Agenda for People platform and in its inaugural throne speech committed itself to increasing minimum wage rates to 60% of the average industrial wage. Just for those of you who do not have calculators, this would increase the minimum wage to roughly $7.25 a hour. Although we do not doubt the sincerity of the commitment, we and the people in Ontario who still have jobs and who are working at minimum wage really need to know the time line that this government is talking about for implementation. Is it within the upcoming budget so that people have hope in the short term or is it at the end of their term as a further election promise in which case they can anticipate another five years of poverty?

We are looking at this committee to recommend that these increases and the time line be spelled out very clearly.

Ms Knight: In the early 1980s the report Day Care Deadline was released. This deadline has since passed. Child care advocates, parents, child care workers, trade unionists, teachers' organizations, women's groups and others concerned about child care in Ontario have since undertaken a further review of the progress made towards any establishing of a universally accessible, publicly funded, high-quality, comprehensive, non-profit child care system in Ontario.

Despite increased government expenditures, there has been little improvement in the delivery or funding of child care in Ontario. In fact the situation has deteriorated for many children and care providers. Adjust Ontario support to the position that now is the time to put public non-profit child care services and their development on a sound footing. The following proposal is a framework for a new child care system in Ontario, a new decade for child care.

The key elements of this system will incorporate each child care program being fully funded by the provincial government and the provincial government will be entirely responsible for cost recovery through a separate administrative system. Another element is that the provincial system will be non-profit. Existing for-profit programs could become part of the provincial system by converting to non-profit status.

The provincial system will be comprehensive in that it will allow for a range of regulated services, including but not limited to full-day group care, private-home day care before- and after-school programs, parent-child resource centres and services for shift and seasonal workers.

The development of this system is a provincial responsibility. To achieve the goal of universality, targets and time lines will have to be planned and implemented provincially. Last but not least, local community planning services will be an integral and vital part of the development of these new services.

Funding of this system: Currently about 65%, or numbers 75,000, of the 117,000 licensed child care spaces are non-profit or publicly operated. At an average cost of $6,000 a space, the current full cost is estimated at $460 million. An additional $50 million is required for existing subsidies in the commercial sector. Current for-profit spaces receive fee-subsidized spaces. No new public unding should be available to commercial programs under the new system.

Additional costs of other child care in the 1990-91 budget, including services for physically and developmentally disabled children, parent resource centres, capital expenditures, pilot project, research and development, were allocated a further $60 million. Therefore the total cost assumption for stabilizing the current services is $560 million.

Several options, as estimated by the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care, can finance this restructured system. The province of Ontario should maximize recovery of the federal cost-sharing currently available through the Canada assistance plan, called CAP, by using maximum federal income eligibility guidelines for the purpose of determining reimbursement.

Using these criteria, it is assumed that the cost of care for 72% of children at an average of 70% of costs would be eligible for cost-sharing under CAP. In dollar figures, the cost-sharing for 75,000 non-profit spaces will be $227 million. In addition, the current subsidy to the commercial sector of $15 million brings the total to $277 million. The federal share of these costs would be 50% or $138.5 million.

To generate this reimbursement, Ontario would need to spend at least $138 million. Given that the Ontario budget of 1990 anticipated spending $257 million on child care, it seems reasonable to assume that this amount would still be the provincial contribution.

Added to this will be the revenue generated from parental contributions, calculated through a new Ontario child care contribution using an income-testing model, estimated at $150 million. The total anticipated revenue would be $545 million. Given these calculations, it only takes an additional commitment of $15 million to require the province to accomplish fundamental restructuring of child care in Ontario. We therefore request this committee to consider the following recommendations:

1. Fund 10,000 additional subsidized spaces and create 10,000 new spaces for non-profit and publicly operated services;
2. Implement and fund pay equity adjustments for all child care workers who have not found a remedy under the existing pay equity legislation on the same schedules as other public sector workers;
3. Take action to restructure the child care system as outlined by budgeting an additional $15 million to the $257-million commitment in the 1990 budget.

This is just a small investment for the big return of the future of Ontario: our children.

Ms Hayes: I would like to speak briefly to the issue of employment equity. It is clear that discrimination in employment denies women, persons with disabilities, visible minorities and aboriginal people the opportunity to compete fairly in the job market. Women continue to earn two thirds of men's wages, aboriginal people have twice the average unemployment rate and people with disabilities have unemployment rates as high as 80%.

It is the hope that this government is going to implement employment equity legislation. We ask that this committee recommend that in the budget there be money for an employment equity commissioner to institute an educational program so that employees and employers can learn about the issues of employment equity, and that will focus on guidelines to assist the process and the development of the employment equity plans of the government and to develop formulas to establish goals and timetables.

In addition, we ask that this committee see that policies are introduced that ensure accessibility for the disabled, especially in the distribution of the $700 million announced in the throne speech, that it be allocated to necessary maintenance and renovation of public sector facilities and that the distribution of all government grants for construction and renovation projects be considered.

That is basically our presentation this morning. Are there any questions?

Mr Stockwell: Basically pretty much everything you spoke to was dealt with in the Agenda for People, which is the policy statement that the government had during the election. Since they have been elected, they have been doing the backstroke with respect to introducing a lot of these programs and fulfilling a lot of their promises. They have given a lot of reasons and rationale as to why they cannot, including the recession and the debt. Are you buying into this, or are you telling us today that this government is obligated to fulfil An Agenda for People, to deal with a lot of the issues you are talking about today, regardless of the economic climate we are in right now?

Mr Yampolsky: I think from our presentation today it is very clear. I do not think you are wrong in terms of seeing some of the similarities between what the community has been calling for for the last seven to 10 years and An Agenda for People. By our presentation today, what we have said, and what I said very clearly around the minimum wage legislation that we are looking for, is we want the timetable.

We are saying the same thing around their commitments around child care. The government has committed itself to X number of spaces and we are saying, "Fine, let's see them." We also hold very clearly to the position that the recession is no excuse; that, if anything, the recession is really the critical time when social spending has to increase as there are more people in greater need.

Just as an aside, because I suppose either it will come up or it is at the back of a number of people's minds, there is the whole issue of the cost-sharing with the federal or provincial arrangements under Canada assistance transfer payments and the 5% ceiling or the cap on the Canada assistance plan that is affecting Ontario. I guess it is also critical to remind legislators that prior to the CAP arrangements with Ontario in the mid-1960s, Ontario paid 100% of costs.

I understand that there are political implications with Ontario spending what tends to be called 100% dollars as opposed to 50% dollars or 50-cent dollars, but it really is critical now, as we see food bank lines increase, as we see more and more people losing their homes. Really, it has reached the perverse stage where food banks and bailiffs are the only ones doing booming business.

Mr Stockwell: Surely the question, though, is in fact you see the backtracking taking place but you are going to hold firm to those promises that they made in the election. I do not agree with everything you say, but I agree with the fact that if someone makes a promise and produces a report like An Agenda for People, it is your job now to come forward and ensure that the government was not simply just making this up to get elected.

Mr Phillips: Just to follow up on that, because I am relatively sensitive to this, as you know, I was Minister of Labour and I had responsibility for the minimum wage. I do not know whether any of you were among the picketers who kind of went after me, sponsored by the Labour Council of Metropolitan Toronto.

I am quite sensitive about An Agenda for People because I think that is one of the bases on which the new government got elected and one of the bases on which we were defeated, in spite of the fact that the budget of the Ministry of Community and Social Services went up dramatically. I think it was up 20% this year. I think we put $500 million into implementing the Social Assistance Review Committee. But that was not, I think, fast enough.

I guess what you will have to count on us for is to monitor An Agenda for People. An Agenda for People did not say we are in a recession, so I do not think the new government can get off the hook on that. I gather the Treasurer is now saying he has a windfall—surprise, surprise—of $1 billion, which brings the revenue maybe—I do not know; we will know tomorrow—back up to what we thought it was. A $2.5-billion deficit is an unusual one because, as I say, it now looks like government revenues, in spite of the recession, are not going to be down the $1 billion that was predicted right after the election.

We will be watching An Agenda for People. I think the timetable was in there. On your minimum wage, the timetable was in the agenda. I think it was over four years. On the child care it is over two years. On the housing it is over two years. I think the new government will simply be monitored on the basis of An Agenda for People. I guess you are at a committee that can help you do that, in spite of the tough economic times.

Mr Yampolsky: With respect to the way it was laid out in the agenda, though, to state the minimum wage would be raised to 60% of the average industrial wage within four years does not help us because the whole lump sum can be done in the final period.

Mr Phillips: They would not do that.

Mr Yampolsky: It was two years?

Mr Phillips: It says over four years.

Mr Yampolsky: Yes. Minimum wage was over the course of four years. What we are really looking to, and I think what people in Ontario are really looking to, is the staging process of this. Is it going to be nickel-and-dimed? We saw with the last government—I think it was a 40-cent increase in one lump sum. Are we looking at those kind of increments? What are the incremental benefits for people who are earning minimum wage, and over what period of time can they really look to it? On the other side, I think employers have to know that.

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mr Yampolsky: I think it is critical in terms of a kind of economic planning, particularly for the small business sector that they are looking at, to know what kind of incremental costs they are going to have to look into.

Mr Phillips: Just for your information, I was the minister and I tried to move it up. The argument I got was that it would result in fewer jobs. That is why the old government took it up at the rate it did. I can recall—eyeball to eyeball with maybe one of you or not—the new government saying, “No, no, it should go up to 60% of the industrial wage.” I think the new minister has made an announcement in the House about it, so we will be watching that.

Mr B. Ward: I have two questions and I hope you can answer them to the best of your ability.

The first one is that during these tough economic times we have been getting a feeling from organizations which perhaps take a conservative look at things that in fact they are spending too much on social programs, that with the recession we should be cutting back our commitment to social programs because of the cost. There is a feeling among some individuals that people who are on social assistance, UI, or whatever the program is, could work if they wanted to. Could I get your answer to that? Should we be cutting back at this time, and if so, why, or if not, why not?

The second question concerns the minimum wage. The criticism about increasing the minimum wage is that it would be destroying our competitive balance in the global economy with our competing provinces or our southern neighbours. What answer do you have to that, that by increasing the minimum wage we will not be harming our ability to perform as an economy?

I guess I have one more question. There is what I call a conservative view that the Holy Grail is a triple-A credit rating as a province. Do you think we should be concentrating on that more than on having adequate social programs for the working people in this province during these tough economic times?

Could you just touch on those three areas so I am clear in my mind what your organization feels we should be doing during these tough economic times?

Mr Yampolsky: I will attempt to tackle the first and the third, the one around spending cuts and should we be cutting back, at the same time as dealing with the whole issue of a credit rating.

It is our really firm position that no, there should not be any cutbacks in social programs at this point in time—in fact, if anything, there should be dramatic increases. I think, from a purely economic perspective, if you look at a cost-benefits analysis of it, by cutting back on social assistance programs or any type of social program—and I leave the health out of social programs because it is its own entity at this point in time—by cutting back on social spending you will see, and I think we have begun to see, an increase in crime.

You will see an increase in health care costs being incurred. It is no mystery and no great surprise that poor people are more reliant on the health care system than middle and wealthier Ontarians. That is purely because people who are not in poverty can afford to live in safe and secure surroundings. They do not have to deal with cold-water flats, and yes, we still have cold-water flats in the 1990s. They can afford to feed themselves and their children properly, adequately and with nutritious food. They do not have to suffer, as we are seeing right now, an increase in the number of children who are suffering with tickets. That has not been seen pretty much since the post-war period, but there really is a dramatic increase.

They can, for the most part, afford to provide their children with breakfast so that their children can go to school and can succeed in terms of behavioural issues and behavioural problems. A longitudinal study was actually done in Boston. They correlated academic scores and school feeding programs or school breakfast programs and actually found the academic scores of the children who were having proper nutritious breakfasts went up on average 9.5%. So we are really looking at investing in both the current generation and in future generations of Ontario by increasing that.

We also have to look at the fact that by increasing income support programs, you really will see decreasing reliance on the health care system. It is our contention as well that as the recession deepens, there will be an increase in crime. There will be people who will be desperate to provide for both themselves and their families. I am not saying that that is why we are seeing such a dramatic increase, but I have no difficulty stating publicly that I think certain people turn to crime because they just cannot afford to pay for themselves or cannot afford to take care of themselves.

In terms of a credit rating, I do not think that an increase in social spending would really necessarily see a dramatic attack from Standard and Poor's and everybody else on our credit rating. I do not think one thing has anything to do with the other.

For me it relates as well to your question around the minimum wage, that by increasing the income of all Ontarians, both through minimum wage and income support programs, you also increase their ability to consume goods and services across the province. That also, to my mind, begins to put people back to work, because as demand for goods and services increases as people have income in their pockets, there is going to be the corresponding response from the other side, which is we are going to have to meet the supply based on the demand that is coming up. More and more people are going to be called back to work.

Mr B. Ward: If I can clarify, in your opinion, by increasing the minimum wage we would not experience job loss, but in fact we may experience job gain because of the—

Mr Yampolsky: Yes, provided we are not prepared, as certain governments have been and are prepared, to lose our entire industrial base within Ontario. If we are prepared to relinquish our industrial base and simply look at Ontario and particularly the greater Toronto area as being a service sector economy, then I do not know if I would stand this firm.

Mr Hansen: The question I want to ask is if it is possible, before we make our reply, that we get a photocopy of the written speeches that are there, because by the time Hansard comes out, after we write the report, it will be of little use to us.

Ms Hayes: We have a written brief.

Mr Hansen: Because I lost on some of the figures there as you were reading them out.

Ms Hayes: Yes, we have it all. Everything that we said is in writing and we will have that brief to you later on today or tomorrow.

Mr Hansen: Okay, that will be fine. Thank you.

Mr Yampolsky: The printer broke down.

Mrs Sullivan: I think that your intervention today was a useful one and I agree with my colleagues that new promises were made and a new government elected and I hope that you will hold them to those promises.

I want you to review some of the information that you provided relating to child care. Just as a preamble to my question, over the past five years we have seen about 200 to 225 million new provincial dollars going into child care for subsidized and new spaces, and Ontario in the last budget, I think, committed about $260 million to child care. With the request that you are making, I think that new spaces or subsidized spaces would add an additional $65 million, let alone whatever the additional costs are of operating spaces that exist, including the pay equity suggestions that you made.

Where I am having trouble following your argument is your suggestion that only 15 million new dollars would be required. It seems to me that you are underestimating the change in federal transfers through CAP. We understand that in this fiscal year there is going to be $310 million less coming from the feds for the CAP program and in the next fiscal year $510 million less.

As a consequence, the province's share to maintain and to add new spaces will have to go up. As you have indicated, at one time the province carried the whole load of child care. I am wondering if you are asking of the new government that despite what happens with federal transfers, the province take the load and provide those spaces with or without extra funding from the federal level.

Ms Knight: The new spaces are not in question. The new spaces were actually following through on the election promise and the number of spaces that had been requested before, phased in over so many years. That was the 20,000 new spaces.

The funding arrangements would occur within a restructuring of funding. The restructuring of funding would take away an administrative layer that now happens at the municipal level, which costs in some cases municipally—I know in Toronto—100% municipal dollars. The readjustment from needs testing to income testing would bring about additional revenue from parental fees. That is all worked out within a brief presented by the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care last fall and various meetings have been held to discuss where the restructuring and where the money would come from.

The capping of CAP, yes, has had a substantial effect on what moneys would be available in the future for child care, but we still see it as provincial leadership, especially within Ontario, where Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta are particularly affected, that some protest be made against capping CAP and that should come as a provincial initiative.

Mrs Sullivan: Of course, there already is a court case. That still does not answer the question, should Ontario then make up the extra funding requirements?

Ms Knight: Yes.

Mr Curling: As this government came into power to govern, I have become more sceptical about the fact that it can honour some of the promises or commitments, as it would call them, to bring about the programs that it wants. We all knew during the election that there was a recession on the way. But I also feel that not only governments have a responsibility to carry out changes, but also organizations like yourselves to deliver. Sometimes I am quite sceptical about organizations. Some of the organizations are delivering in this way, and I will be specific.

You spoke about co-ops being a very effective affordable housing program. Yes, I believe that too. I think that the concept is great. I just wondered too if you are looking at your programs and finding out who are the people who are in the co-ops. You talk about income tests and needs tests. It seems to me the complaints I get all the time—of course they have their own special lists, who gets into those co-ops, and if you look in there, there are quite a few people who can basically afford housing outside in the private market itself. The people who are in need, more so, do not get in.

The other part I would like to touch on—my colleague touched on the child care thing very eloquently, the concern that she has—is the part about employment equity. Again in that area, when those things come into place, whether it is affirmative action, whether it is pay equity or whether it is employment equity, the people whom the needs are addressed to are excluded.

As I hear you speak and as I hear government speak, it comes in this pecking order. It says, “Woman” and the call becomes woman and then it becomes a certain type of woman. Then it becomes disabled, then it becomes native. They become the people in discrimination, the people of a visible minority. Every time a program is started, then those have to wait back for those in need more. I think those who are for housing are going to have to stay back and wait a longer time for those in need, because the others will get in front.

Do organizations like yours see yourselves re-evaluating your process to find out—after the governments, whoever they are, put their programs in place—whether the real people who are in more dire need have access? You have that responsibility and I am hearing a sort of quiet, low protest—because the protest was pretty high the time of the Liberal government. I do not want to use the word “protest.” Are the words and the advocacy strong now as they were then?

Ms Hayes: With respect to non-profit housing, we are asking that 20,000 units of affordable non-profit housing be provided by the government over two years, including co-op, municipal non-profit and private non-profit.

We believe that co-op housing is in fact a very positive and good form of alternative housing for not just low-income people but also moderate-income people who cannot afford home ownership; that is, as we see a growing number of people in Ontario who cannot afford to buy a house but who want some form of security a co-op provides them.

There are certain politicians whom we see who have in fact occupied co-op units, who make a large amount of money, but statistics by the Co-operative Housing Federation of Canada have shown that they are a very small number of people who occupy co-ops. People who cannot afford to buy houses generally do. People who cannot afford that can live in co-ops.

Each co-op generally has 50% rent-geared-to-income units and 50% market units, and we believe that the government should be committed to providing a range of housing for all income levels, not just poor people, not just home owners, but all ranges. We believe that co-ops are a good, democratic form of non-profit housing.

Mr Curling: Fifty-fifty. Let's address that. You said 50%. You were asked the per cent that are rent-geared-to-income. Do you not think that should be considerably increased, to 80% rent-geared-to-income?

Ms Hayes: Well, I guess it does address the budgetary issue, because we strongly feel that co-ops should maintain the mix of incomes within their tenure for many different reasons because of the fact, as I just said, that a range of housing should be provided and the government should not just politically not think about those people who are not able to afford home ownership. We do not think that 50-50 is a skewed number.

Mr Yampolsky: Co-op housing is not designed to place the Ontario Housing Corp. It is not designed to be solely targeted, as it was early on throughout OHC, strictly at low-income people. I think some of the experiments with OHC—some of them very close to here, within spitting distance of this building—that were set up and targeted specifically at low-income individuals—we have seen some social implications of that.

I think when we turn around and look at other developments such as the one on the Esplanade, which has a mix of incomes, a multicultural mix that exists there—and I could speak best, I think, of the co-ops within Metro Toronto. When you look at the co-ops around the Christie and Dupont area—yes, some of them are targeted specifically at women, some are targeted at immigrants and refugees—they all have a mix of income levels. What that provides within a social context is the support for the people who might not necessarily have certain skills and ilities to work alongside on a day-to-day basis with other people.

To a certain extent, if I really wanted to sound incredibly paternalistic and patronizing, I could say the poor people were learning from the rich people. I would not say that, but by turning around and segregating all poor people into housing co-ops, you are going to create nothing but another awful lot of the ghettos that we saw develop through the housing corporations in the United States. I look to Buffalo for that example.

I just want to touch on your other issue, Mr Curling.

Ms Hayes: Let me just finish something on that topic.

Mr Yampolsky: Sure.

Ms Hayes: I just want to add one more thing on the co-op housing. As I mentioned, we all know that women make approximately two thirds of the wages men make. A single mother who may be making a living wage but not making poverty wages would have the opportunity to live in a co-op and share resources, as Richard was mentioning, and skills with others in order to improve her life. That is an example of people making just above a certain amount of income.

Mr Yampolsky: With regard to your other question, I used the term "the hierarchy of deservedness" when I was talking about social assistance, where we talked about disabled more than employables and children above all else. I think you are right in your concerns around women or disabled women or visible minority women coming before whomever and both the segregation that we make within various social issues as well the divisions that come from that.

I think our position has been very clear. It is that we oppose this hierarchy. If you are going to deal with an issue, then you have to deal with it. I think that the reason it is spelled out in very clear and concise language, be it aboriginal people, whomever, and various categories, is that these people more often than not are forgotten. They are not talked about explicitly.

What the community has done by adopting the language that it has is bring to the fore the explicit demonstration that these are the groups we are talking about. We are not talking about predominantly men. We are not talking about predominantly middle-income, middle-management, upper-management people. We are talking about people who have not been availed of a number of opportunities.

I can see you are pressed for time.

The Chair: Yes, I am going to have to cut you off. We are half an hour over already. If you would like to pursue your questions with the deputation in the hall, that would be acceptable.

I would like to thank you for your presentation today and I hope you will get that brief to us as quickly as possible, because we do need to see it.

Ms Hayes: May I make a small observation?

The Chair: Actually, no. I am sorry, but we have another deputation that has plane connections to make and we must move along. Thank you for coming.

ONTARIO BORDER COMMUNITIES TASK FORCE ON CROSS BORDER SHOPPING

Ms Logan: My name is Gail Logan. I am general manager of the Sault Ste Marie Chamber of Commerce and I am here today representing the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross Border Shopping. I would like to introduce the other representatives here at the table with me this morning. On my left is Rob Schihl, who is the president of Shop Ontario, Niagara. On my right is Bob Gale from Niagara Falls.

Before I start reviewing the brief, I would also like to recognize the other individuals and the communities who are here today regarding the issue of cross-border shopping: from St Catharines, Noel Buckley and Tony Commisso; from Niagara Falls, Glen Gandy; from Fort Erie, Glen Walker; from Windsor, Mark Jacques; from Sarnia, Mike Harold; from Cornwall, Mike Metcalfe. I would also like to recognize two individuals who are here in support this morning, Tony Martin, who is the provincial member of Parliament for Sault Ste Marie, and Steve Butland, who is the federal member of Parliament for Sault Ste Marie.

The Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross Border Shopping is very pleased to present this pre-budget submission to your committee on behalf of its member communities of Cornwall, Fort Erie, Niagara Falls, Kingston, Port Colborne, St Catharines, Sarnia, Sault Ste Marie, Thunder Bay, Welland and Windsor. Through its various affiliations, this task force represents over 6,700 businesses in Ontario and these businesses employ more than 175,000 people in the aforementioned communities. Our purpose here today is to share information and ideas with your committee in the hope that you will recommend fiscal policies that will benefit the provincial Treasury, Ontario's businesses, our communities and all residents of Ontario.

With the assistance and support of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology, small business Ontario branch, this important task force has been meeting regularly over the past year to discuss the common and growing issue associated with the anomalies that encourage Canadian shoppers and, in particular Ontario shoppers, to divert their business to United States border cities and which discourage US residents from spending in Canada and Ontario. We call this the cross-border shopping problem to reflect the two dimensions. It has been plaguing this province and our country since 1986.

The issue is larger than one single trade sector, community or government body. It impacts such diverse areas as retailing, tourism, manufacturing, agriculture, border communities, provincial and federal revenues. It is important to note that all of these players are implicated in both the causes of the problem and the potential solutions.

We feel that the cross-border shopping problem is a symptom of non-competitiveness, and improving competitiveness may well be the pervasive economic challenge for Canada, and in particular Ontario, through the 1990s. Any solutions to this problem will require the active involvement of all interested and affected parties to become a part of the competitive team.

There have been published reports indicating the traffic count of same-day visits to and from Ontario has gone from a net inflow in the second quarter of 1987 of 1.4 million people to a net outflow of 1.5 million people in the second quarter of 1990. This is addressed on appendix 2 included with the brief. In addition, the number of people making same-day trips to the United States from Ontario continued to increase by 30% in 1990, and we anticipate the same or an even higher increase for 1991.

Estimates of lost retail sales in Ontario for 1990 are as high as $600 million. This translates to approximately $50 million in lost sales tax revenue to this province. This is a major blow to our retail industry and imposes many negative side effects on government, business and our communities. These lost sales have and will continue to reduce and/or eliminate retail and service sector jobs in this province. The results are devastating, including tremendous business and personal hardship through bankruptcies, lost employment, lost taxation revenue, and it places an even greater strain on our social programs, which are currently operating beyond the maximum affordable level.

Recent expansion of retail shopping opportunities and also the establishment of new outlet malls in US border towns have increased the difficulties faced by Ontario businesses. A number of these new and/or expanded facilities have been specifically targeted to attract the Ontario consumer, for example, in Buffalo, Niagara Falls and Massena, New York. In addition, there has been a marked increase in the volume of advertising by US retailers and hospitality providers in Ontario advertising media. US shopping districts which were previously depressed are now doing a brisk business with the assistance of Ontario consumers.

Ontario consumers are making significant purchases in the US of gasoline and groceries, liquor, beer and cigarettes, along with big-ticket items such as automobiles and auto parts, boats, building supplies, clothing and linens—the list goes on. Border cities in Ontario are showing signs of depression, and retail stores and service sector businesses, along with supporting businesses, are closing at an alarming rate.

There has also been a sharp decline in US tourists visiting Ontario during the past two years. Many reasons have been cited by these visitors, including the high cost of gasoline, meals and beverages—all items which are subject to considerable taxes.

Traditionally, Ontario residents have shopped in the US for good bargains; however, until recently these purchases have been offset by Americans visiting the province. Trips by Ontario consumers have been considered very worthwhile because of the significantly lower price of gasoline in the United States and because provincial taxes are not collected on their purchases at border entry points. In addition, in many instances federal taxes and duties are waived on these purchases. The result is that Ontario businesses are placed at an extreme competitive disadvantage relative to their US counterparts and applicable tax revenues are not being realized by the province.

Recent studies in border communities have estimated that every $100,000 in lost revenue results in one lost job.

As an example, Sault Ste Marie's lost revenue of $1 million for 1990 as a result of cross-border shopping equal to a loss of over 1,000 jobs in our community.

The Ontario Chamber of Commerce adopted the following resolutions at its annual meeting in May 1990: "that legislation be implemented immediately to bring about the harmonization of the collection of the GST and provincial sales tax," and also "that the provincial government negotiate with the federal government the implementation of a cost-effective system to collect provincial sales tax on goods entering Ontario and declared at border crossing points."

With a harmonized tax collection system for PST and GST, the federal government would be responsible for collecting all provincial sales taxes along with the GST and any duties at all border entry points. Numerous and important benefits are associated with the harmonized tax collection system. The collection of PST would add significant revenues to the provincial Treasury and assist in reducing the enormous provincial deficit. Estimates on provincial taxes currently lost as a result of cross-border shopping could be as high as $115 million for 1991. Both levels of government would realize significant cost efficiencies through one administration and auditing system.

If consumers were required to pay all taxes and duties on declared goods entering Canada, then the cost difference between purchasing in the United States and Canada would be minimized. In addition, a single tax system would provide assistance to the business community through ease of collection and remittance to one agency, reducing their time spent and their administration costs.

The Ontario tourism industry would also receive a much-needed boost by offering refunds on both taxes to visitors before they leave the country. Tourists would simply present their sales receipts to the duty free shop at the point of departure and the provincial sales tax would be refunded along with the GST.

A harmonized PST and GST collection system would assist Ontario businesses in maintaining a competitive edge against their US counterparts during these very difficult economic times and ensure continued employment. Ontario residents in the retail and service sectors, along with increased provincial revenues. This recommendation puts all players in a win-win situation and provides a level playing field for Ontario business.

The Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping agrees wholeheartedly with the aforementioned Ontario chamber resolutions and we urge the committee to include these recommendations in the next provincial fiscal budget.

Regarding gasoline-tax-reduced zones, retail price differences in various border communities throughout Ontario appear to vary only by several pennies per litre. You will notice on page 4 we have included a breakdown of the average gasoline retail price per litre in Canadian dollars. The pump retail price in Ontario, approximately 57 cents in the US, 40 cents.

Border communities in Ontario have lost sales in excess of 295 million litres annually. This is alluded to in schedule 2 of the brief. By reducing gasoline taxes, a large percentage of that business can be recovered. This can be accomplished by reducing the taxes in zones starting immediately next to the US border, commencing with a 10-cents-per-litre reduction and then reducing the increments by 2 cents per litre as the distance from the border increases. This is outlined on schedule 1 of the brief.

I apologize for the numbers there. They were boxed.

The revenues lost on gasoline sales is quite significant, as outlined below. Total lost revenue is in the neighbourhood of $116 million-plus, and that relates to lost revenue for provincial taxes, federal taxes to dealers for refining and marketing.

On page 7 we have shown calculations for gasoline tax projected revenues with a reduction in tax. You will notice the 1990 gas sales in border communities of 664 million litres realized a revenue of in excess of $156 million in provincial and federal tax revenue. We have calculated a potential for 1991 gas sales in border communities of 959 million litres, totalling potential tax revenues of $167,825,000.

As you can see from the calculations above, a reduction in gasoline tax through a zoning formula will realize more taxation revenue for both the provincial and federal governments. In addition, it will assist border communities in addressing the cross-border shopping problem by correcting the major discrepancy in pricing which exists between Ontario and the US. It currently causes Ontario consumers to make significant purchases of gasoline outside of the country.

As mentioned earlier in this brief, the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross Border Shopping recognizes that action to tackle the challenges associated with the cross-border shopping problem requires the co-operative efforts of both the public and the private sectors.

The business community recognizes its role in addressing this complex problem and wishes to engage government support to address the issues under its control; that is, taxation. Individual communities and businesses in border communities have already adopted a number of business strategies to assist in addressing the cross-border shopping problem. Marketing initiatives, including training and retaining of retail and service staff to provide better customer service, more aggressive marketing campaigns targeted to the local shopper as well as the potential visitor, interest-free loans to consumers sponsored by business and lending institutions, cross-merchandising of products and services, special promotions, better exchange rates for US currency and other initiatives are currently under way or are soon to be implemented in border cities throughout Ontario.

The benefits associated with a change in the provincial government's fiscal policy are tremendous. The provincial Treasury would realize in excess of $115 million in tax revenue. That relates to provincial sales taxes, excise taxes, income taxes, etc., that would be recovered. Ontario businesses would continue to employ thousands of residents in the retail and service sectors and potential visitors would be more encouraged to take advantage of vacation experiences in our incredible province, Ontario.

Resolving the problem of cross-border shopping is critical to the province and this country, as many jobs and substantial revenues are at stake. Ontario businesses are and will continue to play their role and their part in the solution by improving customer service and competing more effectively. Government must also play its part with the introduction of more efficient and equitable fiscal policies.

The cross-border problem is a symptom of a serious competitiveness problem. However, it is only one of the many powerful forces operating in the same direction: the advent of free trade with the United States, the US-Canada-Mexico trade discussions, the coming of the common European market in 1992 and many other global political and economic changes. Canada, and particularly Ontario, cannot hope to ignore or escape these forces. The private and public sectors must participate in a common effort to boost competitiveness, and the time to build that team is now.

On behalf of the Ontario Border Communities Task Force on Cross Border Shopping, I would like to thank you for the opportunity to present our submission this morning. We would certainly be happy to answer any questions.

Mr B. Ward: I would like your comments on three issues. On the first issue, has the implementation by the federal Conservative government of the GST helped or hindered your particular retail sector in relation to the shoppers who are going to the US? The second question is, would a lower Canadian dollar assist your efforts? The third is, as far as enforcement of our borders to ensure that duties are collected is concerned, because it is federal jurisdiction, should that be looked at, strictly enforced duty collection, but then that creates problems because of increased lineups and the discomfort that causes to the consumer? Perhaps you could touch on those three issues—the GST, the high Canadian dollar and greater enforcement, whether you would see that as one avenue of helping or hindering you.

Ms Logan: You are talking about federal government fiscal policies in this regard.

Mr B. Ward: I just want to get your feeling on it.

Ms Logan: Regarding the federal government's GST, I think it is fair to say that the business community has had difficulty with implementing the GST and consumers are having difficulty with it, but they understand that it exists and that they are going to collect it. In terms of the cross-border shopping problem, it has created additional hardship for Ontario business because it encourages consumers to spend their dollars in the United States.

Federal government fiscal policy relative to the high Canadian dollar certainly would help.

Collection of duties and enforcement: We have a situation in Sault Ste Marie with our bridge. It is a two-lane bridge and we have a number of entrances into our community. If the federal government goes ahead with its Customs 2000 program and implements some of the changes to access into the country through express lanes, duty-free lanes, etc., that will certainly help avoid the problem of lineups when you are looking at enforcement or collection of duty.

Mr B. Ward: So you think that would help.

Ms Logan: Yes, we could be urging the federal government to implement that program.

Mr Sterling: I just wonder if your group is aware of the revolt that is going on in Ontario now. I am talking about the revolt that Bob Rae talked about that was going to take place, after he was elected as Premier, against the GST and whether or not Bob Rae is going to—

Mr Curling: A revolution.

Mr Sterling: —the revolution we are having here in Ontario that was led by Bob Rae, and whether or not the whole basis of his revolt seems to be that he is not going to harmonize the GST and the PST. I agree with you that I think the harmonization makes a lot of sense, but I am not certain that this government can give up the revolt that we have seen take place since September in terms of dealing with the GST. Excuse me for being a bit facetious about the whole thing.

I notice that in your brief you say that the federal government would be responsible for collecting the PST and the GST. Do you think it is reasonable that because half of the tax, roughly speaking, is going to be PST, that the provincial government should pay for half the collection?

Ms Logan: Our task force would certainly like to work with this committee and with the provincial government in coming up with the best system of collection. We certainly feel that harmonization would be the best system, but if there is another fairer and more equitable system that reduces cost, reduces time, we are certainly willing to discuss and come up with an alternative recommendation.

Mr Sterling: One of the problems that you face here in order to bring forward and take some action—it is very easy for any provincial government, as we did when we were there as Conservatives, as the Liberals did and no doubt the NDP is moving to it, to place all its problems on another level of government. One of the problems we have in this committee is that we can only make positive recommendations and get positive action if in fact the Treasurer of Ontario does some things that are within his own mandate to do.

In my view the carrot to the federal government would be, "Look, you are going to undertake this very unpopular task of collecting tax at the border." What government, what politician wants to be the tax collector? Nobody does. You have to be realistic in what all of this goes about. Therefore, I think that your brief would be very much stronger if you made recommendations that in fact the Treasurer of Ontario would be responsible for taking action for.

The harmonization is one thing, but the other part of the fact of the matter is that any government which implements a collection at the border is going to be very unpopular. There are a lot of consumers who like cross-border shopping, so why would the federal government, heading towards an election, consider angering these people who are coming across the border?

It is logical and it is reasonable, but it is akin to many of the other things that groups come in and talk about. I think it would be reasonable for the provincial government to provide half the collectors at the border. Why would they not have the provincial government people helping them out at the border collecting this tax? I think they would, in a lot of ways, save the federal government if we are willing, as a province, to take some leadership and responsibility for collecting this tax.

The other question I have is that I represent the riding of Carleton in eastern Ontario and my whole riding would be more than 50 kilometres from the border. There might be a small portion of it that could be within the other zone. How do I explain to my people in my riding, the 90,000 people whom I represent, that the people who are living closer to the border are not paying their fair share of taxes?

Ms Logan: Currently the residents of this province are subsidizing those who are going across the river and purchasing gasoline. We know from our Ernst and Young study in Sault Ste Marie that gasoline was the driver. That was the primary trigger for why people were going across the river and making these purchases. In addition to the gasoline they were purchasing other items. In a very pointed question to consumers, we asked them, "If gasoline were equally priced or more favourably priced, would you be shopping to the extent and the level you are?" Their response was no. They would prefer to shop, to spend the dollars in Ontario. Unfortunately they want to make the dollar go as far as they can and they have to spend it across the river.

Mr Sterling: I understand the problem, but I have a constituency to represent. They are not any more interested in paying taxes than the constituencies your group represents, which are all border towns. How do I explain to my people that you have a special break? I guess the answer would be in terms of an overall reduction in the amount of tax on each litre of gasoline so we could be competitive in that area. I think that would be a more reasonable response.

The 24 cents per gallon or per litre that we pay in Ontario: Can you answer how much of that is federal and how much is provincial?

Mr Gale: Currently we have the GST now, but 8 cents is excise tax, 11.3 cents is provincial tax and on top of that you have GST at 7%. You would take your whole sale cost. You would add 8.5 cents federal excise tax—

Mr Sterling: It is 24 cents basically that we are dealing with.

Mr Gale: Approximately.

Mr Sterling: You are saying that 11.3 cents of that is provincial.

Mr Gale: That is on no-lead gas.

Mr Sterling: I do not think a penny or two is going to make a difference.

Mr Gale: I agree.

Mr Sterling: The difference is 14 cents a litre, basically.

Mr Gale: The difference I tabulated last night at 6 o'clock. I am from the Niagara region. I am a retailer-wholesaler in the Niagara region and throughout Ontario. Taking a lot of facts into consideration, with the US dollar C$1.17, $1.21 is the best price that I know from people to be able to buy in Niagara Falls, New York, yesterday. Converting it all over—trust my figures, I hope—with the American tax, the difference in tax is 11.69 cents Canadian per litre.

If you take the cost in Niagara Falls—I am talking Niagara River border. I apologize for not being up to date in Michigan or taxes around there, but around the Niagara border right now, in Fort Erie it is about 53 cents retail price—54 cents in Niagara Falls. The difference right now with the American price at $1.21 works out to 37.8 cents a litre. That is in Canadian dollars, Canadian litres—37.8 cents if you go over the border. The difference, add on the 1.19 cents, brings you up to about 49 cents and change, 49 point some-odd cents. For the difference of five cents a litre there, people are not going to go over the river in droves.

I note that there is no doubt Canadian businesses are going to cut some of their profits on some of this, but the volumes have gone down so much in local things that the only way you can justify it is by increasing your price. Otherwise you close the stations.

Mr Sterling: Do you know, of the 10 cents of tax in the United States, how much of that is federal and state tax?

Mr Gale: I have it broken down here if you wish to write it down. This is US gallons. If you want all their taxes—

Mr Sterling: No, just the percentages. You have 10 cents per litre of tax in the US, in your brief on page 4. Is it nine and four or is it nine and one, or do you know?

Mr Gale: I only have what happened yesterday. I do not have that brief. I know federal excise tax in the United States—

Mr Sterling: Try and keep it as simple as possible.

Mr Gale: I cannot break it down. I have to talk US gallons; I am sorry.

Mr Sterling: It does not matter whether it is US gallons or not. How much is federal and how much is state?

Mr Gale: Okay, they have different taxes. Federal excise tax over there is 14.1 cents a US gallon. Everything else is state tax except for a superfund and tank-testing tax they have of 0.4 cents, approximately, a US gallon.

Mr Sterling: Forget that one. What is the total of the state tax?

Mr Gale: Approximately 14 cents.

Mr Sterling: So it is half and half, then?

Mr Gale: Approximately.

Mr Sterling: Okay. You mentioned that the cost of gas down in your area is 53 or 54 cents. The cost of gas in Ottawa is somewhere around 63 to 65 cents a litre. How do I go back to my people and explain that we are going to give a break to people who are paying 54 or 55 cents a litre? That is very difficult for me as a provincial politician.

Mr Gale: Will that affect them, though? You people in Ottawa, will that affect you? They are not near a border point so I do not think this will affect them at all.

Mr Sterling: They are paying 65 cents a litre in gasoline. The news that you would like the provincial Treasurer to come out with is that they are giving some kind of break to border towns. Their gas is going to go from 53 cents to 48 cents a litre.

Mr Gale: The bottom line on this, we propose, is that you will generate more tax dollars because of this. That is why we say it. So if you present it that way, I think they will understand it. If it does not do that, then I agree with you, we are totally wrong.

Mr Sterling: I think the other factor that you perhaps are—I think there is a good argument in what you are putting forward, but I think that most of the populated area of Ontario is within 200 kilometres of the border anyway, so therefore your argument may have more validity if in fact the population was spread farther north into the province.

I just would have a very difficult time supporting your proposal in my constituency and explaining to my constituents that the people down in that area are getting a break of five, six, seven cents a litre and the price was dropping from 53 or 54 cents a litre down to 45 or 48 and we were still expected to pay in my area, my 90,000 constituents, somewhere around 65 cents a litre.

Mr Gale: What we would hope for is the way it is explained, that it will generate more tax dollars. It will not affect them at all because it will generate more tax dollars. That is what we are hoping. We feel gas—

Mr Sterling: Would my 90,000 constituents get a check in the mail from the Ontario government?

One of the problems when you set up tax regimes which are not universal across the province of Ontario is that you get immediately the problem of people looking over your shoulder at what is happening in the other area. You get enough problems in this province by giving northern Ontario a special break on gasoline and licence fees and that kind of thing, but in general people will support that because of the great distances people in the north have to go and it affects relatively few people.

Anyway, I am interested in your proposal. I think, quite frankly, what we should do in Ontario and Canada is that both governments should reduce their gasoline tax to all of the people and get their revenue some other way.

Mr Sutherland: I am not from a border community. I am, I guess at the closest, an hour and a half away from Sarnia, but I am constantly amazed at how many people within my community make weekend shopping trips across into the United States, into Michigan, into New York.

I guess the question I want to ask very simply is, do you feel that many people in Ontario are no longer willing to pay the price of being Ontarians or being Canadians in the sense that in many ways some things are more expensive here because we have a much different value system of what we feel is important, that makes us different from the United States, makes us Ontarians, makes us Canadians, and the values we have placed on different things? Is it your sense that people are no longer willing to pay that price?

Ms Logan: I would not suggest that they are not willing to pay the price. I think we, as communities, and the government, etc. have to communicate to them what in fact they are paying for, where we are different in the kinds of things that we do have that are better here in Ontario or in Canada versus the United States.

You talk about weekend shopping trips. Weekend shopping trips in some cases will continue, depending on the area. We are talking primarily about the day-tripper or the same-day visitor who is going over, sometimes a couple of times a week, but at least on a weekly basis and making significant purchases. There is a difference between the vacation traveller and the same-day tripper.

Mr Sutherland: I guess I just want to clarify. I get the sense that there are more people, though, at least in my community, who are not going for strictly a vacation. The sole purpose of going away for the weekend is a full shopping trip, to load up as much as possible in that weekend to bring back. If they are able to avoid the duty, then they are doing great. I know the main impact is right on the border communities, but what I am trying to say is that I also think it is growing even in the interior of the province and that concerns me as well.

Mr Schihl: If I could just add to that point, I live in a community called Port Colborne. It is about a half-hour from Fort Erie. I did a quick survey check of all the banks and asked the question, "How much American money do you sell on a weekly average?" Out of the nine banks that we have in Port Colborne, every bank sold to the maximum that it could sell in American funds. So with a little, tiny community a half-hour from the border, we are talking of a very conservative figure of about $7 million leakage from that community. That is just the hard cash that is purchased. Let's not discount the travellers' cheques and use of credit cards, the amount of cash that is exchanged all over the border. So we have, yes, an awful lot of shopping going on.

A lot of the clerks told me that in dual-income families, where the husband and wife both have a paycheque, one cheque is devoted specifically to US funds. Many families in my surveys are saying they are saving upwards of $300 a month by shopping in the United States. It is difficult for us to sell them on the fact of shopping locally until we can get some of these items that have a lot of price differential, gasoline being one. We have to get rid of these loss leaders that are pulling our people across the border. We have to get more on an even playing field.

We address them on the social aspects of our country. The diehard cross-border shoppers do not really want to listen to that point. It is not low-income or middle-income families. We are seeing high union workers who can afford these products taking their paycheques across the border. So it is quite a mystery, quite an equation. We have identified specific things that we can change locally in our communities and some external things that we will need the government to help us with.

Mr Phillips: I sympathize very much. I think you are kind of on the leading edge of the challenge for the future and I think you have stated it well in your brief on page 1. You feel the cross-border shopping problem is a symptom of non-competitiveness and improving competitiveness. I think you are putting it into a broader context, but there is no doubt, in my experience, that you are facing a crisis. I think what you are recommending to us are kind of short-term solutions while the country and the province get some of the longer-term solutions. Our party just spent the weekend in Niagara Falls, Ontario, so I think we learned a first hand of some of the challenges.

First, I would not mind a comment on something that is not in your brief, a side issue and that is mail order, which may not impact on you, but I gather it is a big growing industry coming out of the US.

In your brief you say $600 million, which surprised me, how low it was, but I think you said $900 million when you were speaking. I was surprised it was only $600 million, because my impression is that it may be greater than that. Was it $900 million you said when you spoke?

Ms Logan: I thought it was $600 million.

Mr Phillips: Did you? Okay. In the brief it is $600 million; I thought it was $900 million.

Frankly, I do not know enough about the details of this to know to what extent this is an enforcement problem versus a kind of—you need some tax changes. You must assume more knowledge on our part, on my part, than you have. Could you just explain for us, if someone takes a day trip, which seems to be the major number, what are the legal requirements in terms of declaration and payment of duties and taxes?

Ms Logan: Day-trippers do not have exemption under federal law. They are required to declare the items that they are importing to the country. You must be out of the country for 48 hours before you receive a $100 exemption. From what we understand in talking to the federal government, depending on the situation going on at the border on any given day—the border has to deal with, of course, the customs and immigration issues, it has to deal with the duties issues, it has to deal with gun control, drug seizures, any number of other items besides people returning to the country with goods—there seems to be a level of tolerance in terms of goods that are coming back. Some days it may be $10, other days it could be $30 or $40. Again, from what we understand, it relates directly to what is going on at the border at that particular time.

Enforcement is part of it, but we have also talked about the necessary changes that have to happen with taxation. We have talked about the need for business to do its part in terms of marketing, customer service, etc. It is a problem that has to be tackled by all individuals involved. Our task force has had discussions with the federal government. We will be presenting this brief to the federal government as well and we will continue on all fronts. We hope to get everyone talking the same tune and work-g on this problem together, because that is the only way at it is going to be solved. There are roles for each one of the players to take.

Mr Phillips: I was surprised your brief did not talk about enforcement. My vision is that an awful lot of people in your jurisdiction, Niagara Falls, on Sunday morning buzz across and—

Mr Gale: I do not think we can complain, sir, about enforcement.

Mr Phillips: Enforcement is not a problem?

Mr Gale: I am not saying it is not a problem. It will always be a minor problem, just as there are problems in all industries. But it is not the one we are trying to tackle here.

Mr Phillips: So it is just basically your two recommendations are—

Mr Gale: It is easy to say we need more officers. Obviously, money has to pay for it. I think they are doing a fine job in what they are doing. They seem to be clamping down more. They have the computers in there now, I understand, and they have all systems there. Mind you, officers are not collecting provincial tax and that, but they have all the systems. But that is not what we are clamping down on now. That is something that I think is a minor problem compared to what we have come up with here.

Mr Phillips: Okay, good, so it is just the two, the provincial sales tax and some—

Ms Haeck: Relief on gasoline.

Mr Phillips: Temporary relief on gas?

Mr Gale: I am sorry to interrupt you there. Just to fill you in, in Quebec—I am not sure if it has been brought up—there is relief along the provincial borders there for a 10-kilometre distance up to 4.8 cents a litre, just to let you know.

A year ago, with the last government in, I sent a letter to Michael Wilson and Robert Nixon, both passing the buck to each other saying it is the other one's fault. But really I stressed on the provincial level because this was a provincial thing done by Quebec. I have understood through verbal communication that this is working. I understand it is a problem with enforcing and that is what Robert Nixon said, and it will be. There is nothing we can do. But I understand that people in Hull, Quebec, and other border points in Quebec located in that area still will buy their gas there.

Mind you, if you are going to Ottawa you will buy your gas there. It is cheaper. Just like here; if you are going to Buffalo, New York, anyway you are going to buy your gas. What we are trying to do is keep the people in here and not use gasoline as the reason they are going over to buy everything else. That is why we suggest the gradual system, so that somebody in Hamilton might say, "Okay, in Grimsby it might be a bit cheaper or in Sault Ste Marie." I do not know how you go in, but for one thing, we are trying to get the incentive away from them to say, "While we're there, we'll buy everything else."

Ms Haeck: I have had, in one sense, a bit of an advantage because I come from St Catharines. Mr Commisso, who is sitting in the audience, made this presentation to the St Catharines chamber of commerce.

If I may also raise the issue of dealing with the gasoline prices in the north; the opposition members here, during the legislative session we just came through, made the issue of the price of gas in the north a major issue for our government. I know our Energy minister is seriously working on this issue to address the issue of the price differential. I have to concur with Mr Sterling that obviously setting up any kind of system whereby it looks like a border community is reaping a massive benefit is not going to deal with even some members of the trucking industry who have to travel in the north. It is a concern for them to realize that the prices are different. I raise that with you as maybe a means of however we are going to be able to sell something like this, but the cost of gasoline really is a major concern for northerners.

Mr Gale: May I address that?

Ms Haeck: Sure.

Mr Gale: One of the problems I have here with the north and with the pricing, as you know, is that there used to be probably about 15 major oil companies 30 years ago. Now Petrocan has swallowed up Gulf, Esso, Texaco, whether good or bad. I think competition caused a lot of problems with pricing in the north. If you can bring gas with GST in at 47, 48 cents a litre over the Buffalo border that is selling for 60-some-odd cents in Ottawa and there are no other taxes to be paid along the way, somebody is making some money there.

Does competition bring it down? I do not know. That is not an issue to be discussed here. But I think there are a lot of problems with competition. Petrocan, Esso and Shell are the bosses in petroleum. I am not trying to get a petroleum pact here. I am an independent. But you know the chartered banks run the banks. The three big guys run the gasoline. I am not saying that you could not undercut them, but I have a chain of gas stations in the Niagara region. If Esso wanted to go in at 10 cents a litre for about a month, I would be out of business pretty quick.

Ms Haeck: The other question I have relates to a concern that you have not mentioned here but alluded to in some respects. A lot of the local farming community has come to visit me. I have obviously had opportunities to hear presentations from them in other arenas. They are very concerned about the effects of free trade, as well as the importation of food and the controls that are put on that, be it via the free trade agreement or the whole issue of grocery shopping. That, in many respects, is not addressed here, the kinds of controls that we can put on the importation of food into this country.

Mr Schihl: We have addressed the free trade agreement in another report to the federal Liberal task force on the economy. It was very brief and it just mentioned that perhaps in lieu of what is happening with this phenomenon of excessive cross-border shopping, perhaps the free trade agreement in areas of agriculture can be focused more upon in lieu of this, what is happening, and perhaps the free trade agreement could be looked at and adjusted in lieu of what we are seeing happening now. That is about all the study that we—

Ms Haeck: How do you even deal with the questions farmers are raising, that the foods they grow are controlled by, say, the pesticide usage and what have you and how-ever they may be sold in the stores? The food that is coming across the border either in large container trucks or in fact by individuals does not need any of those controls.

Mr Schihl: I am afraid you are out of my area of expertise as far as that sector is concerned.

The Chair: Can I interject at this point? The subcommittee has decided to bring to this committee a recommendation that we hold full hearings on the cross-border shopping at a future date. What we are looking for here at this point are specific recommendations that can be put to the Treasurer that would give him some guidance in the immediate budget. While all of these issues are extremely important, perhaps we could have those brought up at those future hearings that we do intend to have, provided the committee agrees to have them. So if I could just have the last question from Mr Hansen.

Mr Hansen: I am from the Niagara area; I know exactly what is going on. We touched on a few things, but one thing that I do not think came out is that Mr Sterling has to realize that in the area he lives in, if he is going to have tourists in the Ottawa-Carleton area, if we cannot get them across the border they are not going to be spending tourist dollars in Ottawa-Carleton. So it is very important that people are able to get in easily enough, not have to wait two hours to get across the bridge. The rumours are down in the States, "Don't go to Niagara Falls or Fort Erie because you'll never get across and you don't know what the price of gas is up there in Canada." What we are having is a ripple effect all the way through the States.

I think my friend Tony Martin, also from Sault Ste Marie, depends on tourist dollars. I think the tourist dollars in Niagara Falls are drying up. I have heard so many times that the people who come to the Canadian side from the American side fuel in the States, come over and look around but go back and eat and stay at a motel or a hotel in the United States. I think I would like you to comment on that. This is why I am sort of bringing it up, because I do not think the rest of the people of Ontario know the seriousness of the problem we have at border towns.

Mr Schihl: Yes, for the Niagara region, to speak on behalf of the Niagara region, we are heavily dependent upon tourism, the tourism dollar. It is, I believe, two thirds of our economy. We are seeing tourism happen, but really it is now growing stronger from Toronto to Buffalo with these cross flights, using the airport systems. We are seeing more and more weekend getaways of Toronto people to Buffalo and Buffalo people to Toronto. It is like leapfrogging over the Niagara region that needs those dollars.

We are not seeing the American licence plates. We are seeing them at border communities, maybe more in Fort Erie and Niagara Falls, but as we go just 20 minutes to areas of Welland, Port Colborne, St Catharines, we just do not see them. That has been brought up in many respects that they do fill up there, come over, maybe take a bit of scenic drive, but if it gets down to spending money they just hop back and spend their money in their own communities. The cost of meals, accommodation, liquor, cocktail and beer are a lot more expensive than what they are dealing with and they just do not see it as an appealing thing.

So the tourism industry is drying up. I have friends who have motels in Niagara Falls who are seeing these closures. We are seeing small businesses close. We are here to fairly cry out that the areas such as the Niagara region and many border communities need help. Jobs lost really mean reductions in the amount of income tax that the government can collect from people who have $50,000 jobs who lose those jobs because of plant closures and are then on the social system. The amount of income tax that can be reaped from that person has declined significantly and we are seeing many of these jobs being lost.

Mr Hansen: One final question, and I think it is important that we talk about tourist areas. Tourist areas have had Sunday shopping. What is going to happen to the area right around the falls? Let's say Welland is part of the area. What will happen if there is no Sunday shopping in the grocery area? Can you just give the committee an idea of what is and what is up and coming?

Mr Schihl: I am really not a retailer. I have been working in this position as a marketing person trying to make some sense out of what to market here. I am afraid I cannot make a statement on Sunday shopping. I know there is more and more of it happening in the United States, and I think there are more and more Canadian travelling across the border to take in some of these shopping excursions on Sundays.

I think for Canadian businessmen to survive into the 1990s, they will have to perhaps practise some methods of doing business that are disturbing to them. They have to adapt and change, and perhaps being agreeable to open up their doors on Sunday may be part of that.

Mr Phillips: That is up to the government.

Mr Schihl: Not unless the government approves it certainly.

Ms Logan: Just in closing, we really appreciate the opportunity to speak with you today and to bring you information on the seriousness of the cross-border shopping problem. We appreciate that you are going to form a subcommittee, if that is approved, to look into this closer. We would be very happy to provide input and be available as a resource to that committee. You can certainly contact myself or any other representatives from the Ontario Border Communities Task Force for that input.

The Chair: Thank you. I am sure we will be in touch and thank you for your presentation today.

The committee recessed at 1248.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1347 in committee room 2.

EDWARD KOLODZIE

The Vice-Chair: Would you like to start by introducing yourself?

Mr Kolodzie: My name is Ed Kolodzie. I am from the city of Oshawa. I am here as a private citizen. My credentials are varied. I am a professional engineer. I also act as a consultant to the Federal Business Development Bank in areas of small business. I lecture part-time at a couple of the colleges around and do some private consulting. I have also been offered a position as a professor in one of the community colleges in the greater Toronto area starting next fall. I am a former regional councillor of the Durham region. I sat on regional council for 10 years. My thrust on regional council was productivity improvement and cost reduction, and that is my thrust today.

I would like to start by quoting Bob Rae. Last Saturday he said: "The first phoney path to go down would be to respond to every crisis by simply throwing as much money as you can at it and saying, 'By God, we are really at it now.' That is not going to be the approach of our government." I was very delighted to hear that, because if he is not going to throw money at the problem, then he is going to solve the problem some other way, and I hope to present you with some ideas today.

I might mention that I spoke to this committee a year ago. I have brought my presentation from a year ago and the report of a year ago. There are only two common threads of the membership. All the membership has changed and just the two research officers are still here—maybe they can remember me—David and Anne. They are the only ones still here.

I also spoke to the cabinet about 15 years ago under the PC government, so this is the third time I have tried to get my message across, each one with a different party in power. I suggested quite strongly last year that they make some changes, and the changes have come about: We have a new government, so maybe somebody paid attention.

One of the major points—it is on the first page of that small handout—is that if you consider the career lifespan of a civil servant to be approximately 40 years, if you take increasing wages and benefits at about 6% and if you take the average salary of about $30,000 a year, the accumulated cost of each civil servant will be $5 million. That is the accumulated cost, because at 6% money doubles in 12 years. At 6% money doubles in 12 years. That is one of the first points I want to get across: At 6%, money doubles in 12 years. When I play the role of an academic, to get things across I usually say them three times to make sure it gets home. Some of this is explained in a number of published articles which I will hand out to you at the end. Conversely, if you eliminate a position, the savings are phenomenal; they are just phenomenal. You cannot deny those figures. I have used some very basic points.

So what do you do? You have to reduce the head count. You have to reduce staffing. You must do that if you want to control the deficit. It is that simple, reducing head count. How do you do it? There are some pretty drastic ways of doing it and there are some simple ways of doing it. The first thing I strongly recommend is that you put a freeze on all hiring for the next 12 months. Any new positions recommended, can them; if any people leave, do not replace them, and you get some control.

This can be done. When I was on city council in Oshawa, we did it for about five years. We brought our head count down about 10% while our productivity increased. I did some comparisons with other municipalities in the region and I found out that the town of Scugog was the most productive. They had the fewest civil servants per capita in the population. So that is one point: Put a freeze on hiring for the next 12 months.

You can do some retroactivity. You have done it with the landlords. So retroactively to 1 October 1990, use that as a staffing level. Maintain the staffing level of each ministry at the October 1990 levels; how many civil servants were on staff, not how many positions. That could be your target.

The next point: If you put similar ministries in groups of three or four, you can reallocate staff resources between the ministries. If somebody has a vacancy one place, it can perhaps be filled by somebody in another place who is not too busy. It is easy to be busy, but what do you accomplish? We can all be busy, but what do we accomplish?

The next one is a bit of a loaded one. Can you not put one elected person in charge to give the final authority to monitor staffing levels? Say, every Monday morning produce a report or tabulate a report, "This is the staffing level." Yes, you can. We did that at the city of Oshawa. We monitored every month. I wanted to put it in every week, but I was happy to get it in every month. There is a little objective every month to try to bring the staff down to certain levels.

You can also place similar action on the agencies that come for a handout. There are a lot of them. They are lining up behind me and before me. They want money. I have not come for money. I have come to help you control the deficit, to reduce the deficit, and that is different. My background is industrial engineering. I got a scholarship to a university in the States. I worked at General Motors; it provided me with a scholarship. I had some exposure to different professors, and at the age of 19, 20, they taught me certain things. I have been able to keep these in mind and try to get it across to the younger people. Why is that?

I will interject. I took this out of Saturday's Toronto Star. I will have to show this to you. These are the positions the civil servant bosses are asking to be filled right now. Some of the jobs titles are very creative. Why do they want these positions filled now? Very simple: to have a higher head count for the new budget year. These positions are on the books but they are not filled. They want to fill them by, I guess, 1 April. That is why you have to go back to 1 October with the staffing levels. Some of these positions are replacement, but I think a lot of them are newly created. They represent probably $1 million per year: $55,000, $58,000, $59,000, $56,000, $44,000, $55,000—all kinds of them.

In conjunction with that, remember I was saying you have to not only control the civil servants in the province, but you have to control the agencies where you are giving out the money. In the same paper, I took a list of all the agencies that depend on a handout, or part handout, from the provincial government. In Saturday's Toronto Star—these are the ones. I might have to stand on this chair. In Saturday's Toronto Star—

The Vice-Chair: Sir, could you get up to the mike? It is important that it is all recorded.

Mr Kolodzie: In Saturday's Toronto Star, there are about 40 positions representing another $1 million or $1.5 million per year—not a single position advertising for a productivity specialist. Nobody asking for an expert like me to control staffing levels. Why? Why? Why? Lack of knowledge. People do not know the principles.

Going down to the next point, if it is absolutely necessary to hire a person, as in an emergency—what is an emergency? You can create an emergency pretty quickly but, still, is it necessary? Somebody says, "Okay, we need a person because of this, this and this." Have the minister approve the position—the head honcho of the ministry, not the deputy but the minister. Then, if you really want to take it further, have this committee approve each position, the Vice-Chairman of this committee approve each position. That would give a lot of power to the elected people, and that is where the power should be.

As I said, I was on council for 10 years. I know what it is like. Regional council, for those who came in late.

That would change the tone. Then, if you work it properly, each position should be justified by work measurement techniques. They probably are not even practised around here. Just the one that shouts the loudest gets the position.

I400

Positions can be easily justified, but are they necessary? Ministries are advertising right now to fill positions. I gave you that big list of positions there. They are advertising now to fill them before the new budget year so staffing levels can be a higher base. It is done; I know it is done. Nobody is advertising for a productivity expert. Does anybody understand principles of work measurement, of productivity improvement? Not too many people around here do, because it is not practised.

What is productivity? What is work? Can you answer the question: Is it necessary? You can do a job very productively, but it is useless if nothing happens to the work. What is work simplification? It has been around for 60 years, five simple steps. What is efficiency? What is a job work standard? What is a good method? What about span of control? Do you understand what that means? What is a level of bureaucracy? Eliminate levels of bureaucracy; do not create them. Widen the span of control.

Bob Rae has a pretty wide span of control, 29 or 30 cabinet ministers, all reporting to him. Each cabinet minister has one deputy and the deputy has two assistants or three assistants and each assistant has one or two people. Those are extra layers of bureaucracy. Narrow spans of control. You can set an objective: span of control of every manager must be seven, eight or 10 and you can work towards that. As people retire or quit, then you reorganize or reallocate the people to reduce the number of bureaucracies. Remember, if you measure work, you will have less work to measure.

Those are my points. I hope you note a couple of questions. There are 40 articles in here elaborating on different points I have made, especially this one about how each civil servant is going to cost you $5 million—each one—in accumulated costs.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Curling, did you have a question?

Mr Curling: I did not have, but as I have been asked. You said the bureaucracy should be reduced. In reducing the bureaucracy, do you feel there are any programs that should be cut in the process?

Mr Kolodzie: No. You reduce bureaucracy; you do not have to even touch the program. You can still have the program. The bureaucracy that remains will be more efficient and they will be happier to have less time to complain.

Mr Sutherland: Your presentation is interesting. You talk about what you did at Oshawa but, with all due respect, I am just wondering if you have a full grasp of the size of the provincial government. Oshawa is one of—what?—over 800 municipalities in this province. For a government to be able to serve people and keep some degree of accountability—because, as you know, we transfer a lot of funds to different organizations, agencies, municipal organizations—for the public to have trust that we are keeping accountable unfortunately requires some bureaucracy and, unfortunately, sometimes that may seem extremely large.

There are a couple of questions I have. While you point out $5 million over his career for each civil servant, you are basing that on a 40-year career. You must realize that many people come and go and are not going to work a full 40 years, so it is not always the $5 million.

Mr Kolodzie: But the position is still there.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. I guess the other point I want to make on this issue is—sorry, I think you—

Mr Kolodzie: What is your question?

Mr Sutherland: I am getting to it. Sorry. I lost my question. Go on, and if I can remember—my apologies because I had several.

Mr Fletcher: I think you are proving his point, Kimble.

Mr Sutherland: Oh, I know. Your point about having one elected official to look after all the human resources.

Mr Kolodzie: Do I understand the size of bureaucracy?

Mr Sutherland: Yes.

Mr Kolodzie: Yes. It is about 80,000: tremendous potential for cost reduction, to wipe out the deficit, tremendous potential. How many hours of work do they work? How many weeks a year do they work? People want to feel they accomplish something every day. They are happier.

Mr Sutherland: I do not disagree with you about that. I remembered my question.

The Vice-Chair: One question.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. You made the point that there should be one elected official to look after that. As you know, we have a committee sitting next door, government agencies, that is responsible for how many appointments?

Mr Stockwell: Five thousand.

Mr Sutherland: Approximately 5,000.

Mr Kolodzie: One person to monitor.

Mr Sutherland: My point is that with 80,000 people—when you were in Oshawa, could you monitor half the population of the city of Oshawa?

Mr Kolodzie: It is how you organize, how you do it. You can do it. GM does it. They have 250,000 people and they are reducing their staffing levels and increasing productivity, in Oshawa, at least. They are producing twice as many vehicles with half the number of people.

The Vice-Chair: Okay. Thank you for your questions and thank you for your time in appearing before the committee. We will look at your major points and study them in committee.

Mr Kolodzie: I know what you will do with it.

The Vice-Chair: They all are important, sir.

Mr Kolodzie: I understand, but I had to come up and make my pitch. I hope something stuck with somebody.

ONTARIO SOCIAL ASSISTANCE REFORM COMMITTEE NETWORK

The Vice-Chair: Would the chairperson, Mr Hayday, come forward? You are from the Ontario Social Assistance Reform Committee Network.

Mr Hayday: Am I correct in assuming that the written copy of my brief has been circulated?

The Vice-Chair: It is on its way around.

Mr Hayday: Thank you. While I do not intend to read my presentation, I did want to provide you with another way of thinking about it, so the written version is maybe of some help. One never knows how these presentations fit for you as a piece, in terms of that which it follows and that which it precedes. I know you are facing a difficult time in terms of making some judicious recommendations about where to steer the budget for the province in a way that would be helpful over both the short term and the long term.

My specific interests have to do with those aspects of the budget which pertain to social assistance or, as it is more commonly known, the welfare system in the province of Ontario. Briefly, let me tell you that the Ontario Social Assistance Reform Committee Network is a coalition of organizations and individuals that came together as a follow-up to the release of the Transitions report, which was released under the chair of George Thomson and represented a review and a series of recommendations for an overhaul of the welfare system in the province.

There are a couple of interesting facts which I want to provide you with an overview of, just by way of setting the stage. Social assistance case loads in the province of Ontario have grown for 10 years. They began to grow significantly during the previous recession in the early 1980s, they continued to grow during seven years of record economic growth in the province and they have accelerated even more dramatically in the last nine months.

This forces us to look at some serious questions about whether or not we are developing systems that share both the economic wealth and the financial opportunity in the province in a way that is equitable, in a way that systemically makes sense. If we see case loads grow during recession and then we see case loads grow during boom times and then we see case loads continue to grow during recession again, it forces us to wonder about what our system is doing.

Certainly there are many complex factors, and I simply want to present some recommendations that pertain to a few of those complexities as we begin to try to unravel that problem. The Transitions report, which many of you, I suspect, have copies of, if not had an opportunity to read through at some level, runs some 700 pages. It has 274 recommendations and weighs about three pounds. It is hard to wrap your mind around something that is of that complexity, which only represents one aspect of Ontario's budget.

Briefly, that report spoke to three aspects that I would like to highlight. It spoke to eligibility, to adequacy and to opportunity: who is eligible for assistance in the province, how adequate is that level of assistance and what kind of opportunity is there in our safety net to help people rebound from a necessary period of time of support into something that is more mainstream, more helpful and more of a contributing factor to the economy of the province.

Now the Thomson report or Transitions, as it was known—a name we have protected—spoke significantly to that latter aspect. The system had to have opportunity. The first wave of reforms addressed some needed concerns in terms of eligibility and adequacy. But as a colleague of mine has pointed out, in some ways what we have done is created a waiting room that is larger, that is more comfortable, that can accommodate more people, but we have not built any exits out of the waiting room. We have not built opportunity mechanisms that help people move as they declare themselves off of the system and into some sense of reliance.

We know as a related topic from the findings of the Ontario Child Health Study that children who are living in families where there is a working parent, albeit a working-poor parent, have a much better life trajectory ahead of them than a child living in a welfare family when you hold the dollars exactly constant. The same amount of money gainfully earned as opposed to earned in a dependent manner leads to significantly different life chances for the children in terms of everything from school completion to psychiatric disorder. It is not just the level of income; it is the source of the income.

I think that has to create some sense of urgency as we plan for the economic recovery of the province and we look at the marginalization of something in the order of 13% of Ontario's children who are dependent upon a welfare system that does not have sufficient spring.

With that as an introduction, I would like to speak to what we propose would be some of the ideas we have which we think this committee could provide some support for and some leadership for in its deliberations. We have in our network activities forged some partnerships with private and public sectors, recognizing that no single sector has the solution. The public service, as I suppose you have just heard, does not hold the solution, nor does public spending on its own represent the total wealth of the province or the total sum of ideas for innovation in the province. We know that we need partnership and we have crafted some of those early examples which we think bear replication.

Let me set out in practical terms one more fact. In rounded dollars, a single parent who is dependent upon social assistance in the province will receive somewhere in the order of $15,000 a year, not counting other transfer payment services which they may need or avail themselves of. If, through a series of projects that help individuals join or rejoin the workforce, you have something as low as even a 20% or 30% success rate in terms of helping individuals move back into some kind of contributing labour force participation—it does not need to be an 80% success rate to be cost-effective. As low as a dedicated 20% to 30% success rate is a cost-effective system if those resources are devoted specifically to what we have described as an opportunity planning function. But if you do not plan the function, if you do not organize the resources to accomplish that, it is simply a pile of words to say that a 25% success rate would be cost-effective.

Some of the examples that we have begun to put together are on a project known as Upstart, which is, I guess, a play on the words "start up." Upstart is a joint venture involving two non-profit organizations, one public sector, one private sector, specifically set up to fast-track individuals from social assistance into jobs that have career options rather than what might be described as service sector jobs that are more closely related to minimum wage and not necessarily to real economic growth in the province.

That kind of project has an appeal for a number of the organizations we are working with that are forecasting a labour shortage in certain white collar positions. But the partnerships have not previously been forged. We would recommend that the Treasury monitor the success of that kind of project and in fact consider replicating it in other parts of the province.

We know that the success of projects such as Upstart depends on innovation as well as some serious addressing of the barriers to participation in the mainstream of society, a mainstream that requires adequate housing, adequate child care and an adequate sense of future. Some of the current barriers to that are conundrums which I suspect each of you individually would find some disbelief about if I could show you the detail.

I will not take your time to show you the detail now, I guess I will invoke some sense of trust about that, but suffice it to say that rental agreements within the Ontario Housing Corp represent myriad complexities and categories which someone with a university degree would find daunting to understand and to maintain some confidence that one's rent would not be jacked up within 60 days of taking gainful employment.

Although the letter of the law says that, the clawback regulations are so timed and so intrusive that there is a perception that if you declare income, nay, if you actively seek income, you will be pricing yourself out of a housing market. We think that the rest of the province is entitled to some kind of lease protection, if not three years, something less than that, but certainly something more than 60 days. 60-day leases do not inspire a lot of confidence in one's ability to afford housing in the province. That is one example.

A specific recommendation then is that we are suggesting that the OHC look at multi-year agreements. We know that there are some programs which have been declared announced by government in previous times, such as the supports to employment program, but we know that the actual spending of those dollars and the release of those dollars has been delayed while case workers scramble to deal with increased case loads and do not have a vision yet for what opportunity planning and employment planning might look like. We have allocated dollars but no mechanism through which to spend them, no promising options that are being pursued. It is an example of a solution whose time has come and needs to be put on the ground, needs to be put in motion.

Child care is another area where we know that the 30% of social assistance recipients who are single parents would benefit from some combination, some partnership in thinking about child care. Child care in the workplace will not be afforded by a fully funded provincial system. My colleagues with the Ontario Coalition for Better Child Care may not agree with me on that, but those who are trying to balance the books of the province know that we are going to need some creative partnerships in order to move forward on this.

I would ask the committee to consider what incentives there are for businesses of a medium or large nature, much less small businesses, to participate in the child care solution. Are there tax incentives? Are they sufficient? Clearly that is an area of recommendation that we would want you to extend your influence in.

Income tax thresholds is another area where there have been problems. As recently as two years ago, if you were dependent upon social assistance in the province and you began to move off of that system, your tax-back percentage was 80%. In fact, when you added in the costs of working, everything from transportation through to clothing, then we looked at a marginal tax raise that was actually punitive. For every dollar you earned, you were looking at losing something in the order of $1.05 beyond the first $150 of retained income. Now that has been changed in the last year to a 66% tax-back ratio.

I would urge the committee to examine those numbers carefully and wonder whether or not each of us would be motivated to work for a 66% tax ratio. Some of us may be that but I suspect not many, and I wonder about the equity and the sense of having a 66% clawback by way of helping someone move transitionally from social assistance to independence.

We know that opportunity planning has been attempted at least two jurisdictions—I am on page 5 if you are keeping score. The regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton has virtually unilaterally decided to take opportunity planning into its own hands and not wait for the province to take the lead in this area.

They are experimenting with the kind of idea which I suggested earlier in my presentation of reducing case loads for a certain number of the workers in income maintenance and actually asking, training, encouraging them to move to the employment planning, opportunity planning function so that they move out of the role of welfare police and income administrator and intake worker into someone who is actually helping someone address the individual barriers that are interfering with their life opportunity.

There is a sense to that we have found no argument with, but nor have we found adequate political or governmental support to take those kinds of risks. We think the time has never been better to test some of those entrepreneurial notions since we know that the other mechanisms are not working, certainly not sufficiently.

The province of Alberta has actually differentiated some of the functions within its income maintenance staff, and we think that this may be one of those times when Ontario does not have to lead the pack. It could actually examine another jurisdiction's activity and see if there are some opportunities to replicate that in this province.

We know that the Ministry of Community and Social Services should not be alone on this and we would recommend that third-party funding, transfer payment agency funding, dedicated funds related to opportunity planning, be considered. We think that separation of goals and third-party funding may provide you with some of the models that you need to do business differently and build some things back into the system.

We know that there are examples of programs, such as the Calmeadow Foundation, that have used the guaranteed loan program to stimulate small-business development among people who are dependent upon social assistance, people who would not normally qualify for a guaranteed loan in a bank because they have no equity. Their equity is their motivation, their interest in change, but not their property.

We think that the Calmeadow Foundation has had sufficient success that the province might consider a guaranteed loan fund for those high-risk applicants who in effect are borrowing against the province but without opportunity and may have innovative ideas that cannot be funded. We think that is another area that ought to be considered.

We know that there is also in British Columbia a healthy communities fund, which allows for the diversity of different neighbourhoods. Toronto is not like Kapuskasing nor is it like Windsor or Sault Ste Marie. Yet each community may craft a different solution and require access to some seed grant which would allow the kind of local community economic development that would benefit many of the people who will otherwise end up on social assistance rolls.

Similarly, the province yesterday announced through the ministers of Health, Education and Community and Social Services the start of a program called Better Beginnings, Better Futures. This is an integrated model of healthy child development where the child is seen in the context of the family in the context of the community.

There are no dollars allocated at this time to expand that program with a community economic development aspect, yet since these nine communities are all economically disadvantaged communities, this would be an example of where it would be sensible to top up a promising model and maximize the effect.

Lastly, I would recommend to the committee that a project such as the Ontario SARC Network deserves the kind of seed dollars that would be required to continue to craft these partnerships. We have seen encouraging innovation come out of this kind of partnership. It has been done on volunteer sweat thus far. That is not to say that volunteer component will not continue, but we think that it makes sense for the province to take some risks, especially during the times where our prospects are dim, and begin to come at some solutions from a different and perhaps more entrepreneurial manner.

Mr Curling: That was an excellent presentation, well thought out, and it seems to me you are quite up to date with many of the concerns. Not only did you bring your concerns forward but also some solutions as to how we can go about this.

I just want to ask a question. I know you have answered in regard to housing, when those tenants in Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority housing reach where they would no longer require subsidy that yes, they can gradually move out into the mainstream, but do you feel that a more aggressive approach would have to be used to get them out into that mainstream?

A lot of counselling has to be done because basically MTHA is like a nice safety net. It is a sort of comfort zone in case the salary goes down again. They will catch up because the waiting list is so long. We have seen three generations of people living in MTHA, so it is not doing the things that it should be doing, in other words, carrying them on to the mainstream. Do you think there should be a more forceful effort to get them out of MTHA into the mainstream?

Mr Hayday: We certainly think that the portability of a shelter subsidy has been a significant improvement in the social assistance system. Certainly it is a lot easier to make that portable than to make the housing stock portable.

I am not sure that the individuals I have worked with and I have met who are tenants in Metro Housing would choose to have that as a life address, but they are not aware that there will be sufficient transitional supports to enable a relatively safe transition to the private market. I am not sure that we have addressed that aspect of the system.

Mr Fletcher: Just on the child care issue, and I agree with you that we do need more child care spaces, but is it tax dollars that we should be throwing at the situation or tax incentives? Is it not like a catch-22 in trying to raise funds and yet giving them away when we cannot raise funds? Should not corporations or industry be encouraged, rather than through taxes, to set up day care centres at the workplace? There should be another way than just throwing the money at it. Maybe it is the climate that we have to set up. I have a problem with throwing money at some of these problems.

Mr Hayday: I would not be recommending throwing money at something.

Mr Fletcher: I know.

Mr Hayday: I think that it would need to be carefully thought out. I am sure you would agree with that. I think that there needs to be some balancing between the net benefit, from all three parties concerned—the province, the employer and the employee. If we can negotiate a scenario where there is a win-win-win, then I think that is worth looking at so that the incentive is balanced by opportunity for those individuals who may most need it, as well as some kind of guarantee of a career track rather than a burger-flipper job.

1430

Mr Fletcher: I understand.

Mrs Sullivan: I was quite interested in your report and it took me back to the days of the Social Assistance Review Committee report release, when we had the anomaly of social activist groups and Conrad Black standing together on platforms being in support of the report.

Like you, I absolutely 100% heartily agree with your recommendation relating to the income tax threshold. As you know, the previous government over a period of time indeed did lower those thresholds and I would hope that the next government will continue that initiative substantially. I think it was an important one.

I was quite interested in two things in your report that I am going to put together—the Upstart program, along with the STEP program. We have had some substantial testimony from three or four groups relating to the barriers that still exist as people enter the STEP program and they talked about them very practically, not only the change in social assistance dollars that come to them but, additionally, lack of support for things like clothing for the job or safety clothing if that is necessary, or for suits and ties if that is necessary, depending on what is happening. They have talked about this very much as a part of the financial need that has to be taken into account in bringing those programs in place.

How have you dealt with that in the Upstart program? Have you talked about it at all? Is that something that is on your agenda?

Mr Hayday: The Upstart program as it starts will very specifically be functioning in the downtown Toronto core, so there is one kind of job and one kind of thinking-through of what is required to support individual in that kind of sector.

This province is so diverse that I think one of the things we trip over is that before we put a change in place, it has to meet the test of lowest common denominator in every region of the province. We do not seem to build in the kind of regional discretion and entrepreneurial aspect that recognizes the many cultures, geographies and labour markets in the province. It seems to me that is the area of the STEP program, to vest more discretion at the level of the actual client-worker relationship so that those kinds of barriers do not require province-wide change.

We do not need to have regulations on safety boots for working in a computer centre in downtown Toronto but if we wait until we have all of those regulations thought through, the opportunity may have passed. Whereas if we vested the discretionary authority at the level of the worker, we would be following a trend which is emerging in the labour and corporate sectors in terms of quality circles, flatline structures. There is something we could learn from that in terms of vesting discretionary authority and we have not done it.

Mrs Sullivan: Is the opportunity planner the place to do that? This is very much a follow-up, because that means there has to be more money to go into that area.

Mr Hayday: It is a place where you might win and you have not done it yet. You have not done it substantially yet.

Mr B. Ward: On page 6, the provincial healthy communities fund that BC has implemented, your recommendation is that we follow suit on a similar program. I am not familiar with this concept. You really do not put a price tag to your recommendation. Do you envision that if this province agrees that this is a good concept to head into, the initial allowance should be the $750,000, or should it be more or less? Could you expand on this concept in greater detail than what is in the brief?

Mr Hayday: What underlies this fund is some research which is absolutely compelling now that says that our health status is more tied to our income than to the availability of health care and our life expectancy is equally tied to that. The Canadian Institute for Advanced Research has recently released a number of international comparisons which show that beyond dispute.

The healthy communities fund recognizes that and recognizes the need to invest in local community economic development and other alternatives. I would recommend that if the BC fund is seen as an initial pool to start from, then you adjust it on a per capita basis for Ontario rather than replicate the exact dollar figure. So assume that is the per capita figure and adjust for population.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate your very thoughtful comments. I guess over-arching this is kind of an assumption that the SARC report will proceed with the neovernment. Then you have got a number of more specific recommendations, I think, and one recommendation in there, on the over-arching one, is to make a strong commitment to the long-term reform. That is; as I said, the major recommendation, I think.

Just in terms of some of your specifics that I think are quite good—I will try to get all my questions out because I now you do not allow supplementaries.

Mr B. Ward: Just say “and.”

The Vice-Chair: We have half an hour.

Mr Phillips: I have one question on the health one—and I agree with you, by the way. We have all sorts of evidence that says that the major determinant is more poverty and income than the quality of ultimate care. But I thought the health innovation fund was something that could be used for that.

“And” the second question is just, I gather the funding for your organization expires soon, and there is a recommendation here to fund, but it is not clear what sort of funds you are talking about. The committee might like to be made aware of that, because I think the Fair Tax Commission, no doubt, will look at your recommendation on the income tax thing, but that may take two or three years. Do you have any cost estimates on your recommendation to move the income level up before one is taxed?

That is my one question with three parts.

Mr Hayday: We do not have the resources to calculate the net revenue loss with a threshold adjustment and would recommend that that be something that be undertaken by ministry staff, who have adequate resources. That is part one of my answer.

Part two of my answer is that the Premier's Council on Health Strategy, now known as the Premier's Council on Health, Wellbeing and Social Justice, may well be a vehicle through which to fund some of these innovations, but expert reviewers are more likely to recommend that we try something which has worked than that we try something which shows promise. Since we do not have many markers to point to and say, “Well, this works and this works and this works,” we may have to take some risks with the fund, and it would be useful to have that will expressed by this committee, that some of these risks be taken with those seed dollars.

Mr Phillips: That is a fund that is available but that you think you may have difficulty accessing currently.

Mr Hayday: I think that we have not fully understood the link between social determinants and health status previously and that it would be important that we underline that point. That has been a problem previously. That is one of the reasons why we continue to run out of funding.

The Laidlaw Foundation has allocated over the last three years anywhere from $125,000 to $250,000 per year for a range of activities. It has decided, I think, that it wants some partners. It does not want to be the only organization that is looking at the long-term economic recovery in the province.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, and thank you for appearing.

TORONTO HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION

The Vice-Chair: Mr Keenan, would you introduce your colleague and the group that you represent, please.

Mr Keenan: Thank you, Mr Chairman, and good afternoon, ladies and gentlemen. As the Chairman mentioned, my name is David Keenan and I am president of the Toronto Home Builders' Association. To my left is Stephen Dupuis, who is vice-president of government relations of our association. I wish to express our thanks for your inviting us here today.

The opportunity to present our recommendations with respect to the upcoming provincial budget is one that we spent quite a bit of time to investigate and analyse and determine a course of action. Over the next half-hour we would like to accomplish basically three objectives: first, to detail the economic impact of the residential construction industry; second, to describe the current oppressed state of the industry, and third, to put forward the Toronto Home Builders' Association's recommendations with respect to the upcoming provincial budget. At the conclusion of our presentation we would be pleased to take any questions which you might have.

First, I would like to deal now with the economic impact. The residential construction industry is the largest industry in Canada. In 1989, spending on new residential construction totalled over $24 billion. Renovation spending totalled almost $19 billion. The $43 billion spent on housing generated over 400,000 person-years of construction employment. For every one of those 400,000 construction jobs created by home building and renovation, more than two spinoff jobs were created in the manufacturing, trade and service sectors.

Focusing on the greater Toronto area for a moment, spending on new residential construction alone totalled $5 billion in 1989 and provided some 40,000 construction jobs. When indirect employment is taken into account and the renovation sector is added in, the residential construction sector emerges as the dominant source of employment and growth in the greater Toronto area.

The state of the industry: The residential construction industry in the greater Toronto area has been in a state of recession since the spring of 1989. We have prepared for you a special report on the state of the industry and I would like to highlight for you some of our findings. In 1990 sales by Toronto Home Builders' Association members were the worst on record. Sales totalled approximately 8,000 units, down from approximately 18,000 units that took place in 1989 and 36,000 units that took place in 1988. In 1982, as a benchmark or a reference point, and that is the low point of the last recession, just over 12,000 new homes were sold. Interestingly enough, our record in this downturn is below what we saw in 1982.

Sales-in-hand figures indicate that the first half of 1991 will be a write-off. A survey of 15 builders reported 757 sales in hand for the start of 1991, compared to 4,698 in 1990, an 84% decrease. It is an indication of where the industry is going in the current year.

For every 100 construction workers on the job in June 1989 there were 43 on the job in June 1990, a year after, and 29 on the job in November 1990. Based on sales-in-hand data and estimates from the trade, it is expected that only 15 of those 100 workers will be on the job by March 1991, just two months away. A survey of 17 municipalities in the greater Toronto area shows that the value of residential building permits issued in 1990 dropped by over $2 billion, or 46%, compared to the activity in 1989.

The largest industry in Ontario is currently firing on one, maybe two, cylinders. Many manufacturers and trades are trying to come to grips with the unbelievable devastation in the industry. Example: A gentleman by the name of Primo Fantin, a Mississauga carpentry contractor is perhaps a typical reaction that we see. In an interview in the Toronto Star last Saturday he told of how his company has dwindled from 80 people before the recession down to four today.

"I had to lay off 20 men," according to Mr Fantin, "before Christmas, many of them employed with us for 20 years. That was the worst part. It was just terrible."

Apart from the human costs of the widespread unemployment, all levels of government are feeling the effects of the downturn.

The municipalities are feeling the pinch as they wrestle with the difficult choice between increasing taxes or cutting services to compensate for the loss of revenue from levies and building permit fees.

The province is feeling the effect as its deficit continues to grow, largely as a result of overly optimistic projections of housing starts. In the spring provincial budget, the former Treasurer brought in a balanced budget based on 80,000 housing starts. Actual housing starts, however, came in at below 63,000 units.

The federal government is also experiencing revenue shortfalls, coupled with increased unemployment insurance costs as the industry's payroll is being transferred to Ottawa. The province and municipalities will soon begin to feel the secondary impact of these workers as they exhaust their unemployment insurance benefits and begin to draw social assistance.

Our greatest concern, however, is a serious loss of industry capacity which is currently taking place. Manufacturing capacity is shrinking rapidly and we are losing skilled workers to other industries and other provinces. When demand recovers, this capacity will be extremely difficult to regain and will inevitably lead to a serious escalation in prices, similar to that following the 1981-82 recession.

The current level of sales is well below the number of units required to accommodate future growth in the Toronto area. Our market analysis projects an average annual demand of some 22,000 new housing units in the Toronto census metropolitan area in the 1991 to 1996 period, almost three times the current level of sales. We believe these projections to be conservative, based on the fact that they were generated prior to Minister of Employment and Immigration Barbara McDougall's announcement of substantial increases in immigration levels.

Our recommendations: We must face up to the fact that we have a crisis situation on our hands. I believe that we can no longer sit back and wait for the situation to pass. The time has come to take proactive measures and leadership measures to ensure economic recovery. The association's recommendations with respect to the 1991 provincial budget are designed with one objective in mind—to restore the self-esteem of the thousands of unemployed construction workers by getting them back on the job.

In order to kickstart the residential construction industry, we believe that the upcoming provincial budget should focus on the creation of jobs through a massive commitment to infrastructure, increased non-profit housing allocations and the adoption of the Toronto Home Builders Association's Let's Build Ontario program for first-time home buyers.

I want to address infrastructure funding, if I may. The recent speech from the throne included a $700-million commitment to infrastructure funding. We believe that this is an important step in the right direction. However, in view of the seriousness of the current situation, we recommend that the upcoming provincial budget double this commitment as a minimum.

Investment in infrastructure should not be looked upon solely as a short-term solution to the current high levels of unemployment but as a means of addressing the substantial infrastructure deficit which currently exists, as well as the inevitable demand for new infrastructure that is necessitated by growth.

The long-term impact of ignoring the infrastructure problem will be a continuation of the boom-bust housing cycle. One of the primary causes of the high land costs in the greater Toronto area has been the lack of serviced land. The Greater Toronto Area Urban Structure Concepts study has found that the capital costs of supporting growth in the GTA over the next 30 years will be approximately $7 billion. This represents a 42% increase in average annual expenditures over the recent levels that were established.

There is also obviously a strong link between a well-maintained infrastructure and the environment. The Ontario Sewer and Watermain Contractors Association has warned that Ontario's water and sewer systems are facing a crisis which could cause long-term environmental damage. The association has found that Ontario's water and sewer systems are approaching an advanced age, with some components actually older than Confederation. They have estimated the replacement value of the current water and sewer systems at $50 billion and recommended that an additional $300 million should be spent annually to maintain an adequate system.

Investing in infrastructure is a win-win situation. From the provincial perspective, the government will benefit from increased revenues, from income and sales taxes as well as decreased social assistance costs. Investing in infrastructure will also ensure orderly growth and stronger environmental protection. The building of infrastructure at this time will also be extremely cost-effective as a result of the intensive competition for contracts.

From an industry perspective, an investment in infrastructure will generate much needed employment and go a long way towards evening out the boom-and-slump housing cycle which is so disruptive to our workers and to our businesses.

Non-profit housing: the Toronto Home Builders' Association recognizes the importance of non-profit housing in the continuum of housing supply. We wholeheartedly support Minister of Housing David Cooke's decision to extend the Homes Now deadline. This change will keep alive any projects which could come on stream fairly quickly while approvals are being gathered.

The association also supports increases in non-profit housing allocations at this time. The construction of non-profit housing will generate sufficient employment in the manufacturing sector and among the construction trades. It also makes a great deal of sense to build non-profit housing during the countercycle to the market, when it is possible to supply as much as 25% more units for the same money because of the competitive nature of the contracts.

While we are supportive of increasing non-profit housing allocations, we are concerned with the levels of allocations which are currently being proposed, that is, the 0,000-unit figure. We believe there must be a much healthier balance between the non-profit sector and market sector.

As an industry, our goal is to capture as large a share of the affordable housing market as possible. If we can address this market as an industry, substantial government resources will be freed up to pursue other important goals in its agenda.

In order to achieve this goal, we must work with our members to ensure that they target to the 30th income percentile, not the 60th—that is, of the income strata. However, we will also need the co-operation of the province and municipalities in terms of infrastructure funding, streamlining the development approvals process, reviewing developments standards and, most important, challenging the "not in my backyard" syndrome out there, particularly in the current year with the upcoming municipal elections. I am getting sick and tired of it: Every time I try to bring a project forward, they say, "We can't do it, because we're going to face an election in the next six to eight months."

Let's Build Ontario: We would also like to put before you today a program which would stimulate employment in the construction industry through the provision of affordable housing for first-time buyers. We have called the program Let's Build Ontario. It would involve co-operation between government, the industry, mortgage insurers and mortgage lenders. The way in which Let's Build Ontario would work is as follows:

First-time home buyers would be able to purchase new homes with a 5% down payment. The province, through the Ontario Mortgage Corp, would provide 5% or more second mortgages at no or low interest rates. CMHC or the Mortgage Insurance Co of Canada would provide mortgage insurance. The financial community would provide 90% first mortgage financing. We, the builders, would provide job-loss insurance to the purchasers.

Programs like that were initiated back in the late 1940s and the 1950s, and I am sure many of the parents of us here today were able to get their first house through programs that were initiated at that time.

We believe there are many consumers out there who would love to take advantage of the many new-home values which builders are offering. Unfortunately, the tremendous lack of consumer confidence which has resulted from the recession, fear of job loss, the goods and services tax, the Gulf war, etc, has paralysed the consumer's will to purchase.

By joining us in the Let's Build Ontario program the province would send a strong signal to the public that it has confidence in this economy, in the province of Ontario. By supporting Let's Build Ontario, the province would also be acknowledging the strategic importance of the residential construction industry and would raise the spirits of thousands of unemployed construction workers.

The province of Quebec recently recognized the importance of a healthy housing industry by allocating $170 million over four years to encourage first-time buyers to buy new homes. Quebecers who buy new homes until 30 September this year will have a choice of a guaranteed mortgage rate of 8.5% for three years or a subsidy equivalent to 4.5% of the purchase price to a maximum of $5,000.

Interestingly enough, the President of the United States, in his state of the union address last night, also mentioned housing and the importance of providing housing for first-time buyers to stimulate the economy south of the border.

The provincial role in this program would be to make available a pool of mortgage funds which will be recovered as the mortgages are paid off or as the units are sold. The small per-unit investment by the government will be returned several times over in jobs and revenue. By bringing forward some of the pent-up demand for new housing, this program will also militate against the rapid price increases which followed the last recession. Across Ontario, we believe that up to 10,000 units could be sold through this program.

We have been careful not to suggest expensive tax deductions or direct grants to home purchasers, as we do not wish to exacerbate the government's current fiscal position. We are also recommending that this program be limited in duration. In light of the massive unemployment and the loss of industry capacity, however, we believe that the Let's Build Ontario program is necessary at this time.

In conclusion, our message to you can be summed up in three words: jobs, jobs and jobs. In the upcoming provincial budget, we urge you to take job creation to the top of the provincial priority list, particularly through increases in infrastructure funding, more non-profit co-op housing allocations, and by joining with us in the Let's Build Ontario program.

On behalf of the members of the Toronto Home Builders' Association, I would like to thank you, the members of this committee, for your attention. I would be pleased to answer any questions if you do have any.

Mr Fletcher: Your comments are well appreciated, especially about the municipal governments right now. I agree with a lot of what you are saying, but you do know the economic climate right now: There is not a heck of a lot of money to throw around. I do not mean throw around literally; I mean to pump into the system. We have pumped $700 million in. To double it—we do not have the money and we cannot just keep throwing money at some of the situations. You do realize that I do sympathize with you.

Here is my question. This morning I thought I had heard about a bit of a recovery in the real estate market. I know you are not in real estate, but I think I did hear this morning on the news that there is a bit of movement now in the real estate market. Did you hear that?

Mr Keenan: I am not aware of a particular press release or article on that. But in a meeting I had today at noon with our sales and marketing council, the report I got back is that there are a lot of people coming to the sales offices. They are kicking tires, to use the analogy, but they are not committing to a purchase contract, not because of the war but particularly because of the uncertainty about their jobs in the future.

Mr Phillips: I am trying to get one question in. When the Ontario home builders were here—Steve, were you not with them?

Mr Dupuis: Hi.

Mr Phillips: I can remember their brief, given the committee's recommendation in terms of the debt and deficit, being quite worried about that. But your recommendation calls for doubling the $700 million to $1.4 billion, and another $300 million for sewers and water mains, and another unspecified commitment on mortgages. It is one of the challenges the private sector has always had, that when the going gets tough priorities change a little.

I have really two questions: One is that I think your advice to us is that this is not the time to worry about the deficit and that we should be looking at these numbers. Second, I am always curious about how that 25% reduction in cost for non-profit construction takes place. Is that because people are prepared to build at a loss, or is it that all the profit goes out of it? How can it drop that much in that short a time?

Mr Keenan: I see two parts to the question. Let me refer first to the last part, that is, the 25% reduction.

I can refer you to a business school. Whether it is the University of Western Ontario, the University of Toronto, any of the business schools will tell you that the essential to survival in a recession is cash flow; not profits but cash flow. So a contractor today would scramble to the best of his ability to link up a contract in order for that contract to generate cash flow so he can make his debt commitments. If it means no margin or a minimum of margin or taking a loss, he is prepared to do it in order to get him through the business.

The second part: In the last two weeks I have been approached by two contractors who have been in business for over 20 years. They sat down in my office with tears in their eyes in concern that they were going to lose their businesses. They have gone from labour forces of 15 down to just the family that is running the business and saying, "How can we survive?" What they are looking for is any type of business at all that a framing contractor or forming contractor can get his hands on in order to give him some cash flow to make that commitment at the end of the month. In the meantime, he has mortgaged his house to the hilt to free up some cash in order to make these commitments. That is how serious it is.

Mrs Sullivan: I am very interested in your recommendation relating to infrastructure and the figure you use of $300 million. I think in this year's budget there is about $250 million already committed for sewer and water construction, and in this budget there was a proposal for water and sewage corporation, which would lever up a lot more money. I think it would be beneficial and the Treasurer might want to take note of that.

I wanted to specifically talk to you about your proposal for Let's Build Ontario. You are talking about 10,000 units. Would you have a limit on the market price of units that would be eligible for participation in the program?

Mr Keenan: Yes, we are working within the affordable housing guidelines as set by the previous government of $160,000.

Mrs Sullivan: When you are looking at that, one of the things that occurs to me is what happened in Burlington, my community, where, for instance, a builder was able to build affordable units at really the high part of the market, and when the municipality refused to allow the next development at that same price range to come on stream, all of a sudden those units became non-affordable again. What kind of protection can you see being built into a program like this? That is one part of the question. The other part is: What do you think the commitment has to be? Are you talking about, through the Ontario Mortgage Corp, a commitment comparable to that in Quebec of $170 million or $170 million? What dollar figure do you see the Treasurer putting into the budget?

Mr Keenan: We talk about 10,000 units as a target figure. Whether we have sufficient lands serviced and ready to go—we are not quite sure whether in fact that target can be reached. Consequently, the provincial commitment of funds would have to be determined on our assessment of how many units we can actually bring to the marketplace in the next three months.

In the mortgage business, it is perhaps setting aside $175 million, but it is not money that is spent, it is money that is invested with a return potential. That is what I want to emphasize here. It is how you look at it. It is not money being given away, it is money being invested in families invested in housing.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Curling.

Mrs Sullivan: Excuse me, but I want to go on. You are talking about investing in the next three months. The budget will not be out until May.

The Vice-Chair: It is just that we are short of time and we have quite a few on the list. It is half an hour unless this committee wants to authorize me for one hour for each of the rest. I have no problem.

Mr Curling: Because of the time, I will go straight to your question. I think this presentation is a very good one and I commend you for it. The problem I have with this, though, is that you emphasize new homes. I would have liked to see the home builders' association coming in more to talk about things like rezoning, basement apartments being fixed up, because the industry there was quite vibrant. You had good sales in 1988 of new homes, and many people who bought starter homes could have easily put basement apartments in, so I know we run into the rezoning aspect of it.

Home repairs is a big industry. I think they need that kind of support, because the industry itself is not only limited to new homes. Sometimes when I see the housing industry, it reminds me of the car industry, which tells you that you must change your car after two years or three years or it is obsolete. New home buyers and what have you, starter homes, all those types of things throw it in a situation where it is a disposable kind of society itself; no expansion and all that. Was there a deliberate process on your part not to mention more about that part of the industry, about basement apartment improvements and home repairs?

Mr Keenan: It is a very good question. I would like to point out two parts to it. First, the renovators' council of the Toronto Home Builders' Association is a very active committee, focusing essentially on existing stock. They are growing in numbers, and also with respect to a code of ethics under which they will work in order to provide consumer protection. They are part of these numbers. In other words, they are part of the economic impact.

Similarly, it is a question of jobs. More jobs are created and retained in the new home sector than in the rehabilitation or the renovation sector. That is why the focus has really been, as I mentioned earlier, on jobs. It is the new home sector that generates the majority of the jobs.

Mr Sutherland: I thought there were a couple of interesting points you made in here. We have had the banks in and we have had other forecasting groups in predicting that we're going to recover in the third quarter of this year. I was quite interested in the note you made about the loss of manufacturing jobs, the loss of skilled people. It seemed to me there was some sense that you felt that you were expressing that there was not as strong an ability to recover this time around because we have lost a lot of those manufacturing jobs and a lot of those people out of the province. One, am I correct in what I am gathering out of that, and two, if that is the case, do you see us recovering in the third quarter of this year, in general and specifically in your industry?

Mr Keenan: I think the committee is asking a lot of very good questions. Answering this one, obviously there are two parts. The first one is, is there a recovery down the road? Definitely there is; with interest rates coming down there is. We could see a recovery. The housing sector, however, is somewhat paralysed as we go into this year. That is on the supply side; not the demand side, the supply side.

It goes back to one of my earlier comments. With the LIMBY syndrome out there, it affects the supply of lands whereby you can build smaller, affordable product. So answering your question, we would have difficulty getting enough supply out there to have the real impact of this economic recovery take place. As the report submitted to you suggested, we have to also, at the provincial level, look at streamlining the development process in dealing with that very issue on the supply side. I emphasize that point because it is the exact same problem that occurred in 1983-84 as we came out of the last recession. There just were not sufficient lands available to deal with the demand side through the supply side of the equation.

The Acting Chair (Mr B. Ward): Serviced land.

Mr Keenan: Serviced land.

Mr Jamison: My question to you again deals with the recovery, but in a different light, that if we do in fact come into a recovery of sorts in the second half of the year—the housing market in Toronto, I do not have to tell you, has been overheated at times. Then it cools down. Right now it looks pretty dreadful as far as your ability to participate is concerned.

We talked about getting involved in co-op housing and those types of programs to help supplement your industry. My question is whether or not, if in fact a significant rebound takes place, the allocation of co-op housing would take place on an ongoing—you would not just receive 20,000 starts right off the bat. Obviously the question in my mind is that it is more profitable for you as a builder, or it would seem to me to be more profitable for you as a builder, to build other types of housing, and how that would possibly interfere at that point with a commitment on the part of yourselves to co-op housing. Would we be assured that you would not put that on the back burner at that point?

Mr Keenan: The industry does not want to have the swings that took place in the 1980s. The topic of everybody's conversation in the housing industry in 1987 and 1988 centred on delayed closings and houses that were not completed on time with the features in them. That is not what this industry wants. We want a more level playing field. We want to see the dramatic swings up and down removed from this industry. Also, what will happen is we will get rid of the speculators. We will get rid of those profit-takers who are out there. I think that is what you are really asking, how we can get rid of that. What we are suggesting is that if we can get this industry back on an even keel, then we will not have to deal with those more questionable practices.

The Acting Chair: I would like to thank you for the presentation. It was very worth while and we will take it under consideration as we continue our deliberations.

ONTARIO COUNCIL OF AGENCIES SERVING IMMIGRANTS

The Acting Chair: Next is the Ontario Coalition of Agencies Serving Immigrants; Howard Sinclair-Jones, executive director. I believe you have a couple of people with you.

The Vice-Chair: Would you care to introduce your colleagues and the group you represent?

Mr Sinclair-Jones: My name is Howard Sinclair-Jones. I am the executive director of OCASI. The correct name is Ontario Council of Agencies Serving Immigrants. I have with me Paulina Maciulis who is the program co-ordinator for OCASI, and Aruna Ogale who is executive director of ACCES for New Canadians. Could I ask how much time we have?

The Vice-Chair: You have about half an hour, until a quarter to four.

Mr Sinclair-Jones: I know you are running a bit behind. Perhaps we could talk for about 15 minutes and then we would be very happy to answer questions. We have tabled a brief, this thing, which I think has been distributed. It includes six major areas of concern: access to services for immigrants and refugees in Ontario, settlement and integration programs, community and social services, social assistance, immigrants and the labour market, and finally, employment equity. We will deal with these in turn. I will be dealing with the first two issues and then I will pass to my colleagues to deal with the others.

First of all, though, by way of introduction to OCASI itself, some of you are very familiar with OCASI. I know Mr Phillips. We have met before in his previous capacity. Others would not be so familiar. There is a very large network of community-based agencies all over Ontario which provide assistance to newcomers, to refugees and to immigrants. We have 116 member agencies and they go everywhere from Kenora to Kingston, Ottawa, Windsor, a very large number here in Metro Toronto; more than 70 of our agencies are in the greater Toronto area. It is a very extensive network and it provides a very broad range of essential settlement services and social services to newcomers.

Each year our agencies provide assistance to more than 400,000 immigrants in Ontario, immigrant clients, people who were not born in Canada. The services include language and orientation classes, individual family counselling, interpretation, translation, information and referral, legal assistance, employment counselling and job training, and health care services.

Basically, these agencies play an essential and fundamental role in the delivery of social services in Ontario and in addition they play important roles in advocating for their constituency, for the immigrant communities of Ontario and in making links between newcomers and Canadian institutions.

Another important thing to stress is that the services OCASI members provide go far beyond the initial reception and settlement services. They include a wide range of innovative programs, employment preparation, preventive programs in the mental health field, family counselling, programs for seniors and especially a wide range of programs aimed at a particularly disadvantaged group, immigrant women.

One thing we would like to stress is that the community-based immigrant service agencies are extremely cost-effective. They are innovative and because of their flexibility they can be immediately responsive to the changing needs and changing demographics of the province. They have developed a wide range of skills in these areas. This has occurred as a result of much dedication, assisted by a tremendous voluntary commitment, despite the fact that the funding they have received over the years has been truly inadequate. In short, our member agencies are the essential link in helping the many thousands of newcomers participate in the economic and social life of Ontario.

In terms of the concern of access to services, immigration to Ontario has been a fundamental aspect of the province's economic growth and development and for many years our member agencies have raised the issue of lack of access to appropriate services for immigrants and for minority communities. Some of our key access concerns include systemic racism and discrimination in Ontario public institutions and through the economic structure; the incredible waste of expertise and talent and qualifications of immigrants and refugees due to discriminatory practices on the part of professional associations, educational institutions and other regulatory bodies; the lack of a comprehensive language training strategy at either the provincial or federal level. I should add that this is particularly a problem here in the province of Ontario. The language training system in this province is extremely complex and some would say chaotic in terms of who is responsible for what and this creates tremendous difficulties.

There is the inaccessibility of hospital services, family services, the community college system and other public institutions to non-English-speaking Ontarians, and also the lack of immigrant and minority representation on the staff and boards of public institutions.

OCASI over the past several years has supported the development of Ontario's multicultural strategy. However, we strongly feel that meaningful implementation of the multicultural strategy has been sadly lacking and the existing problems stand in stark contrast to some excellent statements of principle.

In this regard we would like to make the following recommendation, that the provincial multicultural strategy be reviewed to ensure that implementation strategies include defined and measurable objectives, the development of appropriate new programs with the allocation of realistic budgets, and we recognize that this probably requires the reallocation of existing funds rather than the creation of new money. We are fully aware of the difficult economic situation the province is in. We wish to see a re-examination of existing resources to ensure that grants and contributions are fairly and equitably distributed within the field of immigrant services. We wish to see clear lines of authority and responsibility for implementation of the multicultural strategy, and we believe that this implementation strategy must include mechanisms for community accountability.

That is in terms of the question of access.

In terms of the second one, settlement and integration of newcomers, we believe that a strong system of community-based settlement services and language training programs is essential. Increased immigration to Ontario together with a long history of underfunding of our agencies, requires an urgent and major increase in resources for immigrant settlement and integration.

According to the Ministry of Citizenship, Ontario is the initial place of settlement for 52% of immigrants nada and it has been estimated that roughly 75% of all migrants end up living in Ontario within six to nine months of arriving in the country, so we are talking about something like three quarters of all immigration flow to Canada eventually residing in Ontario. Although the Ministry of Citizenship is the major provincial government source of funds for our member agencies, it remains a very small department with a budget which is far from adequate considering its vital mandate in the areas of race relations, human rights, multiculturalism and immigrant settlement.

OCASI supports a strong role for the Ministry of Citizenship as an advocate within government to the general public for immigrant access and participation, but we are concerned that its continued existence should not be used to legitimize the marginalization of immigrant service agencies by other provincial ministries which have very much larger budgets.

Meanwhile, the federal government's support for immigrant settlement services and language training is insufficient and fails to recognize that this province is the major destination for newcomers to Canada. Ontario receives only 25% of federal funding for language training programs and just 45% of funding for newcomer settlement, despite, as I said, something like 75% of newcomers eventually residing in the province.

Our recommendations in this area, settlement and integration, are as follows: that a major increase in funding be provided to the Ministry of Citizenship's Ontario settlement and integration program to sustain and enhance operational support for community-based agencies which provide settlement and integration services to newcomers, and further, that legislation be enacted to provide the status of a mandated program to the Ontario settlement and integration program; second, that the Ontario government actively pursue a federal-provincial agreement on immigration as a means to ensure that an adequate range of settlement services and language training is provided to newcomers to the province.

In this respect—I should just add this—we are particularly concerned following the announcement of the federal-Quebec agreement on immigration of a few weeks ago. That followed an announcement by the federal Minister of Employment and Immigration of a major increase in levels and an allocation of new funding for the settlement and integration of newcomers. It would appear that the subsequent announcement of the Quebec agreement has involved a tremendous amount, virtually all of that new money, towards the province of Quebec, so we are going to be expecting a substantial increase in immigration numbers with no increase from the federal level for services.

I will pass to Paulina now.

Ms Maciulis: I am going to address two issues, both of them under community and social services, so it will be community and social services and social assistance reform.

The member agencies of OCASI exist partly because the so-called mainstream community and social services system in Ontario does not meet the needs of immigrants and refugees in the province. New immigrants and many times people who have arrived here many years ago use the services of community-based immigrant service agencies because OCASI agencies have specific knowledge and expertise and are culturally sensitive and equipped with appropriate language capabilities. The essential role of OCASI member agencies in the provision of community and social services requires the recognition and support of the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Existing funds must be reallocated and redirected in an equitable manner.

Recommendations on this issue are that the Ministry of Community and Social Services in its policy development, program design and funding allocations recognize the crucial role played by community-based immigrant service agencies, and that the Ministry of Community and Social Services develop a program of operational support for community-based immigrant service agencies appropriate to the mandate of this ministry to provide funding for services such as needs assessment; community development; access facilitation such as escorting, interpreting and translation services, and information and referral; crisis intervention; counselling for non-English-speaking individuals and families; general orientation and information related to social assistance; social support programs for non-English-speaking seniors; social support programs for isolated and vulnerable adults; special programs for disabled people within the immigrant communities, and pre-employment programs for immigrant and refugee social assistance recipients.

In the area of social assistance reform, OCASI worked closely with the Social Assistance Review Committee to establish a Multicultural Advisory Group on Social Assistance which brought together representatives of 15 organizations which serve immigrants. The multicultural advisory group reviewed the presentations and briefs which raised issues concerning immigrants and poverty. There were over 100 submissions on that issue.

Based on comments made over and over again by agencies and individuals across the province, a clear consensus emerged from the many presentations and briefs: that the social assistance system is not meeting basic needs for food, shelter, health care, clothing and transportation; that the social assistance system lacks sensitivity and compassion and that discrimination is pervasive and systemic; that the social assistance system lacks consistency between and even within municipalities—communication between the benefit system and recipients and community organizations is ineffective and in some cases non-existent; that the failure of the system is exacerbated for specific groups which face discrimination on the basis of their immigration status, such as sponsored immigrants.

OCASI supports the vision and thrust of the Transitions report. The SARC report links together in a positive way the challenge of combating poverty with that of building a multicultural Ontario. Transitions contains a progressive vision for Ontario. Its recommendations for major reform of social assistance and important new measures to assist the working poor are of an urgent priority.

Implementation of the Transitions report will help the clients of OCASI member agencies and all low-income residents of the province. We welcomed the release in 1988 of the Transitions report. We are, however, disheartened by the slow progress in implementation of its recommendations. Virtually no action has been taken with reference to SARC's excellent recommendations for improving access and quality of services to immigrants. OCASI emphasizes in particular the problems faced by family-sponsored immigrants in need of assistance who continue to be denied eligibility.

All Ontarians need adequate resources to deal with day-to-day living costs and emergencies. People need support in order to move towards self-reliance. Immigrant women need access to child care, to English classes, to vocational counselling and to skills training opportunities.

A recommendation on that point is that the Ministry of Community and Social Services actively and expeditiously move forward with the implementation of the Transitions report of the Social Assistance Review Committee. I turn now to my colleague.

Ms Ogale: The organization I work for is ACCES for New Canadians, which stands for Accessible Community Counselling and Employment Services for New Canadians.

I am going to digress a little bit from the brief that you have, but basically it will just touch on everything. We have just completed a survey that OCASI conducted for 1989 and what we found was that the member agencies—there were 107 member agencies at that time—served 420,000 people. That is a 50% increase from the previous year, which was 1988. The survey also indicated that for the people coming to our agency, their biggest areas of concerns were ESL, or English-as-a-second-language training, and employment assistance. The people we are serving desperately need assistance in making sure that they can find jobs, and the only way to find jobs is making sure they have some type of skills training and English as a second language.

It is no secret that the effects of free trade and the recession have been hard on a lot of Canadians. I think, just because of the nature of the way our economy works, it is even harder on visible minorities and those who are new to Canada because of the excess baggage they carry, mainly that they do not speak the language, that their degrees may not be recognized and whatever. This is having a disastrous effect on thousands of immigrant workers and their families, and especially on immigrant women who are even being further jeopardized. A lot of them were in a marginalized industry as it was, and now these industries are closing down. So something has to be done in terms of retraining these women to get them into other types of sectors.

We are also seeing more and more problems with the older immigrant worker. As the gentlemen who gave their presentation before were saying, a lot of immigrant workers, especially in the agency I work for, are Portuguese. They worked in the construction industry. They always thought they would have a job. They worked for 15, 20 years. They never really felt they had the need to learn the English language. Suddenly they are out of work for the first time. This whole issue has to be addressed in terms of developing their English-language skills, developing some sort of other skills training, because they need to get back into the workforce. Given their age and given their situation, it is likely that they might not be going back into the construction industry.

Many immigrants, especially immigrant women, require additional support in terms of career counselling, language, employment, skills training and job placement programs in order to compete effectively in the marketplace. We have to make sure that we provide for this.

I know recently the Ministry of Labour announced that $25 million extra would be put forward. We would like to ensure that this money is going towards all sectors including the immigrant working population, which means that basic skills development is important, literacy is important; but when you are dealing with immigrants and refugees you are also talking about ESL. You are also talking a lot of times about first-language literacy. We hope that with this $25 million the needs of this group are also going to be looked at.

As Howard said earlier, we know there is not a lot of money and we know what our economy is facing right now, but we really feel that perhaps there should be some relocation towards the community sector because we are a very, very cost-effective and we provide services that are very necessary and that perhaps have not always been provided.

We do have some recommendations:

"That a long-term perspective on language, literacy and skills training and the development of community resources for skills development and labour adjustments be supported;

"That expanded provincial funding is needed to promote community-based language and skills training for immigrant women;

"That the ministries of Education, Skills Development and Labour ensure that their market adjustment and skills development programs respond to the specific needs of immigrants and refugees in Ontario;

"That the Ministry of Labour, in implementing the recent announcement of additional funding for labour adjustment in response to plant closures, develop components which are specifically targeted to workers with specific needs such as non-English/non-French-speaking workers

"That the Ministry of Labour increase the number of agencies funded as help centres which have a capability of providing services to immigrants and refugees"—I might add right now that in Toronto there are only two help centres that cater to the immigrant and refugee populations; and

"That, as the province renegotiates the Canada/Ontario agreement on training, efforts be made to explicitly advance the province's multicultural strategy; and further that the agreement recognize and enhance the role of non-profit community-based organizations in the face of continuing privatization."

I would also like to address the issue of employment equity. Underemployment and unemployment are major problems affecting immigrant communities in Ontario. A recent report that was conducted by the Canadian Ci erties Association reinforces what OCASI has always known, that systemic racism is indeed an enduring feature of our economy. The association studied 12 out of 15 private employment agencies in Toronto, Ottawa, London and Kitchener-Guelph. In all of these areas, the agencies agreed to comply with an employer's request to refer only white people for jobs.

Mandatory employment equity legislation is necessary to address the barriers of racial discrimination in hiring and job promotions. In addition, specific measures are required to ensure that foreign-trained professionals and people have equitable access to employment opportunities in the province.

OCASI supports Bill 172, a private member's bill introduced in the last session of the Legislature. The bill would provide for employment equity for women, people with disabilities, native people and members of visible minorities. As Premier Rae has stated, "The bill is a result of extensive consultation with affected groups and would go a long way towards making Ontario's workforce reflective of the human wealth of the province."

The Task Force on Access to Professions and Trades provides a framework for ensuring that Ontario's economy receives the full benefit of the wealth of skills and talents possessed by immigrants to the province. The task force recommendations detail effective measures to counteract discriminatory rules and practices.

We would recommend, under employment equity:

"That the mandatory employment equity legislation be adopted to promote equitable employment opportunities for women, visible minorities, people with disabilities and original peoples; and that implementation of the legislation be accompanied by cross-cultural sensitivity training in the workplaces of the province;

"That, without further delay, legislation be enacted to implement the recommendations of the Task Force on Access to Trades and Professions; and

"That employment agencies which contravene the Human Rights Code be forced to terminate their business activities in the province."

Mr Phillips: Thank you for what I think was a very thoughtful brief. In my experience on the other side, probably the best investment the province makes in its spending program is in these services. I am not sure I have seen anything the government spends its money on, but I always felt, for the reasons you outlined, that dollar for dollar this was our best investment because you are very efficient, effective and you get an awful lot of volunteer help as well that I think really provides value. So I think that you certainly have my support, and as I say, to the extent that I can influence the other members, I can assure them that the members of OCASI really do provide excellent value.

I think you have raised a lot of other very important issues that are somewhat non-budgetary. They are important issues that the government will wrestle with and I can assure you that I will be watching it, because things like access to trades and professions are very fundamental; the employment equity is very fundamental—I will forget some that I will not mention—and I think your advice on the Ministry of Citizenship is an extremely important one that I agree with. That is, it is an advocacy ministry; it should not be allowed to marginalize individuals. I think the government and the province must reflect the diversity and not think of it as isolated in any one ministry. I happen to think we were making some good progress on that as a former government.

I guess I did not even want to ask a question other than just to say that I can vouch for these organizations and the work they do, to say this, that the issues you raise in here are absolutely fundamental to the province and the future of the province and will be the subject, I think, of some really good debates in the months and years ahead. So as I say, I thank you for an awful lot of work that went into that and I hope that at least over the short term the government can provide adequate funding. It probably will never be quite as much as you would like, but I hope it is enough to do the job.

Mr Sinclair-Jones: May I just comment? I thank you for your comments; that is very complimentary coming from an ex-Minister of Citizenship. We had our battles before with Mr Phillips.

I would add, though, that I personally do believe that all of these issues are in fact fundamental budgetary issues. They do not appear immediately in the equations, but the economic benefits of immigration are phenomenal. I feel that there is a major imbalance between the potential contribution of immigration to the economy of this province and the contribution which the government makes directly in the initial assistance to newcomers to the province and the continuing ability it gives them to participate fully in the life of the province.

I mentioned earlier that we are not really requesting new funds, but we are asking for a serious examination of the existing allocations in the field of social services. Why should the Ministry of Citizenship have a budget of only $60 million, when one has other ministries with budgets of $4 billion that are not delivering in terms of social services to a multicultural population? We should be looking at that. So I would say there are serious budgetary implications to some of the—

Mr Phillips: I guess my only point, for this committee wrestling with everything it is going to wrestle with over a week, was that some of the issues you raise are very important philosophical issues. How do you change what you call the mainstream organizations to provide the services and what is the best way to do that? They are very crucial recommendations. I am just saying, with all due respect to my colleagues and myself, you will not get thoughtful, measured responses in the one week we have to prepare our total budget response. The best I suspect we can do is to try to make some comment on funding for you and have those debates as you would want them, with the proper time and attention given to them.

The Vice-Chair: I am looking at your report, and one recommendation is the splitting of the costs between the federal government and the provincial government on the funding. I think it is very important that we have a good working relationship with the federal government to the point where immigration increases could increase the budget of the Ontario government, unforeseen if they change the numbers of the number of people coming into Ontario. So we could set a budget and yet if they increase the immigration figure, it could throw the budget way out of line. I just wanted to make that comment. It is a good recommendation.

Mr Curling: It is a good point that you made and if I can follow from that one, that is the exact point I am going to make. This is the sort of copout that governments will do actually between governments and in governments themselves. The Canada-Ontario agreement on training itself, we saw it coming, you know, where the federal government is reneging on its responsibility.

Now, as a provincial government, do we stand back and then tell the federal government that the transfers of funds are not coming our way? I think there are things that they can do, as a matter of fact. As you said with the ACCES program, it is in a deliberate discriminatory way that our people in professions were treating our immigrants coming into that. They are wasting very good professional skills that can be plugged in because of their qualifications seen and the Canadian experience, that type of stuff. They were excellent people when they were being interviewed as immigrants coming into the country, because those are the qualifications, but as soon as they arrive, those qualifications work out to nothing. Now in saying all that, I think that you cannot ease up even on the government of the past, but if we had moved a bit faster maybe we would have got some of those things in place.

The present government, in this budget we are addressing, can look especially at the ACCES program, you say, and implement that very quickly. They can also give enough money within your groups in order to have good counselling, because you are down there in the grass roots knowing exactly what is happening. I feel that the pressure, if you want to call it that, should be placed very strongly in this committee and I am glad you see us working very co-operatively and that is a strong recommendation we should take, that at this time, as you know, immigrants are the last to hire and the first to fire. In our constituency office you can see the other people are coming in, losing jobs, losing their homes and then, as I said was stated by the presentation earlier on, the payroll moves from the private sector to Ottawa or to Ontario.

So I am saying to you too that the pressure you must place must continue not only from here, but we still have time that it can be reflected in the budget, that adequate funds are placed, immediate ones, and then you follow up on the others, equality, etc., etc.

Even with human rights themselves, and I do not want to give a speech, the Ontario Human Rights Commission has to be looked upon very seriously, whether it is dealing only with women's issues or with all the issues. Do not put the discrimination issues on the back of the shelf to be dealt with.

Would you then say, sir, which would be the priorities to put pressure on? Would you feel that the ACCES program—and I am not blaming it on the federal government—transfer of funds—is the one to be addressed immediately?

Mr Sinclair-Jones: If you ask for priorities in a time of financial difficulty, I would—

Mr Curling: There is no financial difficulty. You have money; Ontario has money.

Mr Sinclair-Jones: I think, just coming back to a major difficulty which community-based agencies have is the delivery of essential services, that there is sort of systemic discrimination against the agencies, not just against the immigrants they serve. In terms of the major delivery ministries, the Ministry of Community and Social Services and the Ministry of Health, it has been virtually impossible for small, community-based agencies to obtain funding from those ministries to provide services which are the mandate of those ministries. They are not necessarily the mandate of the Ministry of Citizenship and they are not necessarily the mandate of the Department of Employment and Immigration at the federal level. They are in Comsoc's back. You try to get a grant from Comsoc if you are a small community-based agency based within a particular ethnocultural community and it is extremely difficult.

That is something that towards a year or so ago we were beginning to make some inroads into and we wish to see this government really begin to examine that question of the opening up of programs such that all groups which are able to provide services within a particular ministry's mandate are eligible to receive funding under those mandates.

Mr Sutherland: I want to pick up on this point about funding and talking about the impact of this budget year. The federal Minister of Employment and Immigration has said—is it an extra 200,000 a year? Is that the correct figure?

Mr Sinclair-Jones: No, we are moving towards a total of 250,000 a year over a five-year period.

Mr Sutherland: And the current total is?

Mr Sinclair-Jones: It is not far off 200,000 at the moment.

Mr Sutherland: Increasing it by approximately 50,000 a year. I was wondering if you could give some feeling about what the impact is going to be? You have said 75% of the immigrants end up in this province to support the increase in immigration and the federal government doing that, but I am very concerned about what impact it is going to have on the provincial budget. They have made, it seems, a rather arbitrary decision to do that but from your indications they are not providing the support services that are going to be necessary to integrate these people into the Ontario community. I was wondering if you had some estimate of what it would be for an extra 50,000 people or 75% of that extra 50,000, what extra amount your organization as a whole would need to try to accommodate that.

Mr Sinclair-Jones: In percentage terms of the total immigration budget, very, very little. Part of the difficulty is that the total federal funding to community-based serv-encies helping immigrants is only a tiny percentage of overall immigration budget. The major program is a program called ISAP, the immigrant settlement and adaptation program. That is only 3% of the federal immigration budget. The vast majority of the federal immigration budget goes on enforcement, on immigration, as opposed to helping people settle and become productive, even though the whole rationale for immigration is demographic and economic growth. It is a contradiction.

Mr Sutherland: So we have a real question here that the federal government is not providing the support services to integrate these people properly.

Mr Sinclair-Jones: Correct. And it is not providing in terms of job training, employment training, counselling. We are not just talking about initial settlement. We are talking about a whole range of activities which assist people to become economically productive.

Ms M. Ward: I want to ask you to expand or clarify for this section on immigrants in the labour market and your recommendation about the Canada-Ontario agreement on training. You say, "And further that the agreement recognize and enhance the role of non-profit community-based organizations in the face of continuing privatization." Are you talking there of training and skills programs that are provided by these agencies? I wonder if you could give me some examples.

Ms Ogale: You want examples of programs?

Ms M. Ward: I just want you to expand a little, if that is really what you meant, on the provision of programs by community agencies. I have heard in the past that there have been problems with funding, that it is not continuous. The funding may be granted for a short period of time, maybe only for a year, and by the time the agencies get the people in place—it takes a period of training and so on—by the time it is operational the funding is gone again and they are in the position of being in a state of uncertainty for some months again.

Ms Ogale: The funding that skills training programs get year to year, so every year you apply. I know of at least one program that was serving South Asian women, which is not operating now even though it was very successful, simply because the money was not made available this year and you have to reapply.

What we are saying is that because we know our communities best, especially because most of these skills training programs are for women, we know their specific language needs, we know how they can learn and what they need to learn, that it makes sense that we be involved in that training process. It seems that more and more of the money is being given perhaps to industry or whatever to carry out training, and it seems to us that workers who are already marginalized are probably going to be isolated from those training programs. So because we know these populations best, it makes sense to have community-based training programs that can deliver services in the community, because they are cost-effective and they reach the right population.

Mr B. Ward: I think my questions have been asked but I have not got the answer I am hoping to get.

First, as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Skills Development, I hear what you are saying about the emphasis that should be placed on that aspect of skills programming in this province and give you this assurance, that on item 5.6 on page 12 I will make the minister, Richard Allen, aware of your concerns. Hopefully, they can be dealt with to some degree in the upcoming negotiations.

What I would like to focus on is 5.4—5.4 and 5.5, I guess, which pertain to the help centres. In Brantford we have a help centre, but we also have an Ethnoculturefest. It is an independent organization but does receive funding from the province to deal with counselling, etc. Are you suggesting that this province, when it comes to assistance for unemployed, etc—I am relating to Brantford again—rather than not having the best program available because some funding is going to Ethnoculturefest and some is going to the help centre, should be concentrating on the help centre and ensuring that the support system is in place at the help centre to deal with unemployed immigrants or ethnic people who perhaps do not have a full understanding of the system? Is that something we should be looking at? Is that what you are trying to get at with 5.4 and 5.5 on page 12?

Ms Ogale: Actually, access for new Canadians into help centres funded as a help centre. What we are suggesting is that there perhaps needs to be more done in terms of the help centres and in terms of the non-English population. A lot of help centres do not necessarily look towards the needs of a specialized group. We are not saying take money away from one and give it to the other, but perhaps expand funding or look at the different things a help centre should be doing. I know, for example, that our help centre will be seeing 3,500 people this year; 3,500 people is an awful lot for one help centre to see. Clearly, there is a need for another help centre within Toronto, but there is not one.

Perhaps what we are saying is that there need to be more specialized help centres, not just ethno-specific ones because all help centres right now are overextended simply because of the large numbers of unemployed people in Ontario. I think that is what we are suggesting, that you look at that.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you.

Ms Maciulis: If I can make a little comment. Mr Ward mentioned Brantford, and a help centre existing in the same locality. I would say we are not supporting the ethnocultural centre against the help centre or vice-versa. I feel that in those communities normally those organizations work together. If they do not, I think the same population would push them to work together for the population.

Mr B. Ward: If they are not, they should be.

TENANTS NON-PROFIT REDEVELOPMENT CORP

The Vice-Chair: Mr de Klerk, I believe? I just want to check; sometimes someone else has been substituted. Would you introduce yourself and your colleague and the group you represent? You have a half an hour, to 4:30.

Mr de Klerk: My name is Jack de Klerk and with me is Felies Einhorn. We are with the Tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp. We will tell you a bit more about what we are about and what we are asking. I appreciate and I will say at the outset that it is a difficult task you face, because you have just been talking about immigrant services and social services and we are going to ask that you now switch gears, not entirely but to a great extent, into the whole area of housing, which is another, some might say, black hole.

Mr Curling: Could be a white hole, too.

Mr de Klerk: Yes, I was thinking of that as the words came out of my mouth. It is a hole.

The Tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp was incorporated in 1989 as a result of efforts of the Federation of Metro Tenants' Associations and the Co-operative Housing Association of Ontario. The organization was given a mandate to work with tenant groups and assist them as much as they could in converting their apartments into non-profit co-operatives. We were given a start-up grant from the Ministry of Housing, its sector support program, in June 1989. Shortly after that we were told that we had a reserve allocation to convert 500 units under Homes Now. To date we have completed two acquisitions and a third is in progress. When we complete it in March of this year we will have used up our entire 500 units.

Our organization has received support from the Minister of Housing, and to the minister and to the government we want to express our support. We want to encourage the government, though, to follow through to a greater extent on its commitment before the election to make acquisition, rehabilitation or conversions a significant part of the social housing program.

Converting existing rental housing into non-profit co-ops makes a lot of sense. Affordable housing will be preserved, the housing stock will be preserved, security of tenure will be guaranteed and subsidized units will be available to those in need.

These objectives can be met through other legislative programs. What we want to stress is that the conversion program is much more cost-effective from a financial accounting point of view. And as true as that is, we want to say that the real reason, or the most compelling reason, for doing conversions is that it allows people to take a much greater role or to have more control over their living environments.

Tenants today remain second-class citizens. As a class they do not have access to the economic opportunities available to home owners. A recent Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation study showed only 7% of tenant households in Toronto—it did not give or I did not see the figure for all of Ontario. For southern Ontario they indicated that it was on average about 20%; it varied, really, from municipality to municipality. Only 7% in Toronto could afford to buy a home.

Tenants pay proportionately higher municipal taxes. More important, there is a lot that happens in and about their homes over which they have absolutely no control. Will their building be sold? Will the rents go up again? Will the repairs be done? Will the harassments of the superintendent be confronted by the owner? Will something be done about the security problems faced by women? The list does go on and on, reflecting the fact that most of what happens in a rental project is far beyond the reach of average tenant.

Creating co-operatives, on the other hand, can have a very positive impact on the personal development of tenants and the community through the process of empowerment. We have stood on the sidelines applauding political developments in eastern Europe. The people there have recaptured their own lives and their community. It is time to be serious about encouraging similar changes here.

Before I get into the background, I want to say that where we are going in our submission is asking the government to set aside more funds to allow these conversions to take place. It is critical, I think, given the time we are at right now, the economic situation being what it is, that the government act now to make the opportunity of converting apartments into co-operatives more widely available.

The idea of doing conversions is not new. In fact, since co-operatives were first established in this province, conversions have been part of the program delivery. In Toronto there are about 20 co-operatives created by converting apartment buildings into co-operatives. In the past 15 years during which co-ops have been developed, circumstances have changed dramatically. In the past few years, conversions were taking place only sporadically and under very significant conditions, first, that rents had to be set at a level that compared to market rents and, second, that the property had to be renovated to an almost-new standard.

These conditions had the effect of discouraging developers of co-operatives. As well, administrators of housing programs by and large indicated a reluctance to support these particular projects. Perhaps most important, the tenants found that the conditions were strong disincentives. Why would a tenant support a conversion if his rent was effectively going to be doubled and if he perhaps had to vacate his apartment for a few months and then move back in again, in the meantime settling somewhere else? This really discouraged tenants from supporting this at all.

The combined effect of a decade of rent regulation and the Rental Housing Protection Act has been to make conversions less attractive from the perspective of the previous programs. However, tenants have maintained their desire to gain more control over events and activity in and about their homes. Rapidly increasing rents and poor maintenance convinced tenants more than ever that changes are needed. Most tenants would prefer not to be fighting with their landlord over issues of common sense and daily life. As a result, pressure has increased to develop alternatives.

The announcement in the budget of 1988 of a housing program to create 30,000 new social housing units—don't get this wrong, Mr Curling, you should correct me; you will remember this—through new construction, acquisition of existing units and leasing existing units spurred the discussion of alternatives. The government of the day was convinced that program criteria for conversions would have to be changed if acquisition targets were to be met.

The co-op conversion working group met Ministry of Housing officials for months to work out details of a new conversion program. The allocation of units to the Tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp reflected the change the program. It was understood that tenants would not support conversions that resulted in rent increases larger than those allowed by rent review, nor would they support renovations that resulted in tenants being evicted.

In effect, Homes Now established that conversions could be done by limiting rent increases to the kind of increase that would follow in rent review if the acquisition was a private-market one, and renovations would be used in to capture the remaining usefulness of building structures and to protect against the kind of extensive renovation that resulted in tenant eviction.

The essence of how Homes Now works is set out in the pro forma which follows. The building is purchased by a tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp with the assistance of a mortgage from the Ontario Housing Corp—the money comes from the Canada pension plan—for 100% of the cost of acquisition and renovation. Existing rents are applied to cover the borrowing and the operating costs. Generally there is a shortfall. The amount will vary, depending on what the costs and the rents are. The same holds true for any private acquisition, of course. The shortfall in a private-market transaction is a financial loss. As tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp, or any other non-profit, cannot write off financial losses against other income, subsidies are required to carry the projects. These bridge subsidies, as they are known, generally decline over a number of years, depending on their original size and the proportion operating costs are of income.

The pro forma is set out and I will just review this briefly.

If you assume an acquisition cost of $40,000 a unit—give me for being somewhat Toronto-centred here, but it is where I work and that is really what I am most familiar with—$40,000 per unit is not an unrealistic cost to acquire a building. Just for your information, a year ago you would have paid probably between $65,000 and $70,000 per unit for the same unit; that is how much the market has come down since that time. Six months ago, and I am speaking very specifically in the time period before the election, that same unit probably would have cost $55,000. It was quite clear the recession was having a very dramatic effect on the marketplace over the past year and, not surprisingly, the election of the NDP government and the government's announcement with respect to its plans for rent review have to a certain extent accelerated the decline of values.

It is a reflection of the fact that a lot of the value has been created over the years because people were speculating on rental income streams, and to the extent that is curtailed, then the value is less and some people, because they bought right at the last moment and paid top dollar, are facing some fairly hard decisions about what to do with their investment.

With a $40,000 cost, the soft costs were about $5,000 per unit and the renovation costs—I have given two examples, one of $20,000 per unit and another of $10,000 per unit—those renovation costs will essentially make sure that the building has some up-to-date fire equipment, that there are some energy conservation expenditures for the windows, probably an upgrading of appliances and a small amount of in-suite things. It will make sure the roof is up to date and, if there is an underground parking garage, will make sure that it is in good shape, for a total capital cost of about $65,000 or $55,000.

The interest rate from Homes Now right now is about 10.5%, maybe a little bit less today. But those costs result in financing costs of about $570 a month in the one example or $480 in the second.

The operating costs on average, and again these numbers vary—if you do less renovation your operating costs are presumably going to be higher, so those amounts are reflected there—if you assume a rent of $550 for a one- or two-bedroom apartment, and—it might be a bit on the high side for a one or a bit on the low side for a two but in any case that is the number I picked, you will get a shortfall of $370 on the one hand or $330 on the other. You can see the $10,000 difference in renovations results in a different shortfall of about $40 a month. That shortfall of course is a bridge subsidy that comes to the projects from the government under the Homes Now program, and this subsidy would apply to every unit.

There is another subsidy which the members will perhaps be somewhat more familiar with, that is, a rent-geared-to-income subsidy, which would be available to tenants or occupants of a housing project who are paying more than 25% or 30% of their income on their rent. If you apply and you are eligible, then the government would subsidize your rent, and in this case we would be talking about the rent of $550. If you had an income of, let's say, $1,000 a month, you would obviously be spending 55% of your income on your rent. The government in this case would subsidize your rent so that you would only have to pay $250. They would give you a further subsidy of $300.

Typically, what you will find is in the normal co-operative housing project, the rent-geared-to-income subsidy levels are about 40% to 60% of the units. Just for your information, the average tenant household, or one out of three of the average tenant households, pays more than 30% of its income on its rent.

That is the pro forma that I wanted to just evaluate for a moment.

There is some difficulty in doing an evaluation of Homes Now because although the project was announced in the budget of 1988, the first unit allocations were not given until the summer of 1989 and only now in fact are the first projects coming on stream. Our allocations, because we are buying existing units and not building new units, are some of the earliest ones to come on. If a group got an allocation to build a new project in, let's say, the fall of 1989, they would be hard pressed, unless they had rezoned land already, to be even getting shovels in the ground at this stage. So it makes it very difficult to evaluate the program as a whole.

I think there are two points that should maybe not be so much considered as just made note of. The first is that I think as a delivery mechanism, Homes Now can be fine-tuned. There is no doubt about that.

Second, there is need for an ongoing program evaluation. I think part of the problem people have had is that there have not been a lot of purely provincially funded programs. In fact, Homes Now is the first one. We need to let it run a little while or to get all the projects in, and then evaluate it while we are doing another batch of them. It is a real problem if you just stop everything and then do an evaluation, and then once the evaluation is complete say, "Okay, now we'll go on to something else." The providers in the meantime do not have any work.

It is critical, if you want to have an ongoing supplying sector, that in fact the programs are continuous. It is like a construction worker. If you are not building, you are out of work. Similarly with housing projects, if you are not delivering projects, then the organization is going to go under.

So in terms of evaluation, those are two things. I am not going to suggest for a moment even that this committee undertake that evaluation; not right now at least. Probably it is more appropriate to leave that to the Ministry of Housing. I simply want to make those points because the assumption is that if you are going to do an evaluation, you are only doing it because you intend to continue a program. If you are going to cut the whole thing anyway, there is not much point in doing an evaluation. The decision has already been made.

So we assume that the government intends to continue having a social housing delivery program, and we encourage this committee to come out and say that in bold print, if you like, because I think it is something that those of us who are working in the co-operative housing sector and the non-profit housing sector need to hear. We need to be encouraged to say, "If times are tough right now, we are committed to making sure that housing programs will continue."

It is even more important for the people who depend on the provision of social housing for their homes. There are lots of people, as I indicated, fully a third of the tenant households in Ontario, who pay over a third of their income on housing. If in fact those people do not believe there are going to be housing programs in the future, then they are going to start despairing about what the future holds for them. They need to be confident that there will be programs in the future.

I think it has to be clear that affordable housing can only be delivered on a non-profit basis. If there is room in the system for speculative housing, then it may be affordable to the first-time owner or the initial provider, but if there is room for profiteering in it and room for speculation, then the affordability will be lost in short order.

Part of the need then for social housing is for housing to come under the control of the people who live in it. I would like to make this point, I guess, that supporting conversions is as much a social program for community development as developing new housing is an employment or an economic stimulator kind of program. I want to stress that we think that is an important thing. If people have control over their housing, then it has lots of positive social repercussions.

The purpose of supporting these programs I think needs to be looked at. Homes Now to date has committed 500 units to the Tenants Non-Profit Redevelopment Corp. Another 775 units were converted in the City Park project in Toronto. In effect, in the past two years, 1,275 tenant households won the lottery to get control over their homes. If the government keeps its commitment in An Agenda for People, then another 20,000 units of social housing will be generated annually, of which 4,000 will be conversions.

This amounts, I submit, to nothing but an enriched jackpot. It will take a lifetime before a significant portion of the tenant population has control over its own affairs. That problem needs to be addressed by this government. That problem needs to be addressed in terms of making opportunities available to more tenants. We do not suggest that the government go crazy in giving money away to buy out all the private sector.

Two observations I would like to make relate to the issue of how quickly we should proceed. The first is that we need to take the time to develop better mechanisms than the Homes Now model. This may include better financing instruments. For instance, there are now mortgage instruments that are considerably cheaper than the 12% interest only mortgages provided by Homes Now. The federal index-linked mortgage costs about $7 per hundred dollars. That alone is about 30% cheaper than the Homes Now mortgage. If you go back to the pro forma, the financial costs of $570, if you reduce that by one third, then you are going to be more than halving the shortfall that you show on the bottom line there. In other words, if you take $200 or so off of the $570, then you are going to reduce your overall shortfall by $200 or so of the $300.

The other observation that I would like to make is that the acquisition cost today is less than 75% of what it was a year ago. This has resulted partly because of the recession and partly because some of the landlords had speculated that their property values would increase forever. They gambled and now they are deciding, or their bankers are deciding for them, to sell. In short, now is the time to begin. In order to take advantage of the economic climate and to begin the process of empowering tenants, the government must make a firm commitment now to make funds available to convert privately owned rental housing into non-profit co-operatives.

I stress non-profit. We are not interested in promoting the conversion of existing apartments into condominiums. Those funds must not replace funding for construction of new affordable housing; rather the object is to keep existing housing occupied by tenants today affordable so that they do not have to move into new projects to get subsidized apartments. If long-term affordability is to be realized, housing stock conversion is to be realized and if our democratic ideals are to be practised, then greater financial commitment must be put in place.

The costs are not great. The examples used above indicate that the annual cost is less than $4,500 per unit at the outside. Obviously 10,000 units would represent a cost of about $45 million. There are substantial benefits. First, rents increase annually, the subsidy would decline. Second, there are significant savings in terms of social welfare costs if rents are controlled in the long term. We have agreements with the Ministry of Housing to take refer-n the local housing authority for a fixed percentage of vacancies.

Increasingly, the cost to government with respect to services, such as rent review, municipal inspections, landlord and tenant disputes, will decrease dramatically. It is possible to reduce the actual costs of the program even further if grants are made available for energy conservation improvement, if the government gave loan guarantees for provincially sponsored, index-linked mortgage security and if other improvements are made.

Tenants and the co-operative sector are committed to proving conversion programs. We need government commitment to fund them. Communities fostered by conversions establish new directions for social development, encouraging people to take responsibility for their own lives. They lead people in the direction of learning to live together. The object is to get people to outgrow the constraints that always arise when someone else controls your life and treats it and you like a commodity.

We ask you to consider this unique time as an opportunity at not too great a cost to invest in our future. The budget commitment is needed now and we ask this committee to recommend it now.

Mr B. Ward: I have a question of clarification, I guess, on the funding of your organization. I understand that you received a startup grant from the Minister of Housing from the previous government, which was a good initiative. How do you fund your organization now?

Mr de Klerk: Part of the Homes Now program and co-op programs, federally and provincially, has provided for what are called "organizational expenses." Basically what happens is we are like a consultant and we get a fee for doing the conversion. We share that fee—it is 2% of the maximum project capital cost—with the organization that sets up the co-operative, that does all the training. Usually there is about an 18-month or two-year contract that exists between the resource group, consultant group and the co-operative group. So we are sharing part of that.

Mr B. Ward: Okay. When you use up your allotment, though, does that mean you are out of business?

Mr de Klerk: Yes, we depend on projects in order to continue our operations.

Mr Curling: I am sorry we only have five minutes, I will get right to the point then.

I got rather frightened when I read this in many reports. I see affordable housing being delivered by the private and the public sector or in co-operation with co-ops. You almost seem to be saying that affordable housing can only be delivered through co-ops, and that part frightens me in a way.

The other part that really frightens me, I hope that the amendments to the rent review process that are coming in will not scare and frighten the owners of rental units into saying, "By golly, the government is coming at me. I have to settle for what I can get now," and then the co-ops or the other groups pick it up. That is what I am getting from the report. It says, "Grab it now, because those banks are on the case guys," when we thought that the co-operation between landlords and tenants and government was working out a way to deliver affordable housing.

Do you still believe that the private sector has no place in this market for delivering affordable housing?

Mr de Klerk: Well, I think that the private sector cannot deliver, nor can anyone else deliver, affordable housing without government assistance. That much is clear. It costs well over $150,000 to deliver a modest two-bedroom apartment and, in order to carry that, you would have to charge a rent of over $1,500 a month. That is not affordable. However it is done, it is going to need government subsidy. That is the point I think that a lot of people have made over the years.

The question then is, if the government is going to invest, how do you make sure that that government subsidy that is put in is not walked off with by someone in the future in terms of flipping a building or so forth? I am not saying the private sector cannot do it. What I am saying is that the current economic realities dictate that they will not do it.

Mr Curling: The co-ops' component of the tenants in there would be 50% who pay market rent and the other 50% are rent-geared-to-income, so you are not solving the problem in a very quick way anyhow, because that co-op can only take 50% market rent and the other is rent-geared-to-income.

Mr de Klerk: Basically it is reflecting what is there. What we are concerned about here—and I want to just address the issue of what is the effect of the government's position with respect to rent review and what it has announced—the people who are bailing out are not the people who have owned property for 10 or 15 years and who have paid down their mortgages and who have maintained those buildings well. Those are not the people who are in trouble.

The people who are in trouble are the people who bought buildings that have flipped three or four times in the last five years, at the encouragement of rent review, because rent review continued to pass on those financing costs. Those people purchased at the top of the market, and whatever the government would have done, as the market began to decline, those people were in trouble. It is just an economic reality that when you buy at the top, you are in the toughest position to survive.

The Vice-Chair: Yes, I have to agree that your supplementary filled in the question a lot better.

Mr Phillips: I have three questions, I guess. One is, honest to gosh, I thought the minister already had announced the program for the next couple of years, so I thought that was finished.

The second one is, just using your pro forma, just so I understand it better, the rent number you show there is not the market rent, that is the average rent that is being paid?

Mr de Klerk: Well—

Mr Phillips: Let me get all my questions in. The Chairman only allows me one question.

Mr Curling: We have learned.

Mr Phillips: I am trying to get an idea of just what we are looking at over an annual cost for a 100-unit building, whether the $550 is the average rent or the market rent and whether there is then something else we should think of, what geared-to-income supplement we should think about, just to get some idea, because one of the challenges in this program is that it seems like an annual expenditure. It is not like a one-time expenditure. I realize rents go up at some stage.

My third one, if you could just help me out a little bit, is: When I was in government, I had some concerns about using the co-operative funds to purchase existing facilities, because I felt that we are trying to get more units on the market. So I had kind of simplistically thought I would rather put our money into the construction of new facilities, and I realize there must be strong arguments I could not even get out of here.

So maybe those three things: first, the minister's announcement; second, the numbers, and third, the benefits of buying existing versus new.

Mr de Klerk: I will leave it to you to figure out, if the minister says something like, "But there is no money in the budget," what that means. Presumably there has to be some money in the budget in order for the minister to in fact give effect to the programs he has announced. That is one thing.

The other thing is, what I am asking the committee to do is to make a recommendation to the government apart from any standard government program that exists. If the government says, "We want to create 20,000 units, new or conversions, over the next year," that is fine. What we are saying is, consider something in addition to that.

The reason to consider something in addition to it is the market right now—and frankly, I am relatively indifferent as to why the market is the way it is; I do not understand those things a whole lot better than most people. What I do know is that prices are down, and it is not only for existing apartment buildings, it is also for land. You can buy land today at probably half the price it was a year and a half ago. So if you are going to have a housing program next year or two years from now or three years from now, it would make a lot of sense to buy the resources that you need to deliver those things now because you are going to save yourself a whole pile of money by doing that now.

Mr Phillips: The problem, by the way, is that I think also jobs, jobs, jobs. So for the government, that will be the challenge.

Mr de Klerk: Right, but let's say that figure that is going to come out is $1,000. It is notional, right, but if it is $1,000, and if in two years it is going to cost you $2,000, then you are going to say, "That's a lot of money and I don't know if we can do—." So you are going to be losing jobs. If you could do twice as many for the same amount, you will create twice as many jobs. So by having the resources available because you bought them cheaply, it will give you more to work with in two years. So you will get more jobs. That is the one thing. We are asking you to do something special now because of what the economic situation is.

The Vice-Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing. If Mr Phillips has any more or if you would like to talk to him and consult with him a little bit more—

Mr Phillips: I will get them independently.

The Vice-Chair: Thanks for appearing. We are running a little bit behind. We will have a meeting of the committee here after our last delegate.

DONALD WARNE

The Vice-Chair: Mr Warne, would you introduce yourself? Whom do you represent?

Mr Warne: Shall I distribute these?

The Vice-Chair: Yes, please.

Mr Warne: Introduction: my name is Donald Warne from Whitby. I assure you that I come with a brief because I know at this time of day you do not want to do a lot of discussion, but I have one point.

I should say something about my bias at this time. I am in favour of more taxes. So this is the point of whereases. The shape of my brief has something to do with my long years in the church; they always had that shape. You came with the "whereases" and the "therefore." So perhaps the structure would be for me just to briefly go over each of the seven "whereases" and then "therefore." Is that a satisfactory procedure?

1. "Whereas poverty is a major problem in Ontario with over 700,000 needing social assistance, over 300,000 of these being children;

2. "Whereas in Metro Toronto alone over 100,000 million rely on food banks, with nearly half that number being children;

3. "Whereas the SARC report, Transitions, shows ways in which the poor can begin to take responsibility for their own lives"—

I pause at this point to indicate that as a volunteer on the social planning councils of Newcastle, Oshawa and Whitby, I spent six years on the board of directors. It was at that time that the SARC report was being prepared and our social planning council prepared a brief to the government committee. I was the one who came to present the brief, and through that experience I became an aficionado for this report.

I was enthusiastic about the way in which the government and the committee were moving and it seems to me that reflected a widespread feeling across the province. The approach and the results were commendable. I know that people like Grant Devine came down to Oshawa. I was surprised to find that in Oshawa we have food banks. It is a surprise that in those energetic and prosperous years of the 1980s we, in the social planning council of Newcastle, Oshawa and Whitby, saw vast social problems that seemed to encompass wealth. It was a predicament for us.

Number 4, and I realize now I am facing some of you who were in that government, is not exactly to condemn that government. I realize that a budget of 1990 came down from on high from Mr Wilson and may have caused some of this.

4. "Whereas the previous government gave only minimal financial support to the first of the five stages of the implementation of the recommendation of the transitions report;

5. "Whereas the full implementation of the five stages of the SARC report will require the government to spend at least $2.5 billion more on social assistance and income supplementation;

6. "Whereas the federal government's elimination of capital gains tax up to $100,000 or $500,000 has provided a major tax loophole mainly to the benefit of very wealthy;

7. "Whereas there has been no significant creative investment from this tax, but rather severe side effects and speculative spins in such areas as the real estate market—"

I pause at this moment to comment again upon the presentation you just received. It seems to me that part of our difficulty in the last six or eight years has been a speculative spin, part of which is the result of an abolition of capital gains tax up to $100,000. It seems to me that if we had not had that abolition of capital gains tax, some of the problems that we face now would have been more readily dealt with. I myself pay capital gains tax, as most of you probably do. I have always had the feeling that a tax on that capital gain was an unfair tax. I do not deserve the capital gains as my total income.

10 Capital gains is partly the result of the whole community. Certainly some of us may be shrewd and make investments. It is something like a lottery. Some of us are lucky in making our shrewd investments. We think Nova is going to go up and we buy Nova. We sell at the top, $11, and then it goes back down to $8 and we are so sorry. We have a capital gain, but it is really the whole community that is involved in any capital gain.

So I see that capital gains should be considered as income. You will see in my "therefore" I am considering the whole capital gain. If the capital gain is considered as income, then it seems to me government will not be able to say to those of us on social planning councils: "Look, I haven't got the money. We haven't anywhere where we can get money." People do not want more taxes; higher taxes would discourage business. I say that the capital gains tax is in a special category.

The reimposition of capital gains is not going to discourage business, it is going to discourage a lot of speculation, but it seems to me it will put business on a firmer basis. I am not a statistician, but I think that we in Ontario, even though the federal government does not agree, we could therefore impose a capital gains tax which would enable us to say: "Look, SARC, it's a wonderful program." We can, without disturbing all those business people who are afraid of higher taxes, go ahead with these memorable changes to set the poverty cycle on its heels. I think Ontario has the legal ability and it is the right to do that.

So my "therefore" is simply to get to the other side of all our social problems and say yes, we can have the money and we can, if we wish, devote that money to a program that even Conrad Black says is a worthy program. We can enable people to enter into that feeling of self-sufficiency and we can solve so many of our social programs.

I am open to your questions and comments.

Mr Phillips: Obviously you have been deeply involved in it. That is a thoughtful presentation. Just a couple of quick questions. On the capital gains, I had thought they had eliminated the $500,000 and that it was down to $100,000. My other one was that you mentioned the minimal financial support to the first five stages. Are you aware of what level of minimal support that was?

Mr Warne: I know it was supposed to be $450 million, but it was not really.

Mr Phillips: It was more than that. We put in $540 million. If you look at the Comsoc budget, which has doubled in the last five years, you will find $540 million in there for them.

Mr Warne: I guess my documents come from another reading. The Campaign Against Poverty did a critique of the announcement Mr Sweeney made. There is a whole page of ways in which it seems as though many of these funds are already included. Many of the objectives that $450 million would create had not been reached. So I am doing a different reading on that budget.

Mr Phillips: I am saying that if you examine the budget, you will find, I think, $540 million in it now. That is only phase one. The new government has promised to fully implement it. When we are talking dollars, they are real dollars. You will find advocates here understandably will make their case as strong as they can, but I know from the finances, having wrestled with where we find the money, if you have examined the budget, you will find $540 million in there for phase 1 of the SARC report. But I had thought the federal government had moved the capital gains from $500,000—

Mr Warne: Well, my recollection is that the $500,000 was retained for genuine farmers, and I did not expand this to say that if a farm is going to continue in farming there should be some special consideration given for that, especially when generations pass.

Mr Phillips: When the $500,000 came out I think there were a lot of people worried about it. I think they changed it to exclude everybody but farmers. So, effectively, I think now it is $100,000. It does not change your point.

Mr Warne: No. This is why I worded it as $100,000 and $500,000.

Mr Phillips: Yes, it does not change your point at all, and I think it is a thoughtful thought. I had better get out and see if I can find my $100,000 capital gain somewhere. You have not benefited from it yet, have you?

Mr Warne: Not the $100,000. Yes, it would be a conflict of interest if I had completed my $100,000. No, I am silly in a way, because perhaps in the next five years I could use that $100,000. It is silly in a way, but I really do not want to.

Mr Phillips: That is a thoughtful thought.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you, Mr Warne. We will consider your submission.

An hon member: Are we to have a meeting now?

The Vice-Chair: We will hold it off until tomorrow. We do not have any of the Tories here.

Mr Curling: That is all right. They do not count.

The Vice-Chair: They missed a lot today.

Mr Curling: We were talking about social programs that is why.

The Vice-Chair: We will meet tomorrow at the end of the day at 4:30 or 5, whatever time we get finished.

Mr Christopherson: You are in the chair tomorrow.

The Vice-Chair: No, no, I am not in the chair tomorrow.

The committee adjourned at 1647.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 31 January 1991

The committee met at 1000 in committee room 2.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

ONTARIO NURSES' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: It is 10 o'clock. I would like to see if we stick very closely to the time frame this morning. We begin. Half an hour per group.

This is the Ontario Nurses' Association: Eileen Davidson, president; Glenna Cole Slattery, chief executive officer; and Carol Helmstadter, research officer. Welcome. You may begin.

Ms Davidson: Good morning. My name is Eileen Davidson and I am the president of the Ontario Nurses' Association for 1991. With me on my immediate right is Glenna Cole Slattery, our chief executive officer, and to my right is Carol Helmstadter, our research officer, government relations. To my left is Mary Hodder, associate director of labour relations, and to her right is Seppo Ruusimäki, research officer.

The Ontario Nurses' Association represents over 100,000 nurses working in Ontario hospitals, nursing homes, homes for the aged, public health units, the Victoria Order of Nurses and industry. We are pleased to appear before this committee to present our views concerning the 1991 Ontario budget. Our comments relate to expenditures on health care and in particular expenditures in hospitals.

One needs only to read the newspapers to realize that the nursing profession is in a crisis. There is a profound sense of dissatisfaction among nurses about their pay benefits and working conditions, all of which has been documented in report after report. The highly publicized shortage of nurses is the clearest indication of a crisis which we believe will not disappear. While some argue that the current nursing shortage is a short-term, cyclical phenomenon, we disagree. In our view, the current nursing shortage is the first manifestation of a permanent imbalance in the demand and supply of nurses.

On the demand side, three factors are fuelling the imbalance:

An aging population: Canada's population is aging as the baby-boom generation makes its way through the system. The proportion of those who are over 65 years of age will increase, creating a substantial demand for all health care services, including the services of nurses.

The expanded role of nurses: The role of nurses will expand significantly in future years as areas of expertise are created. There is overwhelming evidence that nurses are fully capable of assuming many of the functions currently performed by family physicians.

Technological change: The most pervasive factor influencing today's demand for nurses is technological change. By expanding the bounds of medical knowledge, technology has increased the range of physical ailments which can be effectively treated, thereby allowing individuals to live longer. Patients are sicker, requiring a more intense and sophisticated level of nursing care. The physical demands, continuous pressure to keep pace with the rapidly changing base of nursing knowledge adds to the complexity that the nurse must deal with on a daily basis. The impact on the employer has been a rising requirement for technically competent nursing staff.

On the supply side, the problems are equally serious. Potential recruits do not choose nursing because it is not a desirable occupation due to low pay, poor career prospects, stressful working conditions, shift work and a lack of recognition.

Nursing must now compete in the marketplace for recruits with other occupations and professions newly opened to women. According to the Ministry of Skills Development, between 1986 and 1996 the supply of young people entering the labour force is projected to decline by 125,000. Not only must nursing deal with competition from other occupations and professions; it must also deal with a share of a shrinking pool of potential workers.

We are fully aware that the Ministry of Health is making an attempt to manage existing resources better. No one likes waste in a publicly funded system. Indeed, if wasteful practices are allowed to continue, then hospital workers can truly claim that their low wages subsidize an inefficient and ineffective system.

At this time I will ask Glenna to present some statistical data and numbers for the committee's consideration.

Ms Cole Slattery: I tried really hard to find something that would give the committee a comfort level.

The Chair: Just a minute.

Mr Hansen: I would appreciate if we could possibly have the clerk do a photocopy of what you have read out there, so we have it when we are going over it, because by the time we get Hansard we are not going to be having all these facts and figures.

Ms Cole Slattery: We can deliver you any materials that the committee would like between now and the end of the day.

Mr Hansen: Okay, that is fine.

Ms Cole Slattery: I was looking to give the committee a bit of a comfort level but it is hard to do. People who hold purse-strings—some people say those purse-strings very often translate into nooses. So I found this and I want to start with this. I am going to give you hard numbers. I am going to give you dollars and cents, statistics and hard numbers.

There was a good article in Maclean's on 23 February 1976, entitled "The Revolt of the Middle-Class Worker: An Inquiry into the State of Canada's Unions." It specifically deals with the so-called white-collar worker. 1976 was not yesterday. It seems like yesterday to me, but it really was not yesterday. I think what you are seeing today with us here representing 55,000 white-collar workers is the truth of the Maclean's article. In the 15 June 1990 Toronto Star the banner is "Hospital Crisis Looms, Senators Say." That is true.

In October 1990 in the Star, "Engineers' Pay Topped Inflation for 12 Months, Study Shows," it talks about 57,000 professional engineers who got a median salary, which means half of those surveyed earned more and half earned less, of $55,000. I submit that these engineers, if there was a magic wand that made them 98% female, would not have got that median salary. Not that they are not worth that median salary—I believe they are—but my workers do not get that kind of a median salary because they are 90% women, so I want you to consider that all that I say has an undercurrent of sexist discrimination.

This banner here, which I am sure you all read with interest on 15 December 1990, "Nurses Asking for Pay Raise of 50 Per Cent," appeared in the Toronto Star, and that is not a true statement. We have not asked for 50%. Having said that, shortly after that, on the next day to be specific, "Premier Won't Promise 50% Raise for Nurses." I do not blame him. Why would he promise somebody something that he had not been asked for yet? My past president and my current president were not interviewed. Indeed, we were out of the country when that article was written. I bring it to your attention for the possibility of consideration of sensationalism in journalism, because this gets everybody all hot and bothered, and quite frankly it is over nothing.
